TOPIC FOR FIRST MONTH 15, 1911.

GREAT LIVES: I, ABRAHAM.

(This series was selected by leading ministers and laymen on the way to the St. Paul Convention.)

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, First month 9th. Faithful Abraham. Gal. 3: 6-9.

Third-day. The pilgrim. Heb. 11: 8-10.

Fourth-day. The peacemaker. Gen. 13: 7-18.

Fifth-day. The friend of God. Jas. 2: 21-24.

Sixth-day. The man of prayer. Gen. 18: 23-33.

Seventh-day. The martyr-heart. Gen. 22: 1-14.

Mention other lessons from Abraham's life.

What do you most admire in Abraham's character?

What advantages have we over Abraham?

Abraham was an idealist. In youth he received a vision of what his life might become, and steadfastly following the gleam, he broke away from the things that held him, and made his mark upon the history of the world. Youth is the time of visions, dreams and ideals. It is better to aim high, and fall short, than to aim low, and hit the mark every time. "Hitch your wagon to a star," says the New England sage. It is better to aim at a star, and land on the ridge-pole of the barn, than to aim at the ridge-pole, and land in the dirt of the barn yard. Anyone if he gets near enough can hit the side of a house with a blunderbuss; only the trained eye, steady nerve, and strong muscle can send the arrow to the center of the distant bull's eye. Abraham aimed high. He estimated his life in terms of stars, and sands of the sea, all families of the earth were to be the better for his living. These early visions were the main springs of his great life. He was one of the world's first idealists.

* * *

Abraham dared to trust God:

1. In the choice of a life mission. Gen. 12: 4.
2. In the method of working out that mission in life. Gen. 15: 12-21.
3. In the brotherliness and unselfishness of his life. Gen. 13: 8, 9; 18: 22-33.
4. In the hour of trial. Gen. 22: 1-14.

God consequently dared to trust Abraham and his descendants with the most precious gift of a divine revelation, and a salvation for all mankind.

* * *

Abraham stood the proof of his loyalty and faith (Gen. 22: 1) by the most implicit obedience. The process of proving is not easy or agreeable, but necessary. "Every piece tested in the factory" is the motto of the manufacturer of all kinds of machines from a watch to a motor car. Man is more than a machine. Shall he not be submitted to testing without whimpering, so that when the strains of constantly increasing burdens weigh upon him he will not sink beneath the load? Earth and time constitute the manufacturing plant where character is made and tested; heaven and eternity is where character will assume its greatest efficiency.

* * *

Abraham was a builder of altars. The setting up of family altars is a custom as old as Abraham. Its practice kept him near the fountain head of all his life. A campaign for the setting up of torn down family altars would help to restore to the Church of Christ a necessary but oft neglected practice. Religion to be most efficient must find in the home its clearest expression. The altarless home is a home with the window that faces heaven closed and blinded.

Abraham set up his altars in times of prosperity, along the way when the wonderful promises showered upon him, and his hopes were high. (Note the setting of those at Shechem, Gen. 12: 6, 7; at Bethel, Gen. 12: 8; at Mamre, Gen. 13: 18). When the way was heavy and the pathway dark, he who was practiced in altar building, built another at Mt. Moriah (Gen. 22: 2, 9) and at its side the sun shone through the storm cloud, and Abraham saw God in a new and brighter glory than ever before. (Gen. 22: 11-18.)

Recall those records telling of Jesus' visits to the home in Bethany, and note that she who learned how to sit at Jesus' feet in the sunshine of life, (Luke 10: 39) knew how to find His feet in the darkness of sorrow (John 11: 32) and in gratitude poured out upon His feet her gift of love (John 12: 3).

Abraham was on intimate terms with God. He had speaking acquaintance with Him. He knew Him other than by hearsay. God was his friend, and what was more wonderful (say it reverently) Abraham was the friend of God. (Read the leading incidents of Abraham's life as recorded in Gen. 12-23, and note how many times he is found in worship, in communion with God, or with God's messengers.)

The old catechism said that man was created to glorify God. This is very indefinite. We ask how, and the answer comes, "Glorify God by making yourself fit to fellowship with Him, for of all His created universe man is singled out for this holy honor." When we trifle with life, and see its end only in what we wear, and eat and possess, when we become only a form for the exhibition of clothing, or a tag or label for prosperity, or when we see small minds and smaller hearts disguised by showy circumstances and hideous mental and spiritual squalor hidden in fine surroundings, let us pray to be shocked into a sense of man's divine dignity, made in the image of God, and intended to be the temple of the Holy Spirit.

"A sacred burden is this life ye bear;

Look on it, lift it, bear it solemnly.

Stand up and walk beneath it steadfastly.

Fail not for sorrow, falter not for sin,
But onward, upward, till the goal ye win."

* * *

Abraham was cosmopolitan. This is the term Dr. George Matheson uses to define him. "He is a man seeking to make the world the recipient of his own blessing, eager to spend himself, to pour out all the treasures of his life for the good of humanity. He is the forerunner of that great missionary band which, whether in the sphere of religion or of culture have been the pioneers of a new era to lands that were outside the pale—the forerunner of Duff, of Livingstone, of Moffat, of Carey, of Stanley, of Nansen, of Sir John Franklin—of all in every age who have traveled and explored for the purpose of human development. Abraham is the man with the cosmopolitan spirit—the man who realizes the common rights of the human race, and seeks to secure them for the race. This will always be his proudest distinction, and his highest glory."

News in Brief

Arch Hoxsey in a Wright biplane broke the world's altitude record at Los Angeles, the 27th ult., by soaring more than two miles above ground, his barograph registering 11,474 feet.

The American Sugar Refining Co. has offered to pay $100,000 to the government in lieu of the frauds which they have practiced on the custom officers, but the government officials refused, thinking they have evidence which will compel the refining company to return not less than one million dollars.

Awful tales are coming from Jerusalem concerning the attacks made by savage Bedouin tribesmen in the vilayet of Syria upon Christians and upon Turkish officers captured in battle. The most diabolical cruelties that the fanatical minds of the barbarous tribesmen can devise are being inflicted upon the captives.

High financing is not without its tragedies. Joseph G. Robin, the New York adventurer in finance, controlling director of the wrecked Northern Bank, and President of the temporarily crippled Washington Savings Bank, was arrested last week and brought to court; but in order to avoid the penalties of the law he attempted suicide by taking poison and is now in the hospital.

One of the Things We Must Learn To Do

Every Friend probably believes as I do, that our type of Christianity ought to spread in the earth. We do not talk now as much as Friends once did of "our peculiarities" and "our testimonies" and "our views," but we still believe very intensely that the Christ who revealed God to men in Galilee and who suffered for our sins in Jerusalem is today a living Christ, present by His spirit in our world of joy and sorrow, of light and dark, of good and evil, calling men from death to life, from sin to holiness, from the far country to the Father's house, and from selfishness to self-forgetful consecration; and we believe that this simple gospel of ours, spiritual in its message and freed from the complications of liturgy, ritual, sacraments and sacerdotalism, is good for the whole world.

But for some reason very few of the "whole world" are being reached and won by us. The figures of our annual census—figures which, in spite of the proverb, may possibly lie a little—indicate that we have made a net gain of less than 300 persons in our American membership during the past year. That is a gain of slightly over three-tenths of one per cent. It is better than nothing, of course, and we must not fly into notes of discouragement; but something different ought to happen. We at least ought to keep up our ratio with the other branches of the onward marching Protestant churches, which should mean an annual net addition of 2,000 members. Why do we miss the mark; why do we fail to make large gains?

There may be, no doubt, many answers to the question, but one answer above all others is pertinent. We are weak in what St. Paul considers the primary business of a church—we are weak in the function of edifying.

To "edify" means to construct, or build up, or build. Now, no other age in human history has ever known how to construct, or to build, as the people in our generation know how. There are almost no limits to modern skill at constructing. The Alps are riddled with tunnels; the Hudson has its amazing network of subways and underground railroads; all the great cities of the world have their thoroughfares for rapid transit below the ground. Our buildings of steel and cement are higher than the pyramids; our flying-machines already go over the tops of snow mountains like a bird, and may next year cross oceans; our ships, as large as three mammoth hotels, cross the ocean, unload, load and recross in twelve days, and communicate with the shores all the way! Surely our engineers can edify! Their building work carries conviction—we let them have our money to use, and we trust our lives to their bridges, their tunnels, their ships and their skyscrapers, which run up above the dreams of the Babel-builders.

When we turn from the sphere of mechanics to spiritual edifying, all is different. The crowds watch the man in overalls as he guides his derrick, makes it swing the mighty girder just where he wants it, and then, with one hand, turns it as though it were a tiny toy. They all believe he can edify. In the same street is a meeting-house, perhaps, where the other sort of edifying is supposed to be done. But you soon discover that the children of the world are wiser than the children of light. The former take infinite pains to learn how to construct and build; the latter, to say the least, are awkward at the work of building the raw material of the world into the body of Jesus Christ, and they do not take infinite pains to learn how. Our eagerness to learn how to win men from sin and build them as lively stones into the spiritual building will not compare with the eagerness of the modern engineer to learn his art; our determination to discover the best methods of doing the pastoral work—the hand-to-hand, personal work—of our neighborhoods is far behind the determination of the graduate from the technical school; our zeal to find out how to use the Sunday school as a constructive spiritual agency looks weak when put by the side of the zeal of the men who have tunneled the rivers and mountains of our continent. The natural effect appears in lack of results and in feebleness of response. We do not command the faith of the crowd as the man in overalls does with his derrick. They go their way and do not fill our seats to hear of our Emmanuel-God. We must take more to heart St. Paul's great words: "Seek earnestly that ye may abound in edifying."

Current Events and Comments

The American Friend for 1911

We greet our readers this New Year with a number of new features. More space will be devoted to current events; Charles M. Woodman takes the Christian Endeavor department, which will be enlarged, and the makeup of the paper will be somewhat changed. Through these innovations we hope to serve our readers better than ever before.

Rufus M. Jones will continue to contribute editorially, and the policy of the paper will remain unchanged. Other articles are yet to appear in the series on our schools and colleges. "Quakerism Beyond the Mississippi" will conclude the account of Oregon and Washington Friends, and embrace a series of articles on the history of Kansas Yearly Meeting. In these articles a wealth of new material will be published which now exists only in manuscript and inaccessible documents. While historical in nature, they are modern, and shed considerable light on the present situation in the Church. "The California Field" will be covered in a series of short, illustrated sketches by a special correspondent who is on the ground. Devotional and other wholesome articles ministering directly to spiritual growth will be given considerable space.

General discussion of current issues is provided for under the head "Some Views on Present-day Topics," and while we do not wish to encourage controversial contributions, we do welcome the candid discussion of living issues by those who entertain divergent views and express them charitably. We also welcome correspondence on any subject of general interest to Friends.

The Cost of Empire Building

An article on "Empire Building," by John W. Graham, in the current number of the British Friend, is well calculated to make thoughtful readers ask, "Who profits?" Since 1870 the British Empire has annexed or extended its protection over "5,000,000 of square miles and 88,000,000 people." But why?

"We went to Egypt to secure the bondholders who had speculated on the follies of the Khedive Ismail, and to guard the Suez Canal. We took the Soudan to secure Egypt; the South African territories offered gold and diamonds; Nigeria and East Africa could grow cotton; Burmah was taken lest France should get it, and the Siamese States are prospective mining districts. Broadly, trade, markets, account for the rest.

"They have cost us one great war and many small ones. Bloodshed accompanied their annexation, and they have provoked a certain feeling of envy in other countries. They account for the strain with Germany. They gird us round with sensitive neighbors. Our soldiers have been slain by tens of thousands in acquiring them.

"Who profits, then, by these wars and these markets?" Certain of the wealthy class.

On the other hand, who pays the bills; who bears the increasing war tax and wastes their best manhood in this aggression? The common people, of course.

"Meantime the taxpayer is told that the honor of England is at stake, the prestige of the empire in danger, and that the enemy is a barbarian prince of unspeakable character and hostility to Christianity; so he has become responsible for paying the millions which have been absorbed by capitalists, in so far as they have not been destroyed. The wounded soldiers also come home with constitutions devastated by disease, have, probably, a pension, and join the pathetic army of the irregularly employed. Certain widows and orphans also contribute their gift to the empire; meantime Anglo-Jewish patriots have counted their profit by hundreds of thousands."

Should we Americans not pause before we vote appropriations to build more battleships and increase our standing army, and ask, "Is this our goal?"

Senatorial Contests

The Democrats are finding the road to power beset with difficulties. In at least three States where they captured the Legislature last fall, the senatorial contest is generating considerable heat. In certain respects these contests are similar. In each an old-line politician with an unsavory record, backed by a "machine" and "vested interests," is lined up against the popular candidate. In no instance did the machine candidate dare to come before his party convention, nor was his name mentioned during the campaign, but no sooner had his party won at the polls than he began a systematic effort to induce the members of the Legislature to vote for him.

In New York, Edwin M. Shepard is without doubt the people's candidate for the seat soon to be vacated by Senator Depew. During the past month, however, it became evident that William F. Sheehan, the political boss of Buffalo, was conspiring for the position, and last week he announced openly his candidacy. Men like Governor-elect Dix and Mayor Gaynor, New York, feel that he is a millstone about the neck of the party, but he will not subside.

In Ohio the Democrats were caught napping. The next day after election they found themselves unexpectedly in control of the Legislature, with no candidate for the United States Senate. Immediately nearly every prominent man in the party became an aspirant. Through a process of elimination the contest has narrowed down to two or three possibilities. One is E. W. Hanley, a self-made business man, chairman of the State Democratic Committee, and for some years boss of the Dayton organization; and a second is Atlee Pomerene, who spent his boyhood on a farm, graduated from Princeton in 1884, and has since practiced law. At the last election he was chosen Lieutenant-Governor. The contest between the two has culminated in a series of joint debates in which neither has done credit to himself by indulging in bitter personalities. John R. McLean, owner of the Cincinnati Enquirer, is the third possibility, and his chances of election are improving as the other two candidates are losing public respect by their undignified behavior.

New Jersey's contest is a battle-royal between ex-Senator James Smith, Jr., and Governor-elect Woodrow Wilson, who has espoused the cause of James E. Martine, the regularly nominated candidate. Here the issue is clearly drawn between old political methods and ideals and revived Democracy. Smith is said to have a majority of the representatives on his side, but his candidacy is a breach of trust with his party, and his strength depends upon his former prestige. On the other hand, Wilson appeals to popular sentiment. No sooner had Smith announced his intentions than Wilson took the people into his confidence. If public sentiment is healthy, this move will undoubtedly be effective. The country at large is awaiting with interest the outcome, since Woodrow Wilson's political future depends in large measure upon it.

Young China Becoming Aggressive

Sentiment in favor of a constitutional government is growing rapidly in China. Four years ago the empress-dowager, who then ruled the country, issued a decree providing for a gradual transformation of the government into a constitutional and parliamentary system. The program covered ten years. At that time this seemed like a short period for such a radical revolution, but events in Turkey and Persia have since demonstrated that some Asiatics, at least, are capable of passing from an absolute to a limited monarchy in a few days; and these examples may account in a measure for what is now happening in Peking. In order to prepare the Chinese for representative government, assemblies with limited power were established in the several provinces, and not long ago a National Assembly was convened at Peking, all in accordance with the original program. These assemblies were intended as training schools from which the Imperial Parliament was to be made up in 1916. The provincial assemblies were composed of men with democratic ideas, and it was not surprising that they developed in a short time ultra-progressive tendencies. The National Assembly, however, composed chiefly of men nominated by the throne, and of high provincial authority, was counted on to check the zeal of the provincial bodies. It so happened that the few members who were elected rapidly and unexpectedly gained the leadership in the assembly. This caused no little alarm in the emperor's political household or Grand Council, as it is called. The situation became especially acute last week, when the assembly asked that the Grand Counsellors be dismissed and a constitutional cabinet organized. This the throne promptly refused, and we are asking, what next?

Temperance Sentiment in Europe

In a recent speech in the French Senate on a proposed law for the regulation of the liquor trade, Premier Briand declared that alcoholism in France was a growing calamity. He even went so far as to say that "the very life of the nation is at stake." He announced that the government was determined to combat the evil. These are words of encouragement, since they come from one who knows whereof he speaks, although the measure which he was supporting is far from a prohibitory law. It provides for the gradual reduction in the number of drinking places to one for each 200 inhabitants. Limited restriction on the use of liquor, however, is better than no restriction at all. The German emperor's determination to curtail "drinking" in the army and navy has resulted in reducing beer consumption almost one half. England, also, has caught the spirit of reform, and the Lloyd-George measure, which became a law last year, considerably increased the tax on liquor, and is having the effect of reducing its consumption.

Debauching The Right of Franchise

Recent revelations of the wholesale buying and selling of votes in Adams County, Ohio, has brought to light conditions which are almost beyond belief. Never before in the history of the United States has such shamelessness been shown in political affairs. Out of a voting population of 6,000, 1,000 have been indicted, and several hundred have been fined and disfranchised for five years. In one township every voter has been disfranchised, and it is now a problem how the township government is to be carried on during the next half of a decade. It is thought by some that the entire number of fraud cases may reach 2,000, or one-third of the voting population of the county. It appears that a regular contract system was developed for delivering votes. Men would buy up groups of voters and then sell them in lots to the political party making the most favorable bid. If a contractor having seven votes succeeded in getting a bid of $70, he would divide $60 among the group and keep $10 for his commission. Most of the men who have confessed—and there are about 400 in this class—have received an average of $5 each.

The Boyhood of John Henry Douglas

EDITED BY MABEL H. DOUGLAS.

I was born in the State of Maine, in the town of Fairfield, on the 27th day of Eleventh month, 1832. My parents were godly people and members of the Friends Church. Their interest and care for their children were very great. My beloved mother said to me several times that she began to pray for me before I was born. She took me to church before I was six weeks old, and from that time to this I have never failed to worship in meeting with God's people, unless prevented by some providential hindrance.

My father's house was a home for ministers of the Gospel and others, and many were entertained. My mother was never happier than when the house was full to overflowing with God's people, so that in my youth I was continually under the influence of good people, and parental care prevented me from going into wrong company, for which I have been deeply grateful all my life.

But through a depraved moral nature, inherited from fallen Adam, and through the temptations of the devil I was lead into many sinful things and felt a great drawing away from God and His righteous law. But God in mercy visited me by His good Spirit, so that I was deeply convicted for sin. I felt condemned and knew that I was lost and undone forever. I tried hard to do better. I made many bargains with the Lord that if He would forgive me, I would be a better boy in the future—but all to no avail!

I heard an abundance of preaching every week and oftener, and was deeply impressed thereby. I was taught the awful consequences of sin and its eternal penalties. I was told that if I would obey the Spirit and live a pure and holy life, that Jesus Christ would save me at last by virtue of His atoning blood. I never heard of a present salvation through faith in Jesus Christ. I tried hard to live a Christian life, but knew no victory.

At the age of fourteen I had very strong and continued visitations of the Spirit calling me to confess Christ, sometimes even shaking the benches I occupied in meeting. I met with no encouragement to be faithful to this impression. I was advised to keep still and try the "fleece both wet and dry." They said I was undoubtedly a tenderly visited youth. At last Satan came in like a flood and suggested that, if these convictions were not of the Holy Spirit, the whole thing was a mistake. So strong was the power of the evil one that I gave up everything and unbelief captured my soul. I was brought into utter darkness.

At the age of sixteen I served our preparative meeting as clerk. A First-day school was opened at this time and I was made a teacher. We were allowed to ask no questions, and Barclay's "Catechism" was given us to study. We memorized a great deal of Scripture, and I learned the entire catechism by heart. All this did not satisfy, and

I found myself going farther and farther from God. Oh, that I could take back those years of folly! I said to my precious mother that I loved her and knew she was a good woman, but that I did not believe in her religion; that it was the outgrowth of a prejudiced education; it would be a good thing if all the Christians were drowned in the ocean and we could begin life anew, freed from the superstitions of religion. Thousands of times I have wished I had never said it.

I waked up at last to the fact that my life was a failure. The uncertainty of life and the thought of the awful future brought me into distress of mind day and night. I had given up religion; I felt like one sinking in deep water with no helper. I kept within the bounds of respectability. Family pride kept me from things that were disgraceful. I had great respect for my father. I remember well, on one occasion he took me to a merchant whom I was to serve as clerk. Father went into the private office, and I heard him say: "I have brought thee an honest boy and I want thee to return him to me the same."

Hardly a day passed but that I had occasion to remember the confidence my father had in me. His remarks acted as a great stimulus to be true and honest. I was rapidly promoted, and soon trusted with everything.

I was given some opportunity for an education at two academies and a few years at Friends School, Providence, R. I.

[Among the schoolboys at Providence at this time we find Dr. Dougan Clark, Timothy Nicholson, Albert K. and Alfred H. Smiley, Timothy B. Hussey, Robert and John Henry Douglas and others. What encouragement it must give us to care for and educate the boys of today when we see what these one-time schoolboys have done for their Church and their country in civic as well as religious reforms.] The diary continues:

I was still unsaved and restless beyond words to tell. In my nineteenth year, having consent of my parents and on account of my health, I started for Ohio, whither an uncle and cousin had already moved. In the providence of God, while on the ocean, between Maine and New York, we were overtaken by a severe storm. The test had come; the climax was reached! I heard, as it were, a voice: "If this ship goes down, where will thy soul land." Great fear came over me; everything seemed so dreadful around me, and looking into eternity seemed infinitely more terrible. I saw at once that my own righteousness was as "filthy rags." I was not prepared to meet God. In my distress I called upon the Lord as best I could; I called upon Jesus of the Cross to have mercy and save me. I confessed my sins, and somehow, I could not understand, my trouble was at an end and peace, glorious peace, came rushing into my soul; everything around me changed to music, and looking into eternity, all was peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. I knew nothing of the theology of what had happened, though I learned it all afterwards. On that awful night I prayed that if God would spare my life to reach the shore, the rest of my days should be devoted to His cause. I little knew then how much was involved in such a prayer.

Whittier, Cal.

The California Field

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

I. Forthcoming Account of Local Meetings.

Having through a residence of twenty-three years in California observed with interest the establishment of most of the 17 monthly meetings composing the yearly meeting, I have often thought that a wider knowledge of the origin, growth and surroundings of these congregations would not only be helpful to them severally, but would be of interest to Friends beyond our borders.

THE AMERICAN FRIEND, desirous of coming in closer touch with its California readers, and of enlarging their circle as well, has opened its columns to giving our Church interests this wider publicity, and has assigned me the work of contributing a series of sketches that shall cover this field. This task is accepted with pleasure as carrying many features of interest and as seeming to be an appointment of duty in the providence of God.

This article, as a preliminary, can only venture a brief survey of the field. California Yearly Meeting, with but 2,896 home members, is only a small flock, but counting the State as its possession, its field has an area equal to the territory covered by New England, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Yearly Meetings. Diverse, indeed, are the surroundings of the local meetings, found as they are in the large cities and in the great interior valleys, on the tableland of the mountains and in the reclaimed desert section below the level of the sea.

The interest Friends in other States feel in the situation and progress of these meetings in the occupancy of this large field is heightened by the fact that every older Quaker community is represented in their membership, so that the mention of familiar names in the contemplated writeup of these meetings may touch chords of kinship and sympathy that reach across mountain and desert to a thousand Eastern homes.

Again, the larger sphere of activity to come to our Church in this State, in the light of developments clearly in view, must command the interest of every Friends meeting on the continent. A land practically free from destructive storms, where winter in any features of rigor suggested by the word is unknown, where an empire of fertile soil still sown to grain will bring to the hand that cultivates it on intensive lines returns that are impossible in sterner climes—a land with these features, we may safely say, will be sought by constantly increasing thousands. If, among these, Friends come in due ratio as heretofore, and if the better methods of Church extension now maturing shall be maintained, why may not ours become one of the larger yearly meetings? Why, indeed, may not other yearly meetings be established within this domain? These larger possibilities cannot have extended consideration in this outline, but they are closely related to writing up the local meetings of California, and they obtrusively present themselves in this connection.

It is my purpose to visit each meeting in the State and to give first-hand information in these columns concerning its history and work, thus stimulating, we may assuredly hope, a neighborly interest in its affairs in every sister church throughout the State and giving to Friends abroad glimpses of our work not otherwise obtainable. There will also be given information of interest to those seeking homes or opportunities for religious work in California. The co-operation of the pastor and members in each meeting in this undertaking will be greatly appreciated.

William Penn's "Failure"

BY FREDERIC W. PIM.

It has often been urged as an argument against the Quaker position in regard to peace and war, that Penn's "Holy Experiment" in founding the colony of Pennsylvania on a peace basis was not really so successful as Friends appear to think it—that, in fact, it entirely broke down through its radical unsoundness.

The fact that it did eventually break down must be admitted; but the external difficulties it encountered, apart altogether from any inherent weakness, appear fully sufficient to account for this. In my view it would be nearer the truth to say that the great experiment was never really tried at all.

Readers of Dr. Isaac Sharpless's "History of Quaker Government in Pennsylvania" (1901) will be aware that these external difficulties were very great. They may be shortly summarized as follows:

1. Hampering conditions imposed by the home government.
2. The appointment of non-Quaker Governors, who were often unsympathetic and sometimes even hostile.
3. Later on, great obstruction by the "renegade" Penn clique.
4. Seditious plotting by the Church party.
5. Open hostility on the part of the Presbyterians.
6. Prolonged absences of William Penn, who left the administration in the hands of inferior men having no broad grasp of his policy.

Penn's Indian policy was not so much a matter of peace and war as of truthfulness, justice and generosity, as opposed to selfishness and greed. In this policy Penn was two centuries ahead of his time; but he only anticipated what is now recognized and largely practiced by our Imperial Government in dealing with "native" races. No doubt William Penn was more thorough and more single-minded in his way of carrying this out; but in one way his task was simpler, since he had at the outset a perfectly clear stage, with no legacy from past centuries to hamper him.

It has seemed to me most unfortunate for Pennsylvania that Penn felt so strong a call to the endeavor to secure toleration at home that he preferred this to looking after the interests of his colony. He was misled by his friendship for James II, and by his consequent trust in that king, and in his own influence with him. If he had remained most of his time in Pennsylvania, keeping in his own hands the reins of government, he might have carried the administration through its difficulties and counteracted the resistance of so many opposing factions. And toleration at home would in good time have arrived all the same.

As it was, Pennsylvania became subject to a "dry-rot" of which Penn seems hardly to have been aware, and the result of this was the break-up of 1756, when the Friends finally relinquished all share in the government.

The facts, impartially examined, seem to me to warrant the opinion that the "Experiment" was never really tried; and, if so, it cannot be condemned as a failure due to its being based on a vicious principle.

[This appeared in The British Friend, and the editor asks: Is not the strongest of all "peace" arguments this: The faith that if we would as a nation deal with all other races on principles of consistent justice, such as Penn showed towards the Indians, we should need no other defence?]

Some Notes on Present Day Topics

Creed, or Declaration of Faith—Is There a Difference?

BY LUKE WOODARD.

It is quite common in these days to hear a class of professing Christians speak of a creed as something that ought to be discarded by a church. This is true of members of influence in our own church. They even go so far as to say: "Friends never had any creed." To determine whether this is true or not, let us inquire as to the difference, if any, between a "creed" and a "declaration of faith." That the Society of Friends, from its beginning and all through its history, has made well defined statements of its belief of Christian doctrines and moral obligations, which is properly denominated "a confession, or declaration of faith," is too well known to need argument. Our history abounds with proof, for example, George Fox's letter to the Governor of Barbadoes; Barclay's "Apology"; a formal statement by the early Friends (see Sewel's "History," Vol. II, pp. 351-361), also the printed disciplines of all the yearly meetings, in past and present editions, including what is known as the "Uniform Discipline" of the American yearly meetings; in which, with fullness and detail, the belief of our Church is given. If such a statement is not a creed, I am unable to comprehend the meaning of words. It simply states the summarized belief of many—"We believe"—instead of that of one creed—"I believe." If 100 persons should each separately state their belief in certain specifications and the same number should subscribe to the same statements with the plural form—"We believe"—can anyone perceive any essential difference? This identity is not altered should there be a difference made in the use of such a formal statement of their faith by different churches, whether an applicant answer to a committee or subscribe to a paper.

The points of doctrine to which the early Friends subscribed, and which Friends still hold, comprise a summary of all the important doctrines of the Christian religion—the authenticity and inspiration of the Old and New Testaments; the being and attributes of God, His creative work; the deity of Christ, His miraculous birth and sinless human life, His miracles, atoning death, resurrection, ascension, glorification and intercession in Heaven, His second coming with the angels in the great day to judge the world in righteousness; in the final triumph of His Kingdom and His glorious and eternal reign; in the person and offices of the Holy Spirit, who convicts of sin, regenerates, sanctifies, comforts and guides the believer; in the oneness of Father, Son and Holy Spirit; in the personality of Satan, through whose subtlety our first parents were induced to sin, and consequently fell from the state of holiness in which they were created, entailing on all their posterity a depraved nature and the penalty of death, though guilt does not attach prior to a condition of accountability. A further item embraced in the belief of the Friends Church is that an effective offer of salvation is made to all whereby they may be saved through the merits of Jesus Christ, who shed His blood as a ransom for all. The Friends have ever believed in the resurrection both of the just and the unjust and in the eternity of future reward and punishment.

In addition to the foregoing articles of faith, which are held in common with evangelical believers generally, there are others which distinguish us as a religious body, touching the spirituality of the Christian dispensation, the non-observance of the so-called ordinances, the ministry of women, the unlawfulness of oaths and of war.

It is, I presume, not beyond the truth to say there is no religious body whose views of doctrine and Christian practices are more fully and explicitly stated than are those of the religious Society of Friends—in modern phrase, the Friends Church. Webster defines "creed": "A definite summary of what is believed; a brief exposition of important points; especially a summary of Christian belief." Accepting this definition, the fact that Friends have a creed is incontrovertible.

A Penn Story

Wm. Penn was not without a sense of humor, which is well illustrated by the following story, told by the Minneapolis Journal:

William Penn was once urging a man not to use intoxicants to excess, when the man suddenly asked:

"Can you tell me of an easy way to do it?"

"Yes," replied Penn, readily, "it is just as easy as to open thy hand, friend."

"Convince me of that," the man exclaimed, "and I will promise upon my honor to do as you tell me."

"Well, my friend," Penn answered, "whenever thee finds a glass of liquor in thy hand, open that hand before the glass touches thy lips, and thee will never drink to excess again."

The man was so struck by the simplicity of the great Quaker's advice that he followed it and reformed.

Temperance Work at Mito, Japan

Our temperance campaign actually began Fifth Month 1st, when Kiyono Watanabe came to Mito and devoted her entire time to the work of planning and preparing for temperance contests among the girls and children in our various Bible school classes. Our home became the busiest workshop you ever saw—Watanabe San would be training one class in the entrance; Kojima San would be training another in their own room, Tanaka San a class in the dining-room; Uyeno San a class in the living-room; while there would be girls practicing aloud in the garden. This is a sample of what went on for almost eight weeks, and at the same time we were not neglecting any of the regular girls' prayer-meetings or English classes. As a result, six out of every ten girls who practiced finally entered the contests. The national rules require that not less than six, nor more than nine, are eligible to compete in these contests. The first preliminary contest was held Fifth month 21st; then followed, in rapid succession, 17 others, which, with last year's contest, qualified 22 girls for silver medal contests. Accordingly we arranged for three medals, and held the first silver medal contest Sixth month 30th. This was a grand final crisis. Photographs were taken of the contestants and enthusiasm ran high. The other two silver medal contests were equally successful.

Unfortunately, on Sixth month 29th, we received a telegram from the doctor at Karuizawa summoning us to the bedside of one of our little Japanese friends, Sachiko, who survived only six days, dying with meningitis. This sadness cast a shadow over the closing contests and compelled us to be absent from them. Fortunately, Alice Lewis, Tokyo, was able to be present. All our contests were largely attended, and the girls declaimed beautifully.

While these contests were in progress, temperance work in the schools was carried on. Sixth month 1st, Ruth Davis, the representative of the World's

W. C. T. U., her special interpreter, helper and myself, went to Ishioka and visited the government schools, where we had obtained permission to give scientific temperance talks to the children. It was the first time there had ever been a foreigner inside the schools at that place. That afternoon Ruth Davis talked to the boys of the agricultural school and to the seventh and eighth grades in the primary department. All the teachers attended and were much interested, especially in the charts. In the evening there was a meeting for adults, at which about 200 were present. Next morning Ruth Davis spoke to the children of the fifth and sixth grades. Over 800 of them stood closely packed in a shed on account of rain, but they listened perfectly. The rain ceased for about fifteen minutes and all the children of the first four years were summoned into the playgrounds, where Moriya San, Ruth Davis' helper, talked to them. In all 1,800 pupils saw the charts and listened to the talks. Before we left, the principal of the schools told us that he had set a bad example before his pupils for thirty-five years in the use of drink, but declared that henceforth he was going to abstain. Similar work was done in Mito, where hundreds of children and many of the teachers were reached. Everywhere we were welcomed, and on a number of occasions took tea and cake with the principals and teachers.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

John McMillan and wife, of Highland, Ohio, are conducting an evangelistic effort at Fairview, Ohio.

* * *

Riley Hubbard is engaged in a series of meetings at Mosier meeting, near Indianola, Ill., which began Christmas night.

* * *

Morton C. Pearson, of Indianapolis, Ind., recently addressed a men's meeting at Amo, Ind., on "Serving our Generation."

* * *

In Chas. F. Coffin's article in the account of David Hunt, we stated that his ministry was "magical"—it should be "logical."

* * *

Nathan and Esther Frame were expected to begin evangelistic meetings at Vermilion Grove, Ill., the first of the new year.

* * *

Frank Kinsey recently held evangelistic meetings at Greencastle and Logan both country meetings belonging to Wichita Quarterly Meeting, Kansas.

* * *

Eliza P. Gidley closed a three weeks meeting at Gate, Okla., the 19th ult. Many were blessed. The students at Laurence Academy especially were helped.

* * *

In the past month there have been added, by request and certificate, seventeen members to the Friends Church at Damascus, Ohio. John Pennington is pastor.

* * *

Gertrude Reinier, of Paoli, Ind., is assisting Frank Ashba in evangelistic work at Georgetown, Ill., and he in turn will assist her in a like series of meetings at Paoli.

* * *

Samuel Talbert was expected to assist Olive Guire in evangelistic work in Elwood meeting, east of Georgetown, Ill. The services were to begin during the holidays.

* * *

Forty-one Christmas dinners were furnished to a like number of needy families by the First Friends Bible School, in Indianapolis, at the recent Christmas time.

* * *

A series of meetings of two weeks duration, closing Twelfth month 18th, has been held at Fishertown, Pa. They were conducted by L. Oscar Moon, the Field Secretary of Baltimore Meeting.

Mary Moon Meredith, of Vermilion Grove, Ill., just closed a series of meetings at Friends Chapel, near Scotland, Ill., and is in like service in Hopewell meeting, near Dana, Ind.

Isaiah Miars who lives about 2½ miles from Wilmington, Ohio, is very sick. He is the father of Mary (Miars) Harold, who was pastor at Lynn, Mass., for a number of years.

At a recent session of the county institutes in Simpson Auditorium, in Los Angeles, President Thomas Newlin, of Whittier College, addressed 1,200 teachers on the topic, "A Study in Student Life."

* * *

Newton and Hattie Franklin are in their sixth year of service in the meeting at Upperville, N. Y. As the result of their labors they are seeing whole families converted and brought into the Church.

* * *

Alexander C. Purdy, who is attending Hartford, Conn., Seminary, is preaching regularly on First-days at Moses Brown School, Providence, R. I. Clarence Pickett, who is attending the same institution, goes regularly to Fall River Meeting.

* * *

Nixon and Minnie Rich, B. J. Albertson, and James Hadley were the yearly meeting committee who attended the setting up of Gate Quarterly Meeting last month. T. Harlan Parker, Esther, Okla., and Christiana Kirkhart, Gate, Okla., were appointed clerks.

* * *

Wichita Quarterly Meeting convened at Argonia, Kans., the 3d ult. The principal discussion was on the care of North End Meeting, Wichita. Dr. William L. Pearson of the University, preached acceptably on Seventh-day, and addressed an educational convention the same evening.

The Friends meeting in New York sent the following Christmas greeting to each of its members:

"As we stand on the threshold of another year our thoughts turn with loving interest to our fellow-members, and in His name, through whom all we are brethren, we ask thee to accept our heartfelt good wishes for nineteen hundred and eleven."

* * *

The students in the biblical department of the academy, Fairmount, Ind., are given a vacation of two weeks in which to engage in special revival work. This counts as part of their year's work. They are all engaged in revivals in the meetings close to their own homes or near Fairmount, Ind.

* * *

Absolom and Dora Knight, of Kansas Yearly Meeting; Carrie G. Taylor, of Russiaville, Ind., and Harry Hayes, all Friends ministers, have recently located at Olivet, near Vermilion Grove, Ill., and are interested in or connected with the Illinois Holiness University, which is making a very rapid growth.

* * *

Wm. J. Davis and wife, their son and two daughters, of Lawrence, Kansas, after having sojourned in Arizona, and at several other places, have established their home at Long Beach, Cal. Another daughter is attending the Normal School at Phoenix, and the son is a student in Whittier College.

* * *

Melissa S. Fellow, Gate, Okla., has sent a circular letter to Friends in the Quarterly Meeting, addressing them as co-laborers in the missionary cause, and calling their attention to the parts of the Kansas Yearly Meeting minutes dealing with the subject. She also suggests literature and tells where it can be secured. Why is this not a good work for quarterly meeting superintendents throughout the country?

* * *

Fairmount Quarterly Meeting was held at Fairmount, Ind., Twelfth month 16th, 17th and 18th. It was a time of great blessing though there were no visiting ministers present. Richard Haworth, pastor in the Fairmount meeting, did most of the preaching. Jane Nickerson gave a helpful message on Seventh-day. On Sixth-day the meeting on ministry and oversight favorably considered the names of two young men for the ministry.

* * *

The citizens of Whittier, Cal., are taking subscriptions to erect on the college campus a monument to the poet for whom their town was named. It will be a modest but tasteful structure of a very fine quality of brick, surmounted by a large globe of frosted glass, containing an electric light. A bronze tablet will be set in the wall, bearing a likeness of the poet, the date of his birth and of his death, and a quotation from the lines he dedicated to the town that bears his name.

* * *

For more than a year the Fairmount Friends have conducted a mission in North Summitville, Ind. Recently the pastor, Eli Scott, was assisted by Virgil Brock, Samuel Pack and Leora Bogue in a series of revival meetings in which 57 persons professed conversion. Several of these will unite with Friends. During the revival the Friends purchased the building in which the meetings had been held, repaired the house and put all in first class condition. The building was purchased from the United Brethren. Steps are being taken toward giving the Friends there a meeting of their own.

A new peace society, which promises to be of more than ordinary interest, was recently organized at the home of William C. Allen, Redlands, Cal. Those present were invited guests who had assembled to meet Arthur and Eliza Dann. Among the prominent Friends present were Robert C. Root and Albert K. Smiley. Several not Friends were in attendance. The officers of the association are: President, William C. Allen; secretary, Frank B. Matthews, a local minister; and treasurer, Kirke H. Field. At least twelve of the local pastors and ministers are among the members.

According to the Friends University Bulletin: "Prof. David F. Shirk, Topeka, Kan., an alumnus of the college, has made a contribution of stock in a first-class company amounting to $500 toward the endowment fund."

The same "Bulletin," in speaking of the meetings held at the university by Arthur and Eliza F. Dann, in Eleventh month, says: "Few evangelists have impressed us as these Friends have by their clear, positive and forceful teaching, free from extravagances and sensationalism. They did a good work for the students and community and we feel sure the results will be enduring."

* * *

At the request of the congregation at Union Springs, N. Y., Scipio Monthly Meeting has established for it a local business meeting. Ten have been received into membership in the past two months.

There has also been organized a Women's Foreign Missionary Society, consisting of fourteen members.

The meeting on First-day composed of the Oakwood Seminary students and teachers, with the members of the local congregation, is an interesting gathering.

Prof. Walter H. Wood, the principal of the Seminary, is the acting pastor.

The children of Samuel C. and Emma Stanley, on Twelfth month 18th, gathered from various quarters at the parental home in Long Beach, Cal., to enjoy a family reunion, and to celebrate their mother's birthday. They included Ezekiel Stanley, of Talamook, Oregon; Delphina Carter, Galena, Kansas; Elmina Pickett and Luella Haworth, Long Beach; Horace Stanley, Nathan Stanley, Newberg, Oregon; Mahlon Stanley, North Yakima, Wash. There were also present 11 of the numerous grandchildren of the venerable couple, and seven great-grandchildren. Two comfortable arm-chairs were added to their household furnishing as souvenirs of the happy event.

* * *

Under date of Eleventh month 3d, Edgar T. Hole sent from Mombasa, East Africa, to Lemuel Heston, of Long Beach, Cal., a dozen samples of what he terms the safety razor used by the Africans. This consists of a loop three inches long, made from the hairs of the cow's tail, terminating in braided handle about the dimensions of a darning needle. In using this, the sable barber, his subject prone upon the ground, twists the loop around a small patch of the beard, and extracts by the roots, continuing the process until the face is smooth. This Edgar T. Hole states, has probably been used for ages by the negroes. May this account in part for the fact that they have a thinner growth of beard than the Anglo-Saxon?

At Friends Meeting, Long Beach, Cal., recently on two succeeding First-days, a public reception was given to incoming members, the total accessions numbering twelve, one by request, two by letter from another denomination, and nine by certificate; among the later being Ira Carter and wife from Indiana.

A delightful occasion took place at the meeting house on the 30th ult. It was the meeting of the Christian Endeavor Union of the city, with a program including addresses, refreshments, and an industrial feature in providing numerous "comfort bags" for the sailors in San Pedro harbor. Each of these contained a Testament and a personal letter. The presence of some of the sailors added interest to the occasion.

The First Friends Meeting of Indianapolis is planning for a Quaker Round Table to begin its program soon. The series will consist of ten addresses on the following themes:

The Social, Political and Religious conditions out of which Quakerism sprang.

The Place Quakerism held among other great religious movements.

The leaders of the Quaker movement; their peculiar characteristics and service.

Great elements of strength and elements of weakness in the Society of Friends.

Permanent contribution of Friends to Religion.

Permanent contribution of Friends to Education.

Permanent contribution of Friends to Ethics.

Permanent contribution of Friends to Reform.

Permanent contribution of Friends to Literature.

The message of Friends for the world today.

The Friends at Fairmount, Ind., began a revival meeting New Year's day. The pastor is being ably assisted by a strong corps of personal workers. Virgil P. Brock, a student in the Academy, is leading the singing.

The Bible School observed Christmas in a threefold manner. The week preceding was spent in searching for the needy, aged, shut-ins, afflicted, etc., and bestowing gifts of groceries, clothing, and other useful articles where opportunity was found for doing good. On Christmas morning a special program was rendered by the "Old Folks," in which they told of Christmas in "ye olden time." Twenty-six of the older Friends were seated on the platform during the rendering of the program. In the evening the children and young people gave a program showing the missionary spirit of the Christ life. This consisted of exercises and the wearing of costumes showing the native life of several different nations and their need of, and desire for the Gospel.

One of the most flourishing country meetings in this country is located at Fairview, Ohio, about 11 miles from Wilmington. A new meeting house was dedicated there the 18th ult.

The forenoon service opened with singing by the intermediate scholars of the Bible School. President A. J. Brown, of Wilmington College, spoke at length of the educational advancement in the community within the past forty years. He was followed by Levi Mills, of Wilmington, who outlined some of the teachings the Church must perpetuate. The meeting closed with a solo by Mary Curtis.

At noon a basket dinner was served in the old meeting house, to which everybody in attendance was invited.

The afternoon session was opened with singing by the Bible School, Mary H. Terrell in charge. Howard Terrell then sang a solo, which was followed by a song by the Terrell Quartet. Ellison R. Purdy, pastor in the Wilmington meeting, then spoke earnestly of the supremacy of Christ.

The establishment of this meeting was accomplished more than forty years ago under the ministry of John Henry Douglas. The reading of a letter from him formed a most appropriate and interesting feature of the program.

The new meeting house, cost upwards of $8,000. Many Josephus Hoskins.

The new meeting house cost upwards of $8,000. Many of the furnishings were secured by the individual and the collective efforts of the young people. These were: Acetylene lighting apparatus, by Aleda Bernard; Rostrum furniture, by Wahnet Fisher; Pews, by Rebecca Fisher; Church bell, by Young People's Bible School class, and window, by W. C. T. U.

A thing that gave great satisfaction to the membership was the fact that the house was dedicated free of debt.

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I am writing this letter to you to second what President Robert L. Kelly said in his letter published in your issue of Twelfth month 22d.

President Kelly arrived at the conclusion that the greatest hindrance to Friends Colleges was not "from without, but from within." I desire to say that this is a plain and concise statement of the fact with reference to Penn College. We are not seriously handicapped by competition with our State institutions, and although their attitude towards denominational schools is not as liberal as it is in some other places, yet there is little to fear from this source.

In the State of Iowa, other denominational colleges have recently, or are at the present time, raising large endowments while Penn College has not been able to accomplish much in this line. We can but commend other denominations for their loyalty in support of their colleges, believing this loyalty to be prompted by true appreciation of the absolute necessity for a denomination to have a thriving, prosperous educational institution. If Friends do not measure up with the other denominations in this particular it will be to their great detriment and will gradually react upon the prosperity of every line of work carried on by the denomination. Friends need not expect much assistance from philanthropic sources until they have manifested a larger amount of interest themselves.

Believing that President Kelly's letter sets forth the situation as it really is and points out the exact thing which is hindering the progress of our educational institutions, I am writing this letter to say that his statements are at least accurate as they apply to Iowa Yearly Meeting.

I trust that Friends everywhere will see the seriousness of these conditions and will rally as one man to remedy them speedily.

DAVID M. EDWARDS.

Oskaloosa, Iowa, Twelfth month 26, 1910.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

The Committee on Reference and Counsel, representing the Boards and Societies of Foreign Missions in the United States and Canada, has received the following cable from an Inter-denominational Committee of Foreign Missionaries in Shanghai, China:

"Famine to a great extent over northern part of Kiang-su and An-hui provinces. Three million people affected. Chinese Government and people generously contributing relief. According to report of missionaries in the district affected, relief is insufficient. International Committee organized in Shanghai proposes that missionaries co-operate with generous Chinese to raise funds and in distribution. A million dollars is needed. Help must be carried on until May. Please communicate this to Missionary Societies and Church papers, urgently requesting contributions. Ferguson, Chairman."

Contributions may be sent to Jacob H. Schiff, treasurer of New York State Board of Red Cross Society, Metropolitan Building, New York City. Gifts sent in this way will be promptly transmitted to experienced missionaries in the famine region who will personally attend to their wise distribution.

In behalf of the Committee, ARTHUR J. BROWN, Chairman.
156 Fifth Ave., New York City.

On behalf of American Friends Board of Foreign Missions,

I suggest that a special offering be taken in all our meetings and forwarded at once, with a prayer that the Lord may turn the hearts of the people to Himself.—C. E. T.

FIRST QUARTER, LESSON III.

FIRST MONTH 15, 1911.

ASA'S GOOD REIGN IN JUDAH.

II CHRON. 15: 1-15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Be ye strong therefore, and let not your hands be weak: for your work shall be rewarded. II Chron. 15: 7.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, First month 9th. Asa's reign. I Kings 15: 9-24.
Third-day. Asa's zeal. II Chron. 14: 1-8; I Kings 15: 9-15.
Fourth-day. Foreign aid. II Chron. 16: 1-6.
Fifth-day. Asa's victory. II Chron. 14: 9-15.
Sixth-day. Prophecy of Azariah. II Chron. 15: 1-19.
Seventh-day. Asa reproved. II Chron. 16: 7-14.
First-day. Serving Jehovah. Psalms 16: 1-11.

Time.—919 (Curtis), 963 (Beecher) was the beginning of Asa's reign.

Place.—Kingdom of Judah. Asa's victory over the Ethiopians was at Mares-hah, about 25 miles south of Jerusalem.

Parallel passage.—I Kings 15: 12, 14.

The lesson is not found in Kings and the compiler of Chronicles has used some other sources. Asa's reign was a good one. The account of Asa as given in I Kings should be read (I Kings 15: 9-24). A comparison with the account in Chronicles is a good illustration of the difference between the point of view of the two compilers. In Kings, Asa is represented as wholly commendable; while in Chronicles which highly praised (indeed more than in Kings), because of his hiring the help of the King of Syria, he is troubled with wars, and apparently is seized with a disease of the feet, and dies in the forty-first year of his reign. (II Chron. 16: 1-14.)

Asa was the son of Abijah and grandson of Rehoboam. He was young, possibly about twenty-one when he came to the throne. He was troubled at the idolatry which had prevailed in his father's reign and in II Chron. 14: 1-5 we have a summary of the reforms he carried out. He set a good example to his people and there were ten years of peace. Then came a great conflict with the Ethiopians in which Asa won, through the help of the Lord, great victories and secured much spoil. After this the lesson begins.

1. "Azariah the son of Oded." He is not mentioned elsewhere.

2. "The Lord is with you," etc. Some read this in the past tense. They had gained a great victory because the Lord had been with them and they had trusted Him. So it is always. "If ye seek Him," etc. Words David used. See I Chron. 28: 9.

3-6. These verses are not very clear. Does "Israel" mean the northern kingdom, or is it an expression to cover Judah and Benjamin? Are the words those of the prophet or of the chronicles? From chapter 14: 2-5, it would seem that they could hardly refer to Asa's kingdom. Are they intended as a picture of Israel to influence Judah against such a condition of affairs? The four verses seem like a parenthesis.

7. "But be strong." This follows very aptly after verse two. The great victory was a clear testimony to what Jehovah would do for them if they followed Him and obeyed Him.

8. "Oded the prophet." It would seem as if somehow the words "Azariah the son of" had dropped out. (See verse one.) "Abominable things." Detestable things. The objects connected with idolatry. Compare II Kings 23: 24. "From the hill country of Ephraim." R. V. II Chron. 13: 19. "Renewed the altar." This may be a reference to some unrecorded desecration.

9. "Strangers." "Them that sojourned." R. V. There were doubtless many in the territory of the northern kingdom who were drawn to Judah on account of the purer worship, and the feeling that Jehovah was with Judah. Compare II Chron. 10: 17.

10. "Third month." The Feast of Weeks, known in the New Testament as Pentecost. This commemorated the giving of the Law, and so the entrance of the Israelites into a covenant with Jehovah. Why the fifteenth year of Asa should be the one mentioned is not recorded. Possibly the war had lasted four years. The war with Zerah began after ten years of peace (chap. 14: 1).

12. "Entered into a covenant." That is they bound themselves by an oath or solemn obligation. How this was sometimes done is recorded in Jeremiah (34: 18, 19). "With all their heart." Compare Deut. 4: 29: It was a public profession that they expected to obey Jehovah, serve Him, and do His will in all things. There is often great strength in placing oneself publicly on the side of the Lord. It often makes it easier to live rightly. It saves misunderstanding, it renders explanations unnecessary, and it increases one's influence. Besides this, it often saves from temptations, for when a man is known to be a Christian, he is not expected to do many things and is not solicited to do them. It enables one to have more openly and fully the support of fellow Christians.

13. This verse shows the difference between the old and the new dispensations. Can we imagine the Lord Jesus Christ doing such a thing? It was and is out of the Old Testament that religious persecutors got their warrant for persecution, and putting heretics to death. "Should be put to death." See Deut. 13: 6-10; 17: 2-7. "Small or great." Young or old.

14. "Shout." Compare I Chron. 15: 28. "Trumpets." A long straight metal horn with a flaring mouth. This was especially a sacred instrument. It is mentioned frequently in II Chron., also in Ezra (3: 10), Neh. (12: 35), and Numb. (10: 3-9). The trumpet used specially in war was curved. (Judg. 3: 27, etc.; I Sam. 13: 3, etc.). It was also used by priests (Josh. 6: 4; Lev. 25: 9). Here the word "cornet" probably means this kind of a horn. It was probably a ram's horn.

15. The result. Peace, rest and prosperity.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Whole hearted service is always rewarded; if in no other way by the personal joy of doing our best,

2. When man seeks God with the whole heart, He is always found of Him.

GOT IT.

GOT SOMETHING ELSE, TOO.

"I liked my coffee strong and I drank it strong," says a Pennsylvania woman, telling a good story, "and although I had headaches nearly every day I just would not believe there was any connection between the two. I had weak and heavy spells and palpitation of the heart, too, and although husband told me he thought it was coffee that made me so poorly, and did not drink it himself for he said it did not agree with him, yet I loved my coffee and thought I just couldn't do without it.

"One day a friend called at my home—that was a year ago. I spoke about how well she was looking and she said:

"Yes, and I feel well, too. It's because I am drinking Postum in place of ordinary coffee."

"I said, what is Postum?"

"Then she told me how it was a food-drink and how much better she felt since using it in place of coffee or tea, so I sent to the store and bought a package and when it was made according to directions it was so good I have never bought a pound of coffee since. I began to improve immediately.

"I cannot begin to tell how much better I feel since using Postum and leaving coffee alone. My health is better than it has been for years and I cannot say enough in praise of this delicious food drink."

Take away the destroyer and put a re-builder to work and Nature will do the rest. That's what you do when Postum takes coffee's place in your diet. "There's a Reason."

Things That Cannot Fail

In the bitter waves of woe,
Beaten and tossed about
By the sullen winds that blow
From the desolate shores of doubt,
Where the anchors that Faith has cast
Are dragging in the gale,
I am quietly holding fast
To the things that cannot fail.
I know that Right is Right,
That it is not good to lie;
That love is better than spite,
And a neighbor than a spy.
I know that passion needs
The leash of a sober mind;
I know that generous deeds
Some sure reward will find;
That the rulers must obey;
That the givers must increase;
That Duty lights the way
For the beautiful feet of Peace.
In the darkest hour of the year,
When the stars have all gone out,
That courage is better than fear,
That Faith is better than Doubt,
And fierce though the fiends may fight,
And long though the angels hide—
I know that Truth and Right
Have the Universe on their side;
And that somewhere beyond the stars
Is a love that is better than fate;
When the night unlocks her bars
I shall see Him—and I will wait!

TOPIC FOR FIRST MONTH 22, 1911.

THE LAW OF PREVAILING PRAYER.

MARK II: 20-25.

(Led by the Prayer Meeting Committee).

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, First month 16th. The element of faith. Jas.

Third-day. Of love. Mark II: 25.

Fourth-day. Of persistence. Luke 18: 1.

Fifth-day. Of obedience. I John 5: 14, 15.

Sixth-day. Of purity. John 9: 31.

Seventh-day. Of unselfishness. I Kings 3: 5-14.

Give one reason why some prayers are not answered.

Give one Bible instance of prevailing prayer.

What things do you need most to pray about?

The meeting where this topic is considered can be made strong and inspiring if the second suggestion noted above viz.: "Give one Bible instance of prevailing prayer," is taken as the keynote of the service. Let the leader ask a number of people to give a Bible illustration of "Prevailing Prayer." We suggest a study of the following passages as a few illustrations. Find others. Matt. 15: 21-28. Matt. 8: 5-13. II Cor. 12: 7-12. I Chron. 29: 18, 19; and II Chron. 1: 7-13. Neh. 1: 4-11 and 2: 1-6. Let these be given in the early part of the meeting in connection with the reading of the lesson or in place of it. It will open the way for testimonies about the answer of prayer in personal experience.

There is a generous portion of the saying of prayers in the lives of all and in a great many prayer-meetings. The amount of genuine praying on the part of genuine Christians is inconspicuously small. Prayer fundamentally is the conscious communion of the soul with the Father in Heaven. How seldom these occasions are only each soul can tell. How necessary today is the prayer first spoken by the disciples, "Lord, teach us to pray," is pertinent to all who find their minds wandering though their heads may be bowed, who think of the routine affairs of daily life, though with the congregation they reverently maintain prayer's attitude. Prayer's attitude and prayer's speech are relatively easy; prayer's reality and consequent power are among the attainments reached only by him who applies himself as persistently, as earnestly and as patiently as the artist practices with canvas and brush until the vision of his soul takes shape as the picture.

* * *

Prayers from faithless hearts are mere words. Prayers from unforgiving hearts are mockeries. Verses 24 and 25 of the lesson points with unmistakable clearness to faith and the forgiving spirit as the double doors which stand at the entrance of the hall of prayer.

* * *

The Master in Prayer. Prayer was a dynamic in the hands of Jesus, a weapon with which He dealt great blows for God. Note the following references regarding Jesus' prayer life, and trace its personal application to yourself.

1. Manifestations of the Father's presence and approval accompanied the act of prayer for Jesus. At the Baptism (Luke 3: 21, 22), at the Transfiguration (Luke 9: 28, 29), in the Temple (John 12: 27-30).

2. He prayed at the crisis moments of His life. At the Baptism (Luke 3: 21, 22). Before the choice of His apostles (Luke 6: 12, 13). Before the Crucifixion, in the upper room (John 17), in Gethsemane (Matt. 26: 36-46). On the cross (Luke 23: 34, Matt. 27: 46, Luke 23: 46).

3. He prayed at all times and about all things. The "line" was always "busy" which connected Him with His Father. Spiritual communion was the key-note of His life. (Mark 1: 35, Luke 5: 16, Luke 22: 31, 32; Mark 9: 28, 29; Luke 18: 1.) Jesus' life was a life of prevailing prayer.

Nolan Rice Best published (Revell Co.) in 1908 a book titled "Beyond the Natural Order." His first chapter on "Dynamics of Prayer" is so forceful and pertinent in its portrayal of the place of prayer in God's economy and human life that we submit herewith several quotations.

"Perchance prayer is not after all a petition to move the will of God; perchance it is a power put at the disposal of God wherewith to move the will of men. Perhaps praying is achievement."

"I am persuaded that the human soul in the act of passionate willing and wishing is a living dynamo. It is conscious with itself of the forthputting of energy; it suffers afterwards the weary reactions of toil."

"There is a conservation of spiritual energy, and the law of it is the law of prayer."

"An overmastering wish does not march sedately down the smooth-laid pavement of marble words; it runs and cries aloud. There are no hearts of real prayer beating in our bosoms when we stand and pray thus with ourselves: 'It would gratify us greatly, O Lord, if Thou wert pleased to bless everybody in general very agreeably.' Still as of ancient times the ground of Peniel is beaten hard with the feet of the wrestlers."

"Where sin is involved—either our own sin or others'—and stands in the way to be conquered, prayer passes from a breath of calm communion to an implement of pitched warfare, and we must use it for blows struck heavy and hard."

"When from our days of feverish, anxious effort we come home at night too tired to pray, we have doubtless defrauded God of a part of His resources on which He depended more than upon our active deeds."

"Abundance of prayer is a charter of health to any community."

"The person on whom the success of the church most radically depends is that member who has learned to pray—not as a dress-parade evolution in open meeting but with the inevitable outflowing of a soul that for great love of God and people cannot contain itself."

A WORD TO THE PRAYER MEETING COMMITTEE.

The prayer meeting committee has as its duty the choice of leaders for the weekly meetings. Their duty is by no means complete when these are chosen. They should be guided in the preparation for and direction of the meeting. They can encourage inexperienced young Christians to lead the service by sitting with them at the head of the meeting. The task of leading is a hard one for a novice. He needs help and encouragement and guidance. It is the privilege and opportunity of the prayer meeting committee to train the inexperienced in the art of leading, thus adding new power to the society, and strength to the developing faith of the immature Christian.

Onward and Upward.

Spirit, who makest all things new,
Thou ledest onward: we pursue
The heavenly march sublime.
'Neath thy renewing fire we glow,
And still from strength to strength we go,
From height to height we climb.

To thee we rise, in thee we rest;
We stay at home, we go in quest,
Still thou art our abode;
The rapture swells, the wonder grows,
As full on us new life still flows
From our unchanging God.—Selected.

Forward or Backward.

Some of our correspondents regret that we spend so much time and space on the history of things that are dead and past, over and done with. "Why not look forward instead of backward?" they say. "The deeds of today and tomorrow are certainly more important than the events of yesterday. Tell us whither we are going, rather than so much about whence we came!"

I agree fully with the main contention of that sentiment. We are not traveling backward, but forward, and what we need is light on the path ahead. Few things are more annoying than to hear people talk forever about their ancestors while they themselves do nothing worth talking about.

"They talk about their Pilgrim blood,
Their birthright high and holy!
A mountain stream that ends in mud
Methinks is melancholy!"

My whole concern is to go ahead, but to go ahead on the right track. I am always thinking of the way in front and am endeavoring to see the way we should take to reach a worthy goal. The true slogan is "forward," and not backward.

But how is one to shape the future except in the light of the past? How is one to discover the right track if he takes no bearings from the trail already traveled over? How can we make a worthy goal if we do not steer our course by great principles which have been already tested by men and women who have lived and died by them? To live only in the present is to lose the present. To look only forward means to go astray.

So far as I know, we have no leaders who are gifted with miraculous and infallible insight to tell us the way through the misty future. If we would go on wisely we must inform our minds with the lessons of history. There are few follies worse than the folly of breaking connection with history and cutting away the roots of life which are deep in the past. When this happens, then erratic and capricious movements occur in the place of steady normal progress. Whatever Friends think of "evolution" in biology, there is no question that the safe type of progress in history is the unfolding of the present out of the past, the evolution of the new out of the old, progressive advance from the gains of the past to the triumphs of the future.

No religious body can ever be powerful and influential unless its membership is kindled and fused with loyalty. But how is loyalty formed? It is formed through the inspiration of the heroes who have lived and died for the truth we are now called to follow. It is formed by the splendid exhibition of truth in the group behind us. Nobody dies for anything until he discovers that it is worth dying for, and nobody rises to any very great height of consecrated living until he is filled by the example of other consecrated lives. Orators, who want to produce loyalty and patriotism, by a kind of natural instinct talk about the heroes of '76 and the patriots who have practiced their loyalty. They turn back to find inspiration for forward movements.

Now just here we are weak today. Our membership has too little grasp of the great idea which created our Quaker movement and gave it its onward momentum. They are weak in their appreciation of what our heroes and martyrs died for. They lack deep-rooted loyalty to a definite spiritual mission in the world. They are loyal to their present meeting, loyal, it may be, to some temporary leader, but they do not feel a deep ground-swell loyalty to an unfolding cause, born in the past, but owing its future to our insight and faithfulness today.

This deeper thing is always before my eyes as I write. It is the creation of this far-reaching loyalty which concerns me, and when I go back to history I always do it to gain a clearer vision of the forward line of march.

A Wholesome Type of Revival.

Reports from revivals are so often couched in set phrases which reflect professional evangelism that it is refreshing to hear of an awakening with a genuinely Quaker flavor. In many respects the following is of this type. It comes from Peshastin, Wash., a little settlement at the head of the Wenatchee Valley in the foothills of the Cascade Mountains, one of the richest fruit-growing regions in the world, and is the major part of a letter from Claude and Katharine Baker:

"When we came here a year ago we found four Friends, and began to hold meetings First-day mornings. We also started a Bible school. A Christian Endeavor Society was organized in Eighth month, 1910, which was the beginning of our evening services. Charles Replogle, Everett, arrived in Peshastin Twelfth month 6th, intending to hold meetings only two or three evenings, but soon found the harvest was ready and the meetings could not be closed. His wife, Mary Replogle, soon followed to help in the work. The Gospel was presented, so clear and practical that the smallest child could understand. No altar calls were made, no coercive methods used. People were brought face to face with their responsibility, went to their homes, talked the matter over, made their decision and began at once to live an active Christian life. These gave every evidence of a changed heart—laying aside their old habits, tobacco included. Some were men of fifty or more. One man past sixty was converted the first meeting he attended. These were not cold and lukewarm Church members, commonly called "backsliders." Many were heads of families, men of the world, men among men, and one was the county commissioner from this district. Several children and young people evidenced a clear conversion. Entire families were reached. At the close of the meetings, Twelfth month 18th, the entire audience was melted together in love, and many that day decided for Christ—in all about 50. Thirty-five requested membership with Friends. Those who are babes in Christ need instruction, therefore we have opened a Bible study class on Fourth-day evenings. We hope this may be the means of strengthening many, of perpetuating the spirit that pervaded the meetings, and of reaching many more who are not fully convinced.

"We are grateful for the courtesy shown us by the Commercial Club, the Grange, and the Literary Society by suspending their meetings until our services were closed. The M. E. church, some distance in the country, also dismissed their services, giving us their support and co-operation. No collections were taken, but quietly the sum of $35 was raised for Charles Replogle at the close of the meetings by one of our merchants."

We wish more of our meetings could report the presence of a spirit that would move people "in their homes" to talk over the claims of Christ and begin "to live an active Christian life," and do it without calls "or the use of coercive methods." And we believe this condition will spread if we continue to pray and do our work in quietness and confidence. We were also impressed with the organizing of a Bible study class as a means of instructing the new converts and perpetuating the spirit of the meetings. If this course be pursued on a broad and intelligent basis, it can hardly fail to bring the deserved results.

The Supreme Bench Filled.

For the first time in nineteen months the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States was filled last week by the commissioning of Willis VanDevanter, Wyoming, and Joseph R. Lamar, Georgia. It was a quiet occasion, yet exceedingly interesting in many of its associations. It was the first time Chief Justice White had administered the oath of allegiance to an associate, and it marked the fifth commission to the Supreme bench issued by President Taft in one year. Not since the organization of the court, more than a century ago, has one President commissioned so many judges in so short a time. Only Washington has equalled the record. When the court was first constituted, five judges went on the bench with his commission. Jackson, Lincoln and Grant each named five members of the court, but their appointments were distributed through their entire terms.

The court is now entering upon a new epoch in its history. President Taft foresaw this some years ago and entertained high hopes of having a part in the work. He was reluctantly turned aside from his ambition to become a candidate for the Presidency. More than once in speaking of the matter he declared that the Supreme Court was approaching an opportunity not equalled in its entire history since the days of John Marshall. He felt keenly the importance of decisions on questions involving the attitude of the Government toward great corporations and corporate interests which will have a marked effect upon our national life and our institutions for a century at least. With this thought in mind he has made his appointments to the bench.

An Interesting Docket.

The court began its work immediately and has already rendered decisions in a number of important cases. The one of widest interest sustains the State laws in Oklahoma, Nebraska and Kansas, guaranteeing bank deposits. In these States provision is made for an association of banks, each guaranteeing the deposits in all the others. Membership in this association is voluntary in Oklahoma and Kansas, but in Nebraska all the State banks are compelled to belong. In this decision one of the chief planks in the national Democratic platform received the unanimous approval of the Supreme Court.

Of scarcely less interest is the decision declaring unconstitutional the "labor contract" law of Alabama, which made it impossible for a laborer to free himself from his employer as long as he was in debt to him. The Government contended that this law reduced hundreds of negroes to a state akin to peonage, and the court has sustained the contention.

Interesting as these cases are, they are overshadowed by others yet on hand. Before this writing reaches our readers the Tobacco Trust case will doubtless have been re-argued; and the action of the Government to dissolve the Standard Oil Company will be up for rehearing. Both are cases of the first magnitude and importance, since the issue which they involve affects the whole industrial system. The court showed its recognition of this fact by refusing to render a decision until the vacancies in its membership were filled. As soon as the arguments in the Standard Oil case have been heard the court will pass to an almost equally important suit relating to the scope of the Pure Food and Drug Act as applied to patent medicines; and, following this, the constitutionality of the Corporation Tax provision of the new tariff law will be thrashed out. These four cases are of the widest general interest, and the decisions in all of them are awaited with concern by a large number of people.

What Our New Governors Recommend.

If the initial pronouncements of our new Governors reflect the trend of public opinion, we may well conclude with Theodore Roosevelt, that "the fight for progressive popular government has merely begun." Direct primaries, the referendum and recall are the most popular reforms. Some wish Senators nominated, and others would have them elected by direct vote of the people. Dix, of New York; Plaisted, of Maine, and Osborne, of Michigan, favor the income tax amendment, and Bass, of New Hampshire, urges State regulation of public service corporations. The spirit of the general movement is admirably expressed in three short paragraphs by Governor Foss, of Massachusetts:

"We have reached a crisis in the affairs of this commonwealth. It is a crisis which our form of government is facing today not only in Massachusetts, but in every State of the Union. The people of all sections of the country have lost confidence in many of their public servants. The dictatorship by political bosses and by representatives of special interests is hotly resented, for these men desire to control public servants and to direct legislation to their own ends.

"This usurpation of power can only be ended by the people taking into their own hands the direction and control of their government. The first step is to abolish the boss and all his agencies; the caucus, the nominating convention and all political machinery which intervenes between the people and their government. All candidates for public office, without exception, must be chosen by the people through the direct primary. To the direct primary must be joined the power of recall, so that any public servant who proves recreant to his trust may be immediately dismissed.

"Important as these steps are, it is of far greater importance that the people keep their power over legislation through the initiative and the referendum. Under the conditions which exist today, as I see them, these are the only true safeguards of representative government."

A New System of Banking.

After several months of preparation, postal savings banks were opened the 3d inst. The number was limited to one in each State, since the appropriation for the work was small, and the Government thought it safer to experiment before extending the venture. Practically all of the banks reported some business on the first day; and in several cases a number of persons deposited $100 each, the maximum amount for a single depositor in one month. Briefly the plan is as follows:

Any person, ten years of age or over, may deposit in the postal savings bank of their home town any sum from $1 to $100, which is the limit of deposit for any one person in any one month. In the event that they do not desire or are not able to deposit $1 or more, they may purchase postal savings bank stamps for 10 cents, ten of which, or stamps supplemented by sufficient cash, will enable them to open an account with the required initial deposit of $1. Depositors will receive interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum. All deposits are withdrawable upon demand, together with accrued interest. When the deposits reach the sums of $20, $40, $60, $80, $100 and multiples thereof up to $500, they may be exchanged upon request, for United States bonds of like denomination which shall bear interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually and be redeemable at the Treasury of the United States one year from the date of their issue and payable twenty years from such date, both principal and interest being payable in United States gold coin. These bonds are exempt from taxes or duties of any kind whatsoever.

The trustees of the postal savings bank system of the United States are required by law to have the deposits beyond a reasonable working balance, deposited in solvent banks, where it shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 2¼ per cent.

Isaac and Rebekah.

BY ELBERT RUSSELL.

The characters and stories of the Old Testament are especially valuable for purposes of instruction because of their simplicity. They enable us to see virtues and vices, one at a time, working themselves out to their natural consequences. A map which shows all the political and physical features of a country may defeat its own end, because the eye fails to single out and hold to any one thing among the many details. Likewise in the study of moral and spiritual truths the very perfection of the character of Jesus makes it difficult to get a vital grasp of any one of His manifold excellencies. The purpose of instruction is often better served by a simple outline map exhibiting but one feature of a country; and we may learn the elements of a moral and spiritual life more clearly by beginning with some characters from the Old Testament, such as Isaac and Rebekah.

These two characters make no positive addition to the religion of the Old Testament. As they stand in the stories of Genesis, their significance lies in their passing on to other generations the ideals and achievements of Abraham. It is characteristic that Isaac never left the land of his father's sojournings, that he kept his father's flocks, pitched his tent where Abraham had built his altars, unstopped the wells which his father digged, and took his bride to his mother's tent. The pair are essentially irreligious. This is, at first, surprising, since one was Abraham's son according to divine promise, and the other was sent for to preserve the religious purity of Isaac's home from the danger of a heathen alliance. Yet religion is essentially a matter of free choice. Virtue cannot be inherited. Parents may throw religious influences around a child, but he becomes religious only when he freely assumes a right relation to God. This the child is not likely to do if he has been made the victim of his parents' religion. Isaac's first years were spent in his mother's tent, where he came under the influence of her jealousy, harshness and skeptical laughter. Twice his father violated his freedom in the name of religion. When we read the story of Abraham's offering of Isaac, we are apt to think only of the devotion to God which led Abraham not to withhold from Him even his only son. But what impression did Isaac get of his father's God, as he lay bound upon the altar under the uplifted knife? Is it any wonder that the God of Abraham appears in the narrative as the "Fear" of Isaac. Irreligious or passively religious children are apt to be bred in households where individuality is violated in religion's name, or where, as in the case of Robert Ingersoll, the harsh terror of the Lord is more manifest than His love. Again, Isaac was not allowed to choose his wife. If marriage be more than a social convenience or a physical union, if it have spiritual worth or meaning, it must be the result of personal choice prompted by love. But Abraham treated Isaac as a man of destiny, not allowed to leave his country in search of a wife, nor to choose one from the women of the land whom he knew or might know.

In Rebekah's life we find a strange combination of fate and freedom. As a girl she had been given the almost unrestricted freedom of the field as she ranged desert and hills with her flocks as a shepherdess. She had had little of the discipline which comes from family life or from association with her fellows or from domestic duty and training. But when a stranger came one evening to her father's house with a strange story of Abraham's will and of providential guidance to Rebekah, her people, with half-superstitious fatalism, say, "The thing proceedeth from Jehovah," and let her go with him. There is no testing of the man's story to see if it be true; no night of prayer to learn if it be the will of God. The girl herself is not asked if she be willing to go. She is suddenly snatched from her girlhood freedom by superstitious destiny. The next day, when Abraham's servant insists on going at once, her freedom is restored and she is asked to decide at once whether she will go now or a few days later. There is no insistence that she remain until she has been trained for her new duties, no waiting until experience will enable her to make an intelligent decision. Freedom without training is almost as fatal to successful living and true religion as involuntary servitude or destiny without choice. It is no wonder that Isaac and Rebekah are essentially irreligious.

The story of the wooing of Rebekah as it stands in the twenty-fourth chapter of Genesis is one of the most remarkable romances in literature. Who that has read can forget how the loyal and devout servant of Abraham made his camels to kneel by the well outside the Eastern village; how he prayed that the maiden who should first refresh him and his camels from her pitcher might be the appointed wife for his master's son; how Rebekah came and filled his heart with thanksgiving as she fulfilled the sign he had given; how he put the rings upon her hands and nose, and was welcomed to her father's house; how he dazzled them with gold and fine raiment, and would not eat until he had told them the story of Abraham's prosperity in the distant land, and made known his errand, and silenced their protests with his account of the Lord's leading? There was feasting that night, and in the morning the impatient servant claimed Rebekah, that he might return at once. She was asked if she would go at once, and under the spell of the romantic story, with the impulsive love of adventure upon her, she answered, "I will go." Meantime Isaac's life was lonely since his mother's death, and he was wont to walk the fields and meditate at eventide. One evening, as he walked thus, he lifted up his eyes, and behold there are camels coming!—the camels that bore the beautiful Rebekah to be his bride. She drew her veil as she alighted. It was an auspicious hour that she came into his life, for his days were empty and his heart was hungry. "And the servant told Isaac all the things that he had done. And Isaac brought her into his mother Sarah's tent, and took Rebekah and she became his wife; and he loved her; and Isaac was comforted after his mother's death."

It is a beautiful idyl, but we cannot help misgivings as we follow the story to its end and note that they entered Sarah's tent without pausing to sacrifice at Abraham's altar. Love without sacrifice is apt to be sordid or selfish, or at best a fleeting romance. Rebekah had cost Isaac nothing. He had not wooed her by manly prowess nor won her by patient love. He had given up nought in order to have her. He had not labored for her as Jacob did for Rachel. She was not his choice from among a host of fair women, nor was their love the fruit of his travail of soul. She had come to him in the hour of grief's loneliness, when hearts are not critical. She was not the answer to his prayers and was not received as God's gift. He had not sought her in order to carry out God's will through the family of Abraham, in order to be a blessing to the world.

Rebekah had chosen Isaac without knowledge of his personal character, acting on a sudden impulse. Dazzled by a display of gay clothing and jewels, excited by the servant's story of Abraham's wealth, flattered by being sought so far as the wife of the great sheik's son, her mind filled with romantic pictures of luxurious life in the far country, her adventurous heart had made its choice. Her mind was occupied with the advantages rather than the duties of Isaac's wife. She had felt no awe at being thus chosen; she had not seen the hand of God in her destiny.

Naturally, then, there was no surrender of their united hearts to God in the hour when they gave themselves to each other; no consecration to duty as they gave themselves to each other's love. Perhaps they would have felt it incongruous to think of worship at Abraham's altar on the way to Sarah's tent; but, if so, it would have been evidence that their love lacked a true spiritual basis, and was sensual and sordid. There is no truer sign of a deep and lasting union than religious feeling in lovers. It is safe to prophesy peace and abiding happiness for the couple who, in the hour when they plight their troth, turn, while the kiss of betrothal is still warm upon their lips, to thank God for love's blessings and to ask of Him strength for love's duties.

It is, therefore, inevitable that we have misgivings about the end of the beautiful romance of Isaac and Rebekah when we see them hasten past Abraham's altar on their way to the nuptial tent. Religion and love lie so near each other in the heart that the wonder of the gift of a woman's heart inevitably moves a true man to self-examination to see if he be worthy of so great a boon; to prayer, for strength sufficient for love's duties, for strength equal to his wife's trust. Did Rebekah never wonder whether she were worthy to be the mother of the "chosen people?" Whether she could train the heirs of Abraham to Abraham's faith? Had she the strength, after the glamor of romantic adventure had faded from her life, to take up its prosaic round of duty and bear a wife's burdens uncomplainingly? Did the two never pause to ask if they were worthy of each other? To ask God whether they were such as could rear a family likely to prove a blessing to all the families of the earth? And did self-distrust never throw them on their knees to seek from God wisdom and help for their task? What can come of married life when people enter it thinking only of wealth or ease? When, forgetful of duty, responsibility and the high calling of God under the spell of sensual pleasure, they hasten, like Isaac and Rebekah, past the altar of God on the way to Sarah's tent!

The result was, as might be anticipated, the spoiling of a beautiful idyl. The romance ended in vulgarity. Their fleeting sentiment vanished as life began to unfold itself in the prosaic round of commonplace duty and the novelty of wedded life wore off. Youthful passions cooled and the charms of youth faded. Generous impulse was succeeded by sordid calculation, and the story ends in a picture of querulous old age and a divided family. Isaac's feeble sensuality preferred Esau, who fed him his favorite venison. Rebekah sided with the quiet Jacob, who loved to sit in his mother's tent and kept the table supplied from his garden. As so often happens, the small vices of the parents were exaggerated in the children. Isaac's fondness for food—he could not give his blessing to Esau until he tasted his venison—shows in Esau's sale of his spiritual birthright in order to get a mess of scup. The father's passive living upon Abraham's achievements reappears in Jacob's early lack of vigorous manhood. Rebekah's impulsiveness, that led her to go to marry a stranger on twelve hours' notice, is seen exaggerated in Esau's impatient cry that he will die if he does not get his dinner at once. And her lesson to Jacob in deceiving his blind father and cheating his brother bore fruit in Jacob's bargaining, lying and cheating all he met, until at the Jabbok he has to have both his name and character changed before he was fit to be the father and trainer of the people of God. Such is the home that resulted from an irreligious union—a home where age and fatherhood have no reverence, where appetite and impulse have no restraint, blindness no pity and priority of birth no rights; where love brings no tenderness and religion no self-sacrifice. No wonder it breaks up with Esau's vain repentance and profane threat of vengeance, and with Jacob a fugitive from his brother's wrath.

The story is not an exception, but illustrates unfailing spiritual law. Where love does not mean duty and sacrifice, unless it asks and delights to serve rather than to be ministered to, it may be beautiful in its first appearance, but will be sordid, quarrelsome, profane in the end. Often marriage fails of its true goal because it is entered into only for house, position, wealth or passion, but without thought of its demands and duties, so that when these appear, they are unwelcome and they are avoided or lead to complaining, to misunderstanding or to separation. Men and women must go to the marriage altar as to a consecration to the priesthood of God, as to a sacrament of divine communion, if youthful romance is to grow into abiding blessedness, love and peace.

II. Features of Long Beach.

The ocean laves no finer strand than the four miles of wave-washed boulevard that lies at the foot of the city of Long Beach, California, 20 miles south of Los Angeles. Tourists visit it constantly, and thither two railways and a four-track electric line bring multitudes from the interior when the summer sun grows fervent. But the salt air and ocean dip are not the only features of interest here. Looking northward, the mountains, 35 miles distant, rise in the vista of the broad, clean avenues that traverse the 12 square miles of the city. Bold Point Firmin reaches out into the sea 10 miles westward, while 20 miles southward you descry the outline of Santa Catalina, one of the famous island resorts of the world.

It goes without saying that the climate is attractive, for while the cooler air of evening commands the use of wraps and the gas grate, I pen these lines on the shortest day of the year, with blooming flowers and rapidly growing vegetables in view and with the sun dispensing the warmth of an Eastern May day.

Add to these features the moral sentiment that has banished the saloon and made this city the Mecca of the Chautauquas and Church conferences of the great Southwest, and you have light on its phenomenal growth in 10 years from a city of 2,250 to 17,809 souls, a gain of 603.3 per cent., in this ratio of increase outstripping every city on the continent.

Notable features of the city are: A $1,000,000 tourist hotel, a ship-building plant that is launching coasting steamers, a pleasure pier of magnificent proportions, and the largest electric generating plant in the United States, costing $1,000,000.

III. Sketch of a Meeting in a Seaside City.

At this strategic point Friends have a meeting of about 275 members, which had its beginning in Second month, 1888. At this date, Amos Walton, Joseph Allen and others, having felt a concern for the establishing of a meeting, talked of it briefly when gathered at the Ocean House in honor of Albert Cox and wife on their return to Kansas. The next day a Bible school was organized in rooms occupied by Amos Walton and wife, in the Ocean house. Soon following, the Friends gathered on Sabbath morning in the Congregational church, their first meeting for worship in Long Branch. Mary M. Brown, then of El Modena, preached, Joseph Allen and wife and Amos Walton and wife occupying seats on the platform. The remainder of the little audience that took in this first sermon were James and Ruth Wilson, Wm. Brown, John S. and Clemma Wilson, Eli and Mary Wilson, Zoe and Linnie Osborn, Wm. Penn Wilson, and Chas. Lewis and wife.

The following Sabbath, Elwood Siler gave the Gospel message. Mary M. Brown, recognized as pastor, continued the work. For nearly a year the infant meeting was an itinerant, being held in the schoolhouse betimes, once at Anna Stratton's, three times at James Wilson's, for quite a period in the upstairs of a vacant residence belonging to Joseph Allen, and finally settling in a cheaply built hall on East First Street, some time in 1889.

About this time Jeremiah A. Grinnell entered the work as pastor, and strongly urged the building of a meeting-house. Jane M. Grinnell favorably offered two lots at First Street and American Avenue, having a frontage of 25 feet each. These were leased, and bought later, one for $250 and the other for an annuity of $25 to be paid to Jane M. Grinnell during her lifetime, considerations that provoke a smile in the light of today, as these small lots are now worth $10,000 each. Here a small building, which was later enlarged, was erected in the spring of 1890. In the period following, the meeting received substantial additions in the coming of Ira G. Carter, Enos Morgan, John Wilson and others. In Sixth month, 1892, the congregation was organized into a monthly meeting, with 118 charter members.

WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF

Those serving the meeting later as pastors were: Nathan Baldwin, Charles Jessup, W. E. Mills, Mary M. Brown a second term, Levi Gregory, John Henry Douglas, David J. Lewis and Thomas Armstrong. At this stage the church property was sold, and a larger building, the one now used, was erected about three blocks northward. The electric car barns, with their noise, were soon located beside it, necessitating the moving of the building to its present location. Pastors following those named were Lindley A. Wells, R. Esther Smith, Andrew F. Mitchell, and Charles E. Hiatt now in charge.

Charles E. Hiatt graduated from the biblical department of Earlham College in 1893, and is well known by his successful work as pastor at Centerville, Winchester, Muncie and Marion, Indiana. He was not originally a Friend, and in boyhood was schooled in the quite diverse views of Alexander Campbell. Converted in a Quaker revival at Amboy, Ind., he joined the Friends, and through a prayerful study of Scripture and the sacrifice of many predilections, he accepted, under profound conviction, their interpretation of Gospel truth as to typical rites and true spiritual worship, a fact reflected in the simplicity and informality of his work under the leading of the Holy Spirit. It was this attitude that recently gave me opportunity to hear 36 testimonies in a Long Beach meeting at a stage when the announcement of the text would ordinarily be expected.

This meeting has as representatives in the missionary field, Wilson and Lucy Cox, and James and Eva Geary in Alaska, and Cora Wildman in Guatemala. In the faculty of the city schools, Profs. Wm. Huff and Gurney Hadley. In city affairs, Geo. Blount, overseer of highways; Alfred Woodard, inspector of paving; F. C. McCown, desk sergeant in police department. In the business calendar, J. Gurney Coy, W. Clifford Smith and James B. Riddick.

The Christian Endeavor here was organized twenty years ago, with Wm. Frazier and wife, Julius Pearson and wife and Hugo Shildie as the total membership. Hugo Shildie's devotion to his Master's cause, and his death soon after arriving on African soil as a missionary, are tender memories with the older members of this meeting.

Missionary Department

What Charles Spann Found in Our African Mission.

We are here at last, and are well pleased with our new location. In fact, we were surprised to see the amount of work that had been accomplished in so short a time with such a limited amount of help. It is hard to understand the difficulties under which the work has been done unless one can personally visit the field.

I have felt that I should visit each of the stations and carefully look into their work as far as possible in order to write the board intelligently. I have not only done this, but have spent several days in the forest in order to find out something about the timber, its quality, quantity, size, etc. In looking it over I find a large number of valuable trees too large for this mill. We cannot afford to waste so much of the lumber in trying to work it up with our present equipment. Timber will soon be a scarce thing in this section of Africa. In comparing it with that in America, and considering the effects of the weather upon it, I find this has indication of being better in quality. In clearing for garden plots the natives burn the forests, thus destroying valuable timber.

In looking over the machinery I find that there is nothing here that is not needed and that cannot be used to good advantage on the field. We are very glad indeed that the board has allowed us a new sawmill, shingle machine, planer, etc. They are very much needed, and the sooner they are installed, the more they will save in valuable material and expenditure of cash on the part of the board. The shingle machine promises to be especially profitable. It will save one-half of the lumber formerly used, and will make much better shingles, so that they will last longer. Then, too, logs which cannot be used elsewhere can be made into shingles with a machine.

The planer which the board allowed will also be a great thing for the mission. The one which is used here is not intended for heavy planing, and would soon be spoiled in using it for that purpose. It is, however, a valuable machine with which to get out flooring, moulding, ceiling, casing, etc., which are much needed in our buildings. The new planer should not be less than a 24-inch machine, as an 18-inch would have to be used to its capacity most of the time, which would make it short-lived; and we often need wider boards.

I have traveled many miles over the native paths and through the jungles, and am in a position to appreciate a good cart road such as the one from Kaimosi to Kisumu. While it required a great deal of work to make this road, it is, without doubt, labor well invested. When we consider the amount of traffic on it and the distance it covers, we cannot but consider it a great advantage to the F. A. I. M. from a financial point of view. It is also a great saving of time and energy on the part of our missionaries. There has been very little labor put in on the road to Kisumu this year, yet it is in very good condition, and it is possible to transport to and from Kisumu with carts very easily. With a little work and the changing of a few grades, one could easily run an automobile over it. The roads here do not require the same attention that they do in America.

The prospect for cotton here at present is very encouraging. We have compared the cotton grown at Kaimosi with cotton shipped here from Uganda, and find that our cotton has a fiber equal in length, strength and color to the Uganda cotton. Our cotton is a hardy plant, and we expect to develop it as fast as possible, as we can get a good market at Kisumu for all our product if we want to sell. There is a company there that gins and bales cotton for shipment. Arthur Chilson took a sample of our cotton to Kisumu to be examined by the cotton exporters there, and they say it is a very fine quality of Egyptian cotton and is worth almost one-third more on the market than the American. They advised us to put the whole place in cotton.

In looking over the agricultural work here I find there is a good chance to develop our work along that line in a way that will be of great advantage to the natives and bring in good returns to the mission financially. Bananas and pineapples, vegetables and grain do well here if given the proper attention. It will, however, require some one who is able to devote his entire time to this department. With such a helper the natives can be trained to properly till their soil and better their conditions of living, and we find them at present very anxious to learn.

The industrial department of the F. A. I. M. has proven a great blessing to the work and, instead of hampering it, has been the means of giving us prestige with the government and far more influence with the natives. It has increased our school and Sabbath service attendance, beside bringing a large number of families into immediate reach of the station. The fact that at Kaimosi married men have been employed and their families encouraged to come and live here has been a blessing to the work. It is indeed surprising to see how much these men can now be trusted. They seem to take a great interest in the work, school and services here. There are now about 30 families on the station, and others are applying for work, desiring to leave off their heathen customs and come and obey the rules of the station.

One of the remarkable things in connection with the work of the F. A. I. M. is its great sphere of influence both with the government and with the chiefs and natives. While the government has been somewhat disappointed in our work on account of our apparent backwardness, yet when spheres of influence were assigned recently to the various missions, we received a very large scope of territory which included a large number of natives, and which we will be unable to reach for some time unless others are sent to the field. The natives are learning to know that they have friends in the missionaries and that all matters of dispute which the chiefs are unable to settle can be justly settled at the mission. Many also come to the mission for advice before entering into business deals.

The school here, in answer to prayer, has increased to such an extent that it is now necessary to prohibit others from coming. We thought that if the natives were compelled to buy cloth to wear to school that this would discourage them, but they brought beans for cloth till all our supply was gone, and still they come. It is hard to refuse these people schooling. We hope that God may make it possible for us to accommodate more as time goes on.

We were very much impressed as we saw the great crowds of natives come dancing in to Sabbath service, some from a distance of ten miles or more. God is surely working upon these darkened souls. They seem so attentive while listening to the message. O, how we need to pray that the eyes of their understanding may be opened, that they may be able to accept the Gospel and know what it is to be redeemed from sin!

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

The monthly meeting at Earlham, Ind., has officially decided to call its proposed new building the "Allen Jay Memorial."

* * *

John M. Watson sends us a word of encouragement from Dartmouth, Mass., and adds, "I am expecting to spend a few months in New England Yearly Meeting."

* * *

Our friend John B. Garrett, Rosemont, Pa., informs us that there are 37 ministers in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, instead of 33 as reported in our census figures, made up from the list at Friends Institute.

* * *

Lewis I. Hadley, late of East Whittier, who for quite a period has been serving as pastor of the Bethel meeting, in the vicinity of Long Beach, has lately changed his residence to that place, as a means of facilitating his work.

* * *

In a recent letter from Gibara, Cuba, Sylvester Jones, says: "The work here is progressing. We have a number of young people in training classes preparing for Bible school work. The out stations in charge of a native assistant are doing good work. We have a large field here and a great opportunity."

* * *

Evangelistic services began at El Modena, Cal., the 4th ult. and closed the 19th ult. W. Mahlon Perry, of Whittier, assisted the pastor, H. M. Moore. The Gospel was preached in a plain, practical and convincing manner. About 18 professed conversion, others were established in the faith and the church was greatly helped and strengthened.

Arthur Jones, pastor in the meeting at Winthrop Center, Maine, has presented to the members of his congregation a unique calendar of his own designing. On the calendar is a fine picture of the meeting-house, an excellent motto, and all the regular meetings of the church for the year. Hidden behind this is a picture of the pastor.

Richard R. Newby, superintendent of the evangelistic work in New York Yearly Meeting visited Smyrna Monthly Meeting, Upperville, N. Y., the 18th ult., and found the "way opened" to continue there a few days with gratifying results. Nine requests for active and seven for associate membership were received, and some of the Friends were aroused to a more active interest in church work. The preaching was logical, convincing and persuasive and manifestly accompanied by the presence and power of the Spirit.

A young organization of the Friends Church at Long Beach, Cal., that is full of promise is the Ladies' Aid Society, enrolling about 20 members. Its purpose is to promote social freedom and to assist the church financially. It has in view the construction of a basement under the church building that shall serve as a dining and social room, estimated to cost $800, toward which they have $80, as a nucleus. The officers of the organization are: Anna J. Bruce, president; Gertrude Wilson, secretary; Maud Keippe, treasurer.

The Weekly Bulletin of the Friends Meeting, Wilmington, Ohio, for First month 1st, contains a beautiful New Year Greeting from the pastor, Ellison R. Purdy, the opening paragraph of which reads as follows: "A Happy New Year—with these words we salute our fellow pilgrims who are entering a strange, new country, passing today through the sunrise gate. Pioneers will find great values in the new country. There is the virgin soil of unbroken days, and we may stake our claims to the untouched mines of time in the ore. Ours will be the explorer's right, the discoverer's title."

A beautiful feature of Christmas at Whittier, Cal., is the Sunrise Prayer Meeting, which for eighteen years, without omission, has assembled at the Friends meeting-house at the call of the bell. At the Christmas just passed the clear tones of a cornet, played by E. J. Frazier in the belfry, rang out "Joy to the World" on the still morning air, and as the sound died away the worshippers within caught up the strain as the first exercise of the occasion. The meeting was started at the suggestion of Jonathan Bailey, an aged pioneer of Whittier, and he unfailingly attended it until called home some years ago. Lienna Williams is secretary of the meeting, and Dr. A. H. Jessup led the exercises at the last session.

A most useful organization connected with the Friends Church at Pasadena, Cal., is the Ladies' Aid Society, the purpose of which is to promote the interest of the church in a social and material way. They have a cozily furnished room in connection with the church building, where needlework keeps time to social converse through many happy hours. A recent contribution of the society was eight comforters for the Japanese home, under care of the church, which home the ladies also furnished throughout some time ago. They also furnished a room in the girls new cottage at Whittier College. The officers of the society are: Edna J. Roberts, president; Mary E. Reynolds; vice-president; Rhoda M. Taber, secretary; Rose McMillan, treasurer.

David Harold, Indianapolis, Ind., recently conducted a series of evangelistic meetings at the Third Friends Meeting in that city. His preaching was very effective, and many were moved to make a definite stand for Christ. Some have applied for membership with Friends.

This meeting is situated among saloons, and in a part of the city mostly inhabited by foreigners. None of the members own their own homes. Many who became members soon moved to other parts of the city or go elsewhere and are lost to the meeting, hence the work is of a missionary nature. Many who have strayed from the paths of virtue and uprightness are converted in this meeting and go out to live a "new life." Josiah Pennington is the pastor.

Following the opening of the public school in Ninth month, a need for a revival was felt at Cranes Creek, N. C. John E. Henly, Frank and Myra Long were led there in Eleventh month and the Lord's work was seen in the conversion of 12 and the reclaiming of 13 persons.

A prayer meeting was held on Fifth-day evening each week in addition to the regular Bible school and meeting on First-day morning. Herbert W. Reynolds is superintendent of the school and sits at the head of the meeting. Fanny O. Reynolds has charge of the intermediate department of the Bible school.

Friends at High Falls and Prosperity, N. C., are making arrangements to secure Herbert W. Reynolds as their pastor for the coming year.

There has been a renewal of work at Newmark, midway between Whittier and Los Angeles, Cal., where so few Friends were left on account of removal, that the meeting and Bible School became very irregular and a proposition was sent up to the quarterly meeting to discontinue the monthly meeting. At this juncture Elmer J. Allen, of John Horney's large Bible school class at Whittier, offered assistance and the quarterly meeting deferred action. In co-operation with the members of the class and others, a series of meetings was held at Newmark, by H. Edwin McGrew, resulting in six conversions and three renewals. Friends there, were so much encouraged, that they held a session of the monthly meeting, Twelfth month 14th, at which four new members were received. The Bible school was also re-organized, with 25 members enrolled. Chas. H. Hamburg was chosen superintendent; Ezekiel Gist, assistant superintendent, and [Mrs.] Gist, secretary.

The following poetic and loving greeting, tastefully mounted, was given out on Christmas morning by H. Edwin McGrew to each household of the large Friends meeting, which he serves as pastor at Whittier, Cal. It seems so full of the true holiday spirit that we reprint it:

"With laughter and with song, this be my day.

"A Prayer that brings God to my side and me to His.

"Then like my Lord, may I find Toil among the world's needy, cheered by words of sages, songs of birds and shouts of little children.

"Then may I have Refreshment under a vine of my own planting, and by fragrant flowers of my own sowing.

"Then Psalm and Praise with those I love in the cool, soft twilight.

"Then God's sweet gift of Sleep for a waking in a brighter morning.

"This be my day, my life; May it be thine."

The Friends Monthly Meeting of Los Angeles, Cal., which is held on the second Fourth-day evening of each month, has introduced a social feature in the way of a dinner, which is served in the meeting-house preceding the session. The Christian Endeavor gave the initial repast, and other departments of the church will take their turn in the service.

In the Bible school of this meeting, of which Arthur Brown is superintendent, the making of birthday contributions to the missionary cause, counted in pennies corresponding to the years of the giver, has grown to be quite a feature, and this lately took an interesting turn at the suggestion of Wilfred Rowntree, that the Christmas offering should be in honor of the birth of the Babe of Bethlehem, and that the pennies should reach the number of the years of the Christian era, 1910. The idea was heartily endorsed, and on Christmas morning there was a shower of pennies that exceeded all expectation, the total amounting to $24.06. One woman, not a member with Friends, whose children attend the school, brought as her family's contribution an envelope full of pennies which they had been saving for some good cause, amounting to several dollars. Wilfred Rowntree served as the money changer of the day, having brought an abundant supply of bright pennies in bank packages to reduce the contributions to the proper denominations.

A most enjoyable event in the way of a public welcome to Charles E. Hiatt, the new pastor at Long Beach, Cal., and a farewell tribute to Andrew F. Mitchell, retiring pastor, was recently witnessed at the meeting-house in that city. Besides the local membership and attenders of the meeting, there were present, President Thomas Newlin, H. Edwin McGrew, Dr. J. J. Mills and Thomas Armstrong of Whittier; Sylvester Newlin and William H. Coffin, Pasadena; Wallace E. Gill, Los Angeles, and Dr. Geo. M. Laehigh, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Indianapolis. H. Edwin McGrew led in prayer, and others made felicitous addresses bearing on the work of Pastors Hiatt and Mitchell in the Seaside City, to which those receiving the tribute happily responded. Prof. Wm. Huff, principal of the Carroll Park School, presided over the exercises. The meeting-house was beautifully decorated for the occasion and the serving of refreshments rounded out an evening of rare enjoyment.

Dr. Fred A. Gray and wife, well-known Friends, Winchester, Ind., who have been sojourning at different points on the Pacific Coast, from Central America to Alaska, were Christmas guests of Charles E. Hiatt and family, Long Beach, Cal. The event revived pleasant memories, as the two households had for several years joined in celebrating Christmas at their former homes in the Hoosier State. Dr. C. F. Gray, Winchester, father of Fred A. Gray, expects to join his son soon at Long Beach.

Several protests have been received at this office against the use of the word Quaker. C. F. Morris, Bloomington, Ind., however, does not share this concern. In speaking of THE AMERICAN FRIEND and The British Friend, he says: "The general reader, as a rule, will pick them up supposing them true to name. One a friend to the American people, the other a friend to the British people. Quite likely he has never heard of a religious organization called Friends, since there never has been anything accomplished under that name to distinguish it, and give it general and universal renown. It is the name Quaker, around which gathers all the enthusiasm for victories won, and those in process of accomplishment. It is quite immaterial now as to how that name came into use, or who originated it, or for what purpose; it is today our only well-known name and is not used with any thought of derision at all. That name carries with it readily all that the Church has ever stood for. The adoption of that name would greatly relieve our writers of the burden of carrying three or four names, as we now see this confusion. The Friends, The Society of Friends, The Friends Church, and the Quakers, all in one production, in fact we have to use the terms Quaker and Quakerism occasionally for there is no such word as Friendism that I can find. I hope therefore there will be no effort at all to get away from our well-known and significant name and that in process of time it will be adopted by the Church at large."

FIRST QUARTER, LESSON IV.

FIRST MONTH 22, 1911.

OMRI AND AHAB LEAD ISRAEL INTO GREATER SIN.

I KINGS 16: 15-33.

For Special Study, Verses 23-33.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Righteousness exalteth a nation: but sin is a reproach to any people. Prov. 14: 34.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, First month 16th. Zimri defeated. I Kings 16: 8-20.

Third-day. House of Omri. I Kings 16: 21-28.

Fourth-day. Ahab's corrupting example. I Kings 16: 29-33.

Fifth-day. Statutes of Omri. Mic. 6: 1-16.

Sixth-day. The infection of Judah. II Chron. 21: 5-20.

Seventh-day. Grandson of Omri. II Chron. 22: 1-12.

First-day. Destruction of Ahab. II Kings 9: 1-10.

Time.—Omri reigned 893 (Curtis), or 936 (Beecher), to 882 or 925. Ahab from 882 (925) to 861 (904) B. C.

Place.—The Kingdom of Israel, the new capital being the city of Samaria. Parallel Passage.—None.

The reign of Omri, of which so little is recorded, is an interesting one for two reasons: (1) There is reference to it on an ancient monument still in existence (in part). This is known as the Moabite Stone and was discovered by a German missionary in 1868 in the old district of Moab. The inscription is in old Phenician letters and was set up about 850 B. C. to commemorate the deliverance of Moab from Israel. It tells that during the reign of Omri, Israel had subdued Moab and that during the reign of Ahab, Moab had thrown off the yoke. (2) Because Omri founded a dynasty.

The history of the kingdom of Israel after the reign of Jeroboam is related in I Kings, chapter 15: 25; 16: 14, and should be read. It is a sad picture.

Omri was the general of the army of the King of Israel. We know nothing of his previous history. He with the army at his back put down the usurper Zimri, and seized the throne himself. He was not popular with the people and not until he had crushed a certain Tibni after four years conflict did he reign absolute monarch.

23. "In the thirty and first year of Asa King of Judah. The compiler belongs to Judah and naturally dates periods from Kings of Judah. Indeed the accounts of Israel are rather accounts of prophets than kings. Only thirteen verses are given to Omri's reign of: twelve years, though historically an important one while more than five chapters are given to the reign of Ahab, who only reigned twenty-two years, and whose reign historically was no more important than that of Omri. But it was in the reign of Ahab that Elijah lived and prophesied and wrought miracles, and that Micaiah (chap. 22: 7-28), and the unnamed prophet (chap. 20: 13, 14, 22) lived. The religious and moral interest of Ahab's reign was far greater. "Tirzah." The site is unknown. Possibly a summer residence. Compare Cant. 6: 4.

24. "The hill Samaria." Samaria was built upon a hill which commands a splendid view. The sea is clearly visible, the plain of Esdraelon and the hills. It is in the midst of a beautiful country. From its position, until the days of gun-powder, it was almost impregnable, it stood many sieges and never was captured without great difficulty. "Two talents of silver." A very large sum. The heavy talent was equivalent to about $2,000 and the light to about $1,000.

25, 26. Omri seems simply to have followed in the path of Jeroboam, though he is characterized so severely. Some think the last words have been added from verse 30, as nothing is said to show that he was worse than Jeroboam.

27. "The book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel." One of the sources of the compiler of Kings.

29. "Thirty and eighth year of Asa." 882 B. C. or (925).

30. "Did evil," etc. The general characteristic of the Kings of Israel.

31. "Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, King of the Zidonians." Like his father Omri, Ahab's history touches ancient heathen history that has come down to us. Ethbaal has been identified with very considerable probability with Ithobalus, a priest of Astarte (Ashtoreth) who assassinated his predecessor seizing open the throne of Zidon and Tyre. "Ethbaal" means "with him is Baal." The marriage was undoubtedly one of policy, as the advantage of friendship with the Phenicians was obvious. The introduction of the Queen's religion was natural and indeed followed the example of Solomon. I Kings 11: 7, 8. If the identification of Ethbaal with Ithobalus is correct then Jezebel was the aunt of Belus in Virgil's Æneid, great aunt of Pymalion, and of Dido who founded Carthage. Ahab also is mentioned on the Assyrian monuments in an inscription of Shalmaneser II, 854 B. C. Jezebel has come down in history as one of the worst of women. "She was one of those masterful, indomitable, implacable women, who when fate places them in exalted power, leave a terrible mark on the annals of nations." It was evidently her purpose to force the worship of Baal on the kingdom of Israel. She was just as earnest as Elijah. It was she who stirred Ahab up. I Kings 21: 25, 26. Possibly Ahab is not so much to blame for the marriage as at first sight appears. A careful comparison of dates makes it likely that the marriage took place in the reign of Omri, when Ahab was very young. He was evidently a weak character compared with Jezebel. It was analogous to Macbeth and Lady Macbeth.

32. "An altar for Baal." As Solomon had done in Jerusalem. According to the views of the day this was a matter of international courtesy.

33. "A grove." Rather, as in R. V. "The Asherah." Exactly what an Asherah was is not known. The word is apparently used at least in two senses in the Old Testament—as a symbol, and as a goddess. Here undoubtedly the symbol is meant. This was a wooden pole (Judg. 6: 25, 28, R. V.) and symbolized a goddess, the wife of Baal. Some think it represents the reproductive power of nature. It was intensely repugnant to the true religion of Israel.

The character of Ahab and of Jezebel will be brought out more fully in subsequent lesson.

fathers to conduct aerial contests and to build aviation parks.

Information destined to be of prime bearing on the German-American potash struggle has been made public. The German potash trust lately sent a corps of geologists to Canada to investigate the alleged discovery of rich potash deposits close to the American border, in the region of Lakes St. Clair and Huron. The report made by the experts was sufficiently encouraging to justify the formation of a syndicate which is now in process of organization.

Andrew Carnegie has established his fourth "Foundation for Life Savers," or "Hero Funds," as they are popularly called. This time Germany is the recipient of his philanthropy, the United States, England and France having shared in former gifts. The original endowment was made in Fourth month, 1904, when $5,000,000 was placed in the hands of a commission composed of 21 residents of Pittsburg, Pa., who were instructed to use the annual proceeds of the fund for the benefit of dependents of those losing their lives in heroic effort to save their fellow men, or for the heroes themselves, if injured only. The beneficiaries were confined to those associated with acts performed within the United States, Canada, and Newfoundland, and the waters thereof. In 1908 Andrew OLD COMMON SENSE.

CHANGE FOOD WHEN YOU FEEL OUT OF SORTS.

"A great deal depends upon yourself and the kind of food you eat," the wise old doctor said to a man who came to him sick with stomach trouble and sick headache once or twice a week, and who had been taking pills and different medicines for three or four years.

He was induced to stop eating any sort of fried food or meat for breakfast, and was put on Grape-Nuts and cream, leaving off all medicines.

In a few days he began to get better, and now he has entirely recovered and writes that he is in better health than he has been before in twenty years. This man is 58 years old and says he feels "like a new man all the time."

Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Carnegie gave $1,250,000 for the creation of a hero fund in Great Britain. In the following year he established a similar fund in France by the gift of $1,000,000. The total set apart for this purpose is now $8,500,000.

A new hint of the flexible wisdom of Papal policy appears in the reports from Germany that the new "oath against modernism" is not to be strictly exacted of German Catholic priests, particularly not of professors in Catholic universities. A good deal of importance is attached to a reference to the matter in a pastoral letter issued by Cardinal Fischer of Cologne, on the eve of his departure for Rome. Touching upon the recent Vatican decrees, he urged the faithful not to be in any way disturbed by rumors on that subject, declaring that "the Holy Father has given to the German bishops certain plenary powers corresponding to our actual situation." This is interpreted to mean that no rigorous measures will be urged in Germany, though they may be in Austria and Italy, to compel priests and professors to take the special oath against "modernism." A well-informed writer in the Frankfurter Zeitung declares that the Catholic faculties generally maintain that a professor may be, indeed, absolutely bound in matters of dogma, but that, scientifically, he must be free to investigate.

Is the most attractive that has yet appeared in the "Quaker Calendar" series. It is artistic in every detail. The cover is a smoke-tint, oak paper which will harmonize admirably with many backgrounds. The leaves are a dull cream, printed in Flemish brown, and are backed by a heavy mount, with a silk cord for hanging. On each of the twelve pages is a quaint illustration of Quaker life.

The Life of Elizabeth Fry

By GEORGIA KING LEWIS

Is a charming biography of one of the most remarkable women of the 19th century. What Frances E. Willard was to the temperance cause of America, Elizabeth Fry was to prison reform in England. She was a member of a famous household, a sister of Joseph John Gurney. Incidentally it is an interesting sketch of Quaker life a century ago and a suggestive commentary on the social conditions.

FRIENDS MEETING
—Home Missionary FRIENDS INSTITUTE

FRIENDS ALFALFA MEAL MILL

SCOTT CITY, KANSAS

Our many friends, in every American Yearly Meeting, will be glad to know, that since our last report, Friends have secured nine hundred and sixty additional acres of our sub-irrigated alfalfa land, in Alfalfa Valley. This brings our total holdings up to 9,600 acres, which is now worth fully $450,000. When the land we now own is all seeded to alfalfa, we will be shipping one hundred tons of alfalfa meal each day. If the reader will ascertain the price of alfalfa meal in his locality, he can know about what our daily income will be. This income for a year will be surprisingly large. About one half of the retail price will be net profit to the producer. We purpose to not only produce but to manufacture and market our alfalfa product in New York and Europe. This is the financial foundation back of this Home Missionary Movement.

During the year 1910, we built in Scott City, four large, substantial and modern buildings, at a cost of about $26,000, all of which is paid for. They are our steam-cure, cement brick plant, the meeting house, the manse and the office building, in which will be located our administrative and printing departments. The year that has just closed, was crowned with many tokens of Divine favor and blessings.

Forty acres of our sub-irrigated land with a good stand of well rooted alfalfa, can be depended on to pay $1,000 a year net, and where the owner does the work himself, $2,000 a year. We often do much better, but this is dependable.

Our building fund now owns and has just offered for sale sixteen forty-acre tracts.

These are close to town, so that if desired the owner can have a home in town with all of its advantages, and at the same time care for his alfalfa.

These are our very best land with richest, black soil ten feet deep. The sub-irrigation is perfect, as it is but twelve feet to never failing water.

The land will be deeded July 1st, all seeded to alfalfa, with perfect title. Contracts are given now, as soon as the purchaser has made his selection.

Considering the quality and location it is the best bargain in seeded land, in Alfalfa Valley. Nothing else as good can be had for less than $100 an acre.

The prices on these forties average $3,000 each.

Only $1,500 cash required. Balance of purchase price can run ten years with optional payments, thus providing abundant time for the product from the land to pay expenses, interest and principal.

In our judgment this is the best proposition ever offered to one with small capital, in Alfalfa Valley. This opportunity was arranged to secure the interest and co-operation of many who could not handle the larger tracts. The $1,500 cash required may be paid one-third with contract, one-third April 1st, and one-third July 1st. So great has been the demand for seeded tracts close to town and especially in forty-acre tracts that we expect these to be sold within a short time. To secure an early choice it will be advisable to act at once. Many who will read these lines have been writing us. Many others are thinking. We have done our very best to meet your needs and it is not expected that ever again will so favorable an opportunity be available. It would be best to come on the first train.

Alfalfa Valley notes are being issued each month. We shall be glad to send one to all who are interested. These little leaflets give items of interest concerning alfalfa, persons, opportunities, developments, the meeting here, the institute, Friends Rocky Mountain Chautauqua, and our home mission work. Our building program for 1911 is the erection of the institute building. It is to cost about twenty thousand dollars. Some three thousand dollars of material are now on the ground. We plan to open the institute about October 1st next. Should the acreage seeded to alfalfa, this coming year justify it, we will put in the alfalfa meal mill in 1912. Our interest in alfalfa and other material things are only as they minister unto the great end for which we live—The Coming Kingdom. For health, home, income, independence and social, educational and religious advantages, we account ourselves rich indeed. We shall be glad to welcome you.

Seventh-day. Missions to prisons. Acts 16: 16-34.

What mission can we undertake in our city?

What is being done in our large cities?

How can churches help the immigrants?

The book of Jonah is a missionary tract. Its great purpose was to teach the Hebrew people that God is interested in more than one nation, and His mercy is great enough to forgive all those of any nation who will forsake their sin and practice righteousness. Today the book of Jonah is a rebuke to the individual or the Church that is not sympathetically and practically interested in Christian missions. It affords a good lesson for the first missionary topic of a Christian Endeavor year, one in which we are to survey the work of Christian missions around the world.

The general subject for the missionary meetings for the year is "A Missionary Journey Around the World." For the sake of missionary committees that are thoughtful and are prayerfully making careful preparation for these important meetings, we name over the themes to be taken up. There are four lessons on missions in United States territory. 1st, in the North and East; 2d, in the South; 3d, in the West, and 4th, in Hawaii and the Philippine Islands. The journey then carries us to Japan and Korea, to China, to Burma and India, to Persia and Turkey, to Europe, to South America and to the West Indies.

* * *

This birds-eye view of some countries where Christian missions have a foothold tells a story about the greatness of the work. It is world-wide in extent, touches all countries, preaches the Gospel in all languages, lifts all races and is engaged in a death struggle with the great religions of the world.

The subject for this meeting, "Missions in the United States—North and East," concerns Christian work of a missionary character in the most thickly populated portions of the United States if we include that section east of the Mississippi River and north of the District of Columbia. The following is a partial list of the agencies at work in the field: City missions, including all kinds of rescue work for both men and women, Children's Aid Societies, Fresh Air Organizations, Social Settlements, Prison Associations, Bible Societies, Young Men's Christian Associations, Young Women's Christian Associations.

The needs of this field may be partially summarized under three problems: The problem of the immigrant, the problem of the poor, and the problem of the religiously destitute country district. Paganism well nigh as dead as that in ancient Rome is found in the slums of our cities, and in the unfrequented country districts, not to mention that form of paganism which is sometimes dressed in silk hats, kid gloves and dress coats and goes by the name "Society."

Twenty-six of our largest cities, including New York, Chicago, Boston, and San Francisco, have each 70 per cent. of their population either foreign-born, or born of foreign parents. It is true, and it must not be forgotten, that in many ways our institutions show most marvelous capability in absorbing these alien elements. Socially, intellectually, commercially, industrially, politically, these immigrant races become Americanized in the first or second generation to an almost unbelievable extent. But morally and religiously there is much less assimilation. In matters of so far-reaching importance as temperance, Sunday observance, amusements, these races are very profoundly modifying our national customs and institutions.

* * *

The journeys of the Bible society missionary in Maine, where a religious canvass of the entire State is made every seven years, tell a story that is pitiful. Many families are found into which no religious influence has been brought since the Bible missionary called on his previous trip, seven years before. The reports of the Maine Bible Society show that on an average about one family in every four throughout the State have no church affiliation.

* * *

Suggestions for the program of this meeting.

1. Secure from the United Society of Christian Endeavor the pamphlet on City Missions. (Price 10 cents.) It describes various kinds of missionary work conducted in New York City.

2. Read if possible, "The Challenge of the City," by Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D.

3. If your society is in or near a city, send one endeavoror to each of the missions or charitable institutions in the city and have them report at the missionary meeting what they have seen.

4. The data gathered in this column may be used at a suitable time in the meeting to help in giving a general idea of the extent of the field, its needs and some of the things that are being done.

CONDUCTING THE MISSIONARY MEETING.

Speaking from the standpoint of observation and what has been gleaned from various sources, the monthly missionary meeting is usually the least interesting, the driest, and the most unprofitable meeting of the month. Generally the cause for this is to be found in these facts, viz.: First, the meeting has been conducted in the same way as a prayer meeting, and second, there has been no adequate preparation of the topic, which as a missionary topic, almost invariably calls for the setting forth of information about the missionary field which is being considered. How can we pray in a missionary meeting for a field about which we know nothing, and how can we speak upon a missionary topic which concerns itself with, for instance, Guatemala, when we may not even know whether this place is a country, a city, a province or an island. No meeting calls for preparation on the part of the leader and the committee like the missionary meeting. In the prayer meeting we dwell upon our personal experience and look within for the inspiration of our testimonies. In the missionary meeting the look is outward, not inward, away from self, not toward self, and if the missionary facts related to the topic are not adequately set forth, the meeting is sure to be uninteresting, unprofitable and a failure. How the testimonies drag in a missionary meeting. Certainly, because we ask for personal testimonies upon a subject about which we generally know little or nothing. These missionary topics are given for educational purposes. With them we as endeavorers are supposed to learn the things that are being done in the field. Hence the successful missionary meeting must be "programmed." Papers must be prepared and read on subjects related to the topic. The missionary committee should begin arrangements for these meetings weeks in advance. Not only must the leader be well prepared himself, but all those who contribute anything of interest to the meeting will have given the subject careful attention.

Prometheus

Oh, better far to filch the spark of fire
From heaven and suffer the Promethean doom
Than scathless to exist as one in whom
A spirit dwells content with dust and mire!
Oh, better struggle for a high desire,
Too star-like for the winning, than assume Low ease-won ends; yea, better far the tomb
Than barren life unlearning to aspire!
God purge me of inertness as of sin,
And let existence into life be thrilled;
Pour tempest on the stagnant soul within,
And let the sails of thought with storm be filled;
Grant mountain peaks of earthquake origin,
Whereon ideals their eagle nests may build.

Gottfried Hult.

The Word Became Flesh

We know much more about the universe than the ancient world knew, but the more we know about it, the harder it becomes for our spirits to accept the visible universe as the ultimate and final reality. The cold and pitiless forces of nature are not less cold and pitiless when we succeed in discovering their laws and habits. One comes back from his study of the march of suns and planets and the spiral movements of world-making nebulae with very little to comfort the longings of his heart. He sees that these curves are all irrevocable and inevitable, and that each event unfolds out of the one which preceded. It is a wonderful and amazing system, but it offers no tenderness, no love, no balm for the wounds of his spirit. It rolls mercilessly on, and he may be thankful if its wheels do not ride over him—the midget of an hour, riding on one of the flying globes of this mechanical system.

It is useless to expect tenderness and love and balm in a system of mechanical forces. That kind of a world can reveal gravitation and electricity, attraction and repulsion; it can show us matter moving under law; it can exhibit the transformation of one form of energy into some other form; but from the nature of the case it cannot manifest a heart of tenderness or a spirit of love. Those traits belong only to a person, and a mechanical system can never reveal a person. Physics and chemistry, geology and astronomy do discover a revelation of God, but it is necessarily a revelation limited to the possibilities of their field. The test tube and the air pump help demonstrate the fact that the universe is a realm of purpose, of order and of inexhaustible energy, but they must not be expected to show us a divine face or a heart of love. God puts no more of Himself into chemistry or physics or astronomy than chemistry or physics or astronomy will hold!

If the universe is deeper than physics and astronomy can reveal, if there is some greater reality than can be expressed in terms of energy and law, how could this deeper reality reveal itself? Where could the veil be lifted?

Such a revelation could be made to humanity only through a person. Mountain peaks and stars cannot embody love and sympathy—they can embody only energy. Love and sympathy, tenderness and patience, forgiveness and grace are traits of character, attitudes of a personal spirit. If they are ever to be revealed, they must be revealed in the life of a person.

Now, once there was a Person who felt that His life was a personal exhibition of the divine in the human, the eternal in the midst of time. He lived and died in the consciousness that through His life He was showing God to men, that His love was an exhibition of the real nature and character of God, that His sympathy for the weary, heavy-laden, sin-distressed, heart-hungry people of the earth was a true unveiling of the heart of the universe; that His suffering over sin, His grace and patience, made the Father's character visible and vocal in the world. He felt this, and consecrated His life to this deeper revelation of God. Some have doubted, and some have been perplexed, but there have always been some, and it is a growing number, who profoundly believe that here in Him is the personal character of God revealed to us. However leaden and pitiless the march of the universe may be at other points, at this one point, at least, love and tenderness break through and enwrap us. The Jesus whom Peter confessed and Mary loved has become the Christ of the world, and through Him has come to us the God whom our chemistry and astronomy were too limited to reveal—we have seen Him in the face of Jesus Christ.

Recognizing a Diversity of Gifts

Baltimore Yearly Meeting at its last annual gathering appointed a committee to encourage the development of gifts. The chairman of the committee, John R. Cary, in defining the scope of its work, says:

"The fact that the gift in the ministry is the only one which we officially recognize does not mean that it is the only one the Church needs, but it would seem to indicate that it is the most important. And indeed it lies at the foundation of Church growth and extension—"How can they hear without a preacher?" We should covet this gift of ministering of the things of the spirit and be faithful to the call if it comes to us, because just at this time in this yearly meeting we need more ministers, and especially young and strong persons coming on to take the places of those whose physical powers are lessening. It is a high calling—one which may well cause the best to shrink in humility—but should challenge anyone who receives the call to devote his utmost powers in response.

"And there are many other gifts which are needed to round out the Church work. The gift of organization, which in a way co-ordinates the various other gifts; the gift of teaching; the gift of eldership, which may be also called the gift of encouragement; the pastoral gift, which a minister may or may not have, which may be classed also as the gift of sympathy; the gift for peace-making, which an overseer ought to possess; the gift vaguely called "helps," which may be shown by the person who is always ready to do the things that no one else seems to want to do; and others will occur to us as we consider our useful friends."

The recognition of a diversity of gifts such as this should have a wholesome influence in that it brings to the humble performance of duty the dignity which it justly deserves.

A New Spirit in The Senate

It has been a common practice in politics for opposing parties to accuse each other of corruption. This has provided a shield behind which many irregularities have found shelter. All a successful candidate needed to do when confronted with his misdeeds was to show that the charges came from his opponents, and he was given a liberal coat of whitewash and pronounced a martyr—a victim of unjust persecution. Such procedure seems to be passing, in the Senate at least. Since the opening of the present session, charges of corruption against William Lorimer, Illinois, have been investigated by a special committee, a majority of which set aside considerable direct testimony on bribery and asked the Senate to give Lorimer a clear bill of exoneration. Last week, however, Senator Beveridge filed a minority report, which declared "that this election was invalid under any possible view of the law." In reply to the majority's contention that the men who confessed to having received bribes were not to be believed, the report says "that the confessed bribe-takers were shown to have had in their possession, in bills of large denominations, unusually large sums of money soon after the dates when they testified to having received the alleged bribes." The report also pointed out that the three members who were charged with bribing their four colleagues, but who denied having any part in the affair whatever, had a double motive in doing so, since a confession to the giving of bribes would be equivalent to acknowledging that they also received money for their votes.

Such is one view of an affair which the majority of a Senate committee tried to cover up. But a better day is dawning. President Taft has asked that the Senate go behind the recommendation of the committee and study the facts presented in the testimony before passing judgment. And, indeed, a new spirit has come over the Senate. Some of the members of the committee, even, who were inclined to pass the matter lightly at first, now seem desirous to have the case decided on its merits. The Senate is taking its usual time to deliberate, and meanwhile the Lorimer lobby is making bold and audacious attempts to save him.

A second Senator of the Lorimer type is Isaac Stephenson, Wisconsin. A committee of the State Legislature which investigated this primary campaign and election, finds that he probably used $50,000 in securing his seat in the Senate by the small majority of three votes. This committee has asked the Governor to submit its report to the Senate and to begin prosecution where election laws of the State were violated.

It is interesting to note in this country that the lumber interests seem especially active in upholding the election of both Lorimer and Stephenson.

Are Business Ethics Improving?

The nomination of James A. Farrell as president of the United States Steel Corporation to succeed W. Ellis Corey, who recently resigned, augurs a change in the business policy of the concern. Both the former presidents, Schwab and Corey, were schooled in the "Carnegie methods," which have been defined as "getting out and making business where there is no business showing, and shaving a trifle, if necessary, to suit the buyer who is undecided because of finances."

Jas. A. Farrell is of quite a different school. In a recent interview he is quoted as saying:

"The old delusion that there is advantage in preventing one's rival from doing business, no matter what the cost may be, is losing itself in the conception that success lies in the adoption of co-operative methods.

"The policy of these times in the steel business is one of harmony and good will. Such a policy, in order to endure, must insure practically equal advantages to everybody interested.

"We have managed to get our mills and factories into conditions of remarkable efficiency, but we seemed to have lost sight of the enormous benefits accruing from peaceful production. Many at first doubted the practicability of peace in the steel business, but there are not many nowadays who question the advantage of interchanging ideas or of competing generously.

"It appears that with peace in the steel trades, normal conditions may be maintained at all times, to the benefit of manufacturer, consumer and laborer."

Farrell is in favor of pensioning workmen and of bettering their general condition. He also believes in publicity regarding the affairs of the corporation.

The influences which are backing Farrell have secured the inauguration of a profit-sharing plan by which an annual bonus of stock and cash is to be distributed to the employees who have been with the corporation for upwards of five years. This year the bonus will be $2,700,000, 60 per cent. in common stock at 70, and 40 per cent. in cash.

Five Million Dollars for Forts

It seems strange that as judicious and far-sighted a man as President Taft should insist on the fortification of the Panama Canal zone, yet this was not only a recommendation in his annual message, but was the occasion of a special message to Congress last week. He urges that an appropriation of $5,000,000 be made by the present Congress in order that the work may be started at an early date. Since the plans call for $12,000,000, other appropriations will be needed.

Fortunately all of our Congressmen are not carried away with this craze for extensive fortifications. Despite the earnestness with which the President has worked to bring Congress to his way of thinking, there has developed a strong opposition. Many members in both Houses have contended for the neutralization of the waterway, both to avoid the heavy cost of building and maintaining defenses and as tending to avoid complications with other nations. Then, too, nothing can be more secure from a military standpoint than neutral ground. The nations of the world are in honor bound to respect neutrality, and should any dare to transgress, the combined forces of the other countries could be summoned to its defense.

It is certain that there will be exhaustive debate when the question comes before Congress. This will give an opportunity for the public to voice its protest.

Meanwhile Friends should not be idle in bringing what pressure they can to bear against the measure.

Following is a form of petition submitted for circulation among Friends:

As members of the Society of Friends, we protest against the proposed expenditure of the public funds for warlike preparations, and in particular we protest against the use of such funds for the fortification of the Panama Canal, and we urge the Government of the United States to procure by international agreement the neutralization of the whole canal zone.

The Year of Jubilee for the W. F. M. S.

A jubilee celebrating the beginning of women's organized work for foreign missions is being held in each of 30 large and several small cities of this wide country. Fifty years ago the first corporate body of women organized, under the leadership of Mrs. T. C. Doremus, in New York, calling themselves The Women's Union Missionary Society. All through the great struggle which rent our country during the early years of the society's existence, the work went steadily on, and formed a pattern on which the denominational boards based their organizations soon after the close of the war.

This broadening of women's work was not without opposition. One noted divine voiced his anxiety thus: "Some of the most thoughtful minds are beginning to ask: What is to become of this women's movement?" And then, to comfort himself and others, he added: "Let them alone—all through our history like movements have been started. Do not oppose them, and it will soon die out." His augury was vain. Mrs. Doremus' one band has grown until over 57,000 societies in the United States and Canada are working for the good of women in non-Christian lands.

Last year, whole looking over their field, the Central Committee on the United Study of Missions saw that the time has come for a widespread demonstration. After much prayerful planning, the chairman of the Western Extension Committee visited cities on the Pacific slope, and received eager endorsements of the plan. The series of jubilees began in Oakland, Cal., Tenth month 12th, where 1,000 women met the members of the Eastern and Western committees. Portland and Seattle followed, and Denver not only had thousands of women at her meetings, but reported the interest so great that five cities in Colorado and six in Kansas held jubilees as a result. Lincoln, Neb., finding a vacancy in the series, grasped her opportunity, and in three days achieved this remarkable record: "Four meetings on Sunday; mass meeting of 1,500; students' meeting of 1,000; enthusiastic workers' conference; three impromptu meetings in club, drawing-room and church." The Eastern circuit embraces some 17 cities, Philadelphia having been given the dates of Second month 13th and 14th.

Oak Grove Seminary

BY W. A. YOUNG.

The history of Oak Grove Seminary covers a period of more than half a century, dating back to the year 1849. One day of that year, five sturdy Quakers sat in earnest conversation in a house about a mile from the spot now occupied by the school. The "concern" of the hour was education; the home was that of John D. Lang; and the five men, Ebenezer Frye; Samuel Taylor, Alden Sampson, John D. Lang and Alton Pope. These men felt the need of educational advantages for their children—schools where they might receive careful training at the hands of ADMINISTRATION BUILDING.

Christian teachers, and surrounded by a wholesome religious atmosphere. After much discussion it was decided that only Friends should be admitted. To secure the establishment of such a school, they gave individually $1,000; John Lang donated an acre of land as a site for the building, and to Ebenezer Frye was entrusted the oversight of the construction.

The school opened in the autumn of 1850, with Wm. Hobbie as first principal, in which position he served two terms. Josiah Nicholson was chosen to fill the vacancy, and the doors were opened again, this time to pupils of all denominations. But the fact that boarding facilities in the community were poor worked against the school; it ceased to be self-supporting, and after four years of faithful effort, Oak Grove was closed.

The reopening of the school in 1857 was due to the optimism and indomitable energy of Eli Jones and Ebenezer Frye, who worked untiringly to secure funds for its maintenance. The Friends of the entire State were solicited, and the sum of $15,000 secured, with which a boarding-house was built and other improvements made. Assured thus of a financial basis, and with Eli Jones as principal, the school reopened its doors in the latter part of the year 1857. During the same year the name of the school became Oak Grove Seminary.

An incident relating to the school at this period of its history may not be out of place in this connection: "It is reported on good authority that on the opening day of school there was only one mirror on the whole premises, and this on the girls' side of the house. They used it, and then it was transported to the boys' side. This was too much for even the simple and unostentatious Quaker, so sufficient force was brought to bear on those in authority, and a supply of mirrors was purchased."

From a circular, dated Ninth month 29, 1858, we read: "Board, exclusive of tea and coffee, can be had at the following rates: $1.00 per week for girls, and $1.25 for boys, members of the Society of Friends, and 25 cents additional for others. An extra charge of 25 cents per week will be made to those who use tea and coffee."

Under the able administration of such men as Albert K. Smiley and Augustine Jones the school flourished till the spring of 1883, when the seminary building was destroyed by fire. The school was discontinued for a year, after which the directors transferred the property to the New England Yearly Meeting. Through the generosity of Charles M. Bailey and others a new seminary building was soon erected, Charles H. Jones secured as principal, and the work resumed in the year 1885. Under the new management the school began in a way that augured well for its future history; but after two years of rapid growth the entire set of buildings was burned—the work of an incendiary, who gave as his reasons that he was not allowed to study what he wanted to, and that he didn't like the food. To those who had the welfare of Oak Grove at heart this was a time of deepest gloom. But Charles M. Bailey, ever generous and loyal to a cause he loved, advanced the necessary funds for the erection of a new administration building, which, with slight modifications, still stands.

Among other principals of the school who have worked earnestly and prayerfully for its success, the names of Richard M. Jones, Edward H. Cook and Rufus M. Jones deserve especial mention.

In 1903, George L. Jones was called to the head of the school, to which he gave six of the best years of his life—impaired health made it necessary for him to resign. This was a period of unprecedented material growth. It was due largely to his efforts that the new heating and electric lighting plant was erected in 1906. Then came, in 1908, the excellent gymnasium—second to none in the State.

Two years ago the committee selected as principal Everett J. Beers, New York, a graduate of Colgate University. Prof. Beers is a man of unusual energy and of high moral character. He is following well the example of his predecessors in maintaining the school on its high moral level, and is gradually raising its scholastic standard. In scholarship Oak Grove ranks high, being admitted three years ago to the approved list of the New England College Entrance Certificate Board. It now offers three courses of study—English, college preparatory, and agriculture.

Every school or college has a purpose to serve, an ideal to attain, a reason for existence, and these to a large extent mark out for it the nature of its administration and create what we call the "spirit" of the place. Then you ask: What does Oak Grove stand for? What are her reasons for existence?

Nothing shows more clearly the principle on which the school was founded than this extract from a "minute" of the Board of Managers, dated Third month 14, 1857: "The Committee on a Board of Instructors reported that they were united in the judgment that the services of a Friend of religious and moral worth be obtained who shall be considered as principal of Oak Grove School; that he shall have charge of the Scripture lessons of the different classes and of such moral and religious instruction as he may deem calculated with the divine blessings to promote the welfare of those under his charge." We deem this principle one of the great legacies left us by the founders of the school, which today prides itself on the reputation it has as a place of wholesome religious atmosphere. It is not only an educational institution, but it is a school-house where this family of nearly 100, coming from six States and two foreign lands, mingle together, broadening their acquaintance and interest, developing characters of independence and unselfishness, and withal surrounded by many of the influences of home life.

Another reason I would give to justify the existence of Oak Grove is her past record. Among her former pupils and graduates number college professors, principals of boarding-schools, lawyers, bankers, ministers, members of the State Legislature and others in positions of influence. Many of these men got their thirst for learning and the higher things in life at this school, while many others formed habits of living or had inculcated in their lives principles of righteousness that have made them wholesome leaven wherever they have gone.

It has ever been the policy of this school to offer the maximum advantages at the minimum cost. The yearly charge of $180 for board and tuition is by no means indicative of a low standard of scholarship or meager advantages, but it makes possible a high school training for boys and girls of limited means, yet who are rich in purpose and ambition. This is by no means a school of charity, yet the young man or woman who is ambitious to acquire an education, and is of upright character, will find it possible to take advantage of an Oak Grove training. To pupils who by their industry and loyalty show themselves worthy of financial aid, are granted partial scholarships and opportunity for work in this school. For these reasons the school is not self-supporting. The directors have long since realized this handicap and have felt the need of a substantial endowment to put the school on a firm financial basis. They have thought an endowment of $100,000 to be sufficient and within the range of possibility. Solicitors are in the field, and the generous pledges already received make the realization of their hope almost certain. No one who has seen the school or has felt its influence will hesitate to pronounce money put into young lives the noblest and most fruitful of investments.

Friendswood Quarterly Meeting, Texas.

BY FRANCIS A. WRIGHT.

A new quarterly meeting, the first in the State, has just been established by Kansas Yearly Meeting at Friendswood, Galveston County, Texas. It is to be held regularly on the fourth Seventh-day in the Second, Fifth, Eighth and Eleventh months, alternately at Friendswood and League City (not on the second Seventh-day, as erroneously stated in the minutes of Kansas Yearly Meeting). To enable the yearly meeting's committee to take advantage of the semi-monthly homeseekers' rates, however, it was arranged to have the opening session of the quarterly meeting held on Third-day, the 13th of Twelfth month.

The committee was made up as follows: Francis A. Wright, chairman, and his wife, Mary C. Wright, Kansas City, Mo.; Calvin C. Kesinger, Tonganoxie, Kan.; Achsa C. Kenyon, Baxter Springs, Kan.; Isaac A. Woodard, Haviland, Kan.; William P. Haworth, Shawnee, Okla., and Stanton Pearson, who previously visited the locality but was unable to remain until the other members arrived. These Friends visited Friendswood and League City Monthly Meetings with authority to set up the quarterly meeting if in their judgment it seemed right to do so.

League City is situated almost exactly midway between Galveston and Houston on the most direct railroad, being within a fraction of 25 miles from either city. Clear Lake, shaped like a horseshoe, some three miles long by a mile wide, lies to the northeast. Through this runs a stream known as Clear River, which is navigable for launches and barges as far up as Friendswood.

Outside of the business of selling real estate, the principal industries at present seem to be rice culture and the growing of oranges and figs. Much of the country is still open prairie, but we saw large numbers of orange and fig groves, recently planted, and a few older orange orchards, which were yielding a crop worth from $600 to $800 per acre. The principal orange grown is the "Satsuma," a Japanese variety, which when budded on the "Trifoliata" stock, will stand considerable cold, owing to the habit of the latter of becoming dormant in the winter. The Satsuma is a small orange, very sweet, and as it ripens about two months ahead of the earliest California varieties, it commands a ready sale at good prices. The trees come to full bearing in about four years. We saw six oranges on one tree only a year old. The figs are known as seedless, and while there is little sale for them raw, there is a constantly growing demand for the preserved product, so that many canneries are starting up to care for these and the cucumbers and other vegetables which can be easily grown between the rows of young trees.

A sharp frost had killed the cockscombs and tender annuals and the blooms on the roses and other bushes, and touched some of the shoots on the orange trees, so that the appearance of the country was not as attractive as it would have been if our visit had been made a week or so earlier, but the weather when we arrived was balmy and pleasant, so that fires and overcoats were unnecessary except late in the evening.

The time of holding the monthly meetings had also been arranged to suit the convenience of the committee. The first attended by them convened 2 P. M. Sixth-day, the 9th, at League City, in the Baptist church, which the Friends have rented for a time. On entering the building we found some 40 or 50 persons present. The principal address was made by W. P. Haworth. After a few words from some others, the business meeting was opened by the clerk, Eliza J. Lawrence. One item of special interest was a letter from a Friend at Austin, Texas, stating there were seven persons there, members of or interested in Friends, who desired information as to the various meetings and scattered members throughout the State. A committee was appointed to prepare and send a suitable answer to this letter.

Opportunity was then given for the yearly meeting's committee to ask questions. We found that a large proportion of those present belonged to Friendswood meeting. As the two meetings are only eight miles apart, many of the Friends embraced the opportunity while our committee was there to attend at both places. Two persons were received as members on this occasion, and a few others promised to send for their certificates without delay. A meeting was arranged for that evening at League City and another for 2.30 P. M. First-day.

The committee was pleased to learn that a number of Friends had recently purchased land suitable for orange and fig culture between League City and the Bay of Galveston, and that there is a good prospect of another meeting in the near future, about four miles east of League City. We also learned that meetings were frequently held at Webster, three miles north, the nearest railroad station to Friendswood, and an out-meeting was maintained regularly at Chigger schoolhouse, about three miles southwest of Friendswood. There are nine recorded ministers in the two meetings, and two others expect to have their membership transferred soon. The two latter and one of the nine belong to League City; the others belong to Friendswood.

The monthly meeting at Friendswood was held at 2 P. M. the next day. It was a very delightful drive from League City, mostly over open prairie, past orange and fig orchards and large rice fields. We found the meeting-room well filled on our arrival, 80 or 100 being present.

The meeting-room is "L" shaped, and is the downstairs of a two-story building the upper rooms of which are used for the academy. Prof. Frank L. Clark, formerly of Haviland, Kan., is principal.

Wm. P. Haworth preached in the meeting for worship, and, as at League City, opportunity was given the committee to ask questions. After free interchange of ideas, the committee retired for consultation, and it was found that every member was in favor of setting up the quarterly meeting at the time proposed. Arrangements were made for a meeting at Friendswood that evening, for two on First-day and one on Second-day evening.

On Second-day forenoon my wife and self were driven over to Friendswood in time for dinner at 1 o'clock. We passed through one or two slight showers, and about 3 in the afternoon a heavy local rain fell. The sun came out brightly after a time and we were taken to N. E. Stout's orange orchard, where his wife and some others were finishing the day's packing of oranges for market. He showed us one tree from which no oranges had been picked, real estate dealers having paid for the fruit and fenced the tree about so they could have it to show to prospective land buyers. It was a beautiful sight, with its green leaves and 800 or 1,000 bright, yellow oranges. While we were there a sudden change in temperature made wraps desirable.

The next day continued chilly and unpleasant, but the quarterly meeting was well attended. At the conclusion of the meeting for worship it was my privilege to open the business meeting by reading the minute adopted by the committee and the minutes of our late yearly meeting conferring the necessary authority upon us. This was followed by calling the names of the representatives, who were then constituted a nominating committee to produce to the meeting, after a recess, the names of clerks and a superintendent of evangelistic and pastoral work, and two members of a committee to counsel with him.

The officers reported were Elmer Lawrence for clerk, Fay Harvey for reading clerk, and Nathan D. Perry for superintendent. After disposing of the necessary business, an opportunity was given Calvin C. Kesinger to speak on Bible schools, and Francis A. Wright on the duty of supporting foreign missions and the advantage of making regular weekly contributions for them.

The meeting closed promptly at 4 P. M., so that three of us could catch our train at Webster. The drive was quite a cold one, and we were very glad to find a warm fire when we reached the station, in ample time for our train.

Some Views on Present Day Topics

Declarations of Faith Not Creeds

I have been much interested in reading the clear statement of Luke Woodard, in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of First month 5, 1911, regarding "creeds" and "declarations." He is correct as far as he goes, but he does not distinguish between two very different meanings of the word "creed." 1. That general meaning when the word is used nearly in the sense of "statement" or "declaration," as, "This is my 'creed.'" 2. "More generally, a formula of religious belief: a confession of faith, especially one held as authoritative and binding upon the members of a communion." (Oxford English Dictionary.)

The "Declarations" put forth by the early Friends were, it is safe to say, meant for outsiders, and to clear Friends from the charges of heretical and false views. George Fox begins his letter to the Governor of Barbadoes by saying: "Whereas many scandalous lies and slanders have been cast upon us to render us odious; as that 'We deny God,' etc. This is to inform you," etc.

There is no trace of Fox's letter or any other "declaration" being used as a test for members, or as a confession of faith "held as authoritative and binding upon the members," or as a formula to which they were required individually to subscribe. There have been many cases of dealing with offenders in doctrinal teaching, and of disownment for erroneous doctrine preached or practiced, but each question has been decided on general statements without reference to any document being authoritative and binding, except the Bible.

Those who object to the word "creed" object because of the second meaning of the word, which is the most common. It is unfortunate that there should be this difference, but it is a fact, and must be taken into consideration. If the word "creed" be used, there will be misunderstandings and, if the evidence of history means anything, it will not be long before individual subscription will be required. What this means, countless examples tell us.

A serious objection to any written formula is the impossibility of stating spiritual truth in words which will convey the same meaning to everyone. Besides this, words change in meaning. Even when the oldest of Church formulas, the so-called Apostles' Creed, was put into the English prayer book, the word "hell" had to be explained (see Episcopal prayer book), and doubtless the framers of that ancient formula would be astounded at the present interpretation of some of its clauses, even by orthodox churches.

The history of the Christian Church shows that from very early times few things have caused so much discord and division as the efforts made to force submission to written formulas or creeds. The great Baptist communion has, for more than two hundred years, kept company with the Friends Church in having no written formula which must be subscribed to. It is to be hoped that this companionship will not be broken by Friends.

On New Year's Day, 14 new members were publicly received into membership at Damascus, Ohio. John Pennington is pastor in this meeting.

Sarah A. Kelsey, Newberg, Oregon, has again been very low with a complicated illness. At last report her physical suffering was somewhat relieved although her strength seemed to continue failing.

Henry Mills, Newberg, Oregon, renews his subscription and remarks, "I am now eighty-one years old, lacking three months. I have been taking THE AMERICAN FRIEND and its predecessors for fifty-eight years."

John Howard, Laconia, N. H., where he has been doing pastoral work for the past three years is now visiting with friends in Kansas and Oklahoma, where he formerly lived. He recently called at Friends University, his Alma Mater, having graduated in her first class in 1901.

Prof. E. E. Hadley, principal of the academy at Fowler, Kans., took a trip through Kansas and Oklahoma during Christmas vacation week. The academy opened the 2d inst., with a small attendance owing to very cold weather, but as the week progressed the attendance improved.

The meetings at which "Echoes from the yearly meeting" were heard were occasions of no little moment at Corinth and at Lincoln, Va. At the latter place, James Carey, Jr., and Margaret T. Carey from Baltimore were present. Forenoon and afternoon sessions were held between which a basket dinner was served.

* * *

We are informed by some of our English Friends, that a Russian, who goes under various names, is coming to America. He professes much admiration for George Fox and deep interest in "spiritual religion." He is, however, our informants say, a swindler and Friends should be on their guard, if he approaches them. He is a man of small stature and has "a little ruddy beard."

A few families of Friends in Santa Ana, Cal., where there is no organized meeting, are taking a leading part in a union

Bible school of about 50 members, which was lately organized in a part of the city where there is a clear field. Friends active in the work thus far are Rachel Wilson, Jennie Groff, Ella Weaver, Penionah Binford and daughters, and Ruth Ann Chantry.

Margaret Hunt, Temple, Okla., finds herself quite cut off from Friendly association. She writes: "THE AMERICAN FRIEND comes to me each week like the face of an old friend, bearing good tidings from a far country. My home is so remote from Friends, and I find so much in its pages which I enjoy reading, not only the different phases of the work for the Church, but the deep spiritual tone of the entire paper. I prize THE AMERICAN FRIEND very much indeed."

Dover Quarterly Meeting was held at Gonic, N. H., the 7th and 8th inst. The interest was quite marked and the attendance large, with a good percentage of children and young people.

The ministers in attendance were Charles H. Jones and wife, Amesbury, Mass., and S. Adelbert Wood, Tamworth, N. H.

Alice Jones, from the Friends Mission, Ramallah, Palestine, gave an interesting address First-day afternoon, going into the details of her life among the children of that land.

The village of Gonic is an interesting place. It is a locality within the limits of the city of Rochester, N. H. It is interesting to note that in voting on liquor license, while the city proper went for license, this corner where Friends hold sway was solid for "no license" and in the total vote made a considerable balance against license this year.

The first session of Everett Monthly Meeting, Washington, in 1911 was a time of much blessing. Thirty-six were received into membership and the meeting united in a request for a monthly meeting to be set up at Peshastin, Wash. A request came in from a small meeting four miles south of the city for a committee to represent the monthly meeting in securing a lot for the building of a meeting-house at Pinehurst, where one family of Friends now reside. Good reports came in from most of the meetings, so it seemed like an old-time quarterly meeting, there being seven meetings in this monthly meeting.

Benjamin J. Mills, gave an able discourse on the varieties of life after which the business followed and a good spirit of hopefulness prevailed.

During the Christmas vacation, a number of improvements were made in the main building at Friends University, Wichita, Kans. The first two floors of the building were wired for electricity and most of the fixtures installed. The two large corridors, the office, the Christian Association room, the girl's rest room, the north room of the library, the cloak rooms, the laboratory, Professor Trueblood's room, the chapel and both the boys' and girls' gymnasiums are now conveniently lighted. The chapel is especially resplendent with forty-five Tungsten lights of forty candle power. The old gas lights will also remain there for use in case the electricity should fail. Another room, which will be a very convenient meeting place for small gatherings is the north room of the library, with its grate fire and new lights.

The third floor will be lighted with the large gas lights which were formerly used in the corridors, on the first floor.

The ministry of Arthur and Eliza F. Dann at Kansas Yearly Meeting was so acceptable to Friends that before the yearly meeting adjourned, President Edmund Stanley, of Friends University, and others warmly invited them to conduct a series of meetings at the university for the college and the local meeting. This they did from Eleventh month 27th to Twelfth month 10th in 20 meetings, including a few special Bible readings and addresses to the Young Women's Christian Association of the college by Eliza F. Dann. Arthur Dann also addressed the students and professors several mornings at the college chapel exercises. On all occasions Christ crucified was preached with liberty and power. There were no sensational features in the meetings. The church and the college received a distinct uplift; many bore witness to their personal blessing; not a few were renewed in life and service; some were baptized with the Spirit. Much enduring work is believed to be the true record of the meetings.

The youngest child of Baltimore Yearly Meeting seems to be thriving. We refer to the meeting at Elkhorn in western Virginia. An item in THE INTERCHANGE says: "The new meeting-house at Elkhorn was opened for use on the 18th of December, Samuel R. Neave and Howard and Sara Hoge attending the meetings, representing the Evangelistic and Church Extension Committee and Baltimore Quarterly Meeting. The house is substantial and attractive, costing $2,263.55, including everything, seats and other furniture, carpets, coal house, pavements and electric lights. Of this amount a little over $2,000 has been received, and some of the balance promised, so that Friends hope to have the account balanced soon. Benjamin Lewis has given his personal attention to every detail, and to those who know him this is equivalent to a certificate of excellence.

"Meetings were held morning and evening of the 18th, about 125 being present at the latter. On Second-day evening, Samuel Neave held a Bible Class in a private house at Vivian, which was of service in clearing up some points which some persons had difficulty about.

"A meeting having been announced for Third-day evening at Thacker, the new mine operation 73 miles from Elkhorn, Samuel Neave went on to attend it. In spite of snow and cold, there was an attentive audience of about 40."

This field seems quite open for Friends. A Bible school was started there the first of the new year.

A gospel team from the Earlham College Y. M. C. A., composed of Thomas E. Jones, Homer Morris, Lester C. Haworth, and E. A. Lehman held meetings for ten days, beginning Twelfth month 23d, at Little Ridge, a small meeting not far from Fairmount, Ind. The young men were assisted in the work by Leora Bogue, a singing Evangelist. As a result of their efforts several were led to accept Christ, and the church was much encouraged and strengthened.

On the 2d inst., the young men were present at the chapel exercises at Fairmount Academy. Thomas E. Jones appeared first on the program, giving a short talk, which was followed on the part of the students by singing the Academy song and giving a few yells. The Earlham quartette, composed of Haworth, Morris, Doherty and Lehman, sang two numbers which were much appreciated. Homer Morris, in a short speech, introduced Lester Haworth, who told of the advantages of a college education and of the advantages at Earlham. He was followed by a third song by the quartette.

It is interesting to note that one of these young men is president of the Earlham College Y. M. C. A.; another is business manager of the Earlhamite; T. E. Jones is Earlham's representative in the inter-state oratorical contest while L. C. Haworth is the field representative of the college.

The winter term of Earlham College formally began the 4th inst., when Demarcus Brown, State Librarian, gave an address before the student body and faculty in the chapel. The enrollment is about the same as last term. One new course is being offered this term and several changes in administration have been made.

President Kelly is offering a course entitled "High-school problems." There being a large number of students in college who expect to teach, this course is expected to be very helpful. Several have enrolled for it.

At a recent meeting of the board of trustees, Catherine Snapp, who has been serving the college as lady principal in Earlham, was appointed dean of women. In her new position she will not only have charge of all the girls who reside in Earlham Hall, but will have charge of the day-student girls as well.

In order that the new men of the College may have a personal friend in one of the upper classes who can advise him from time to time in regard to customs and traditions and other points with which he is unfamiliar during his first year in college, each Freshman has been assigned to some member of the Senior class who will serve as his adviser and counselor during the remainder of the year. It is expected to make this a precedent which is to be followed in the years to come by all the other classes.

The annual meeting of the Philadelphia Branch of the Friends Foreign Missionary Association was held at Friends Institute, the 30 ult., with an attendance of 26.

Of special interest was a talk by Mary Morris on "The Beginnings of Missionary Work in Philadelphia." She said that she had spent the winter of 1871-72 in Egypt and Syria, and in seeing the missionary work there, the thought would come to her, "Where are the Friends?" The year before, Eli and Sybil Jones had traveled through these regions, and they had the same guide. For eleven years she prayed that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting might be in the field, and asked Dr. James E. Rhoads if he thought it possible to start a society. It seemed to him then, however, that it could not be done, although fully in sympathy with the work. During a visit to Baltimore Yearly Meeting, the subject was discussed with Sarah W. Nicholson and Hannah Whitall Smith, and the former proposed a meeting at her home, which was held soon after, and the work started.

It was begun by supporting an orphan in a school carried on by English Friends in India. Joseph Cosand and his wife went out as the society's first missionaries to Japan in 1885. The names of Mary Whitall, Abby Longstreth, Mary Anna Longstreth, Sarah Taylor Thomas, Margaret W. Haines, Elizabeth B. Stokes and Rebecca N. Taylor were recalled as some of the first interested members. The "Earnest Workers," a band of children, started by Hannah M. Jenks and Ellen W. Longstreth, grew out of the society. Now Friends may be called a missionary body; in Japan they are leaders in the cause of peace, and in the temperance work.

The current number of the Penn College Bulletin makes an earnest appeal to the members of Iowa Yearly Meeting for subscriptions to the endowment of Penn College. It is a call that should be heeded. "It would be an easy matter," so the Bulletin says, "to raise this endowment if each of the 10,000 members of Iowa Yearly Meeting would pay his share. If there are 2,000 families of Iowa Friends, to raise $100,000, would require only an average of $50 per family. There are not 100 families in Iowa Yearly Meeting who could not, on the liberal terms of the pledge (printed elsewhere in the Bulletin) contribute twice this amount."

While this appeal is made to Iowa Friends, especially, it should be remembered by all who are interested in the future of the institution that the present affords an unusual opportunity for helping the college at a critical turn.

The following statistics give some idea of the financial position of the college:

Value of Penn College plant.....	$103,000
Productive Endowment	100,000
Unproductive Endowment (estimated).....	40,000
Conditional Endowment	60,000
Cost of tuition per student.....	50
Total annual receipts from tuition.....	10,000
Total income from endowment.....	5,000
Total annual income from sustaining fund (expires in 1911)	4,000
Total expenditures (1909-1910).....	23,000

At last yearly meeting of Iowa Friends, an organization of the pastors in active service was perfected. The need for it had been felt for some time. The object of the association as set forth in the constitution is as follows:

"The purpose of this body shall be to promote a spirit of co-operation among pastors and to strengthen the hands each of the other in the work of the yearly meeting to which God has called us."

The following officers were elected: Zeno H. Doan, New Providence, president; Laura P. Townsend, vice-president; Ora W. Carrell, Muscatine, secretary-treasurer; Harry R. Keats, Des Moines and George Deshler, Le Grand, were appointed to serve as other members of the executive committee.

The first meeting of this association was held at Marshalltown, Iowa, the 2d-4th inst. The program was as follows:

SECOND-DAY, FIRST MONTH, 2D.

7.30 P. M. Sermon. Zeno H. Doan.

THIRD-DAY, FIRST MONTH, 3D.

9.15 A. M. Quiet hour.

9.30 A. M. Paper, "The Distinctive Message of our Church for Today." Leslie Bond.

10.00 A. M. Paper, "Financial Provision for Old Age and at Death of our Ministers." A. J. Hanson, Lynnville, Iowa.

Discussion.

1.30 P. M. Paper, "Shall the Pastor reserve time for study and prayer? How to keep in closest touch with God?" Viola Smith.

Discussion.

2.30 P. M. Paper, "Our Pastorless Churches—The Cause and Remedy." Alvin Hoskins.

Discussion and Adjournment.

7.45 P. M. Sermon. Walter J. Miles, West Branch, Iowa.

FOURTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 4TH.

9.30 A. M. Meditation. Prayer.

10.00 A. M. Paper, "The Sunday Evening Meetings." Eli H. Perisho, Indianola, Iowa.

Discussion and Final Adjournment.

The conference was not largely attended on account of the severe cold weather and other conflicting causes, but it was the general feeling of those present that it was one of the most helpful features in the church work at present. God's presence and power were definitely manifest. All the papers showed excellent preparation and the conference will undoubtedly result in real good to our church and yearly meeting.

FIRST MONTH 29, 1911

JEHOSHAPHAT'S GOOD REIGN IN JUDAH.

II Chronicles 17:1-13.

For Special Study, 17:1-6, 9-13.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Matt. 6:33.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, First month 23d. Jehoshaphat's reign. II Chron. 17:1-19.

Third-day. Prophecy of Zedekiah. I Kings 22:1-12.

Fourth-day. Prophecy of Micaiah. I Kings 22:13-28.

Fifth-day. The prophecy fulfilled. I Kings 22:29-40.

Sixth-day. Rebuke by Jehu. II Chron. 19:1-11.

Seventh-day. Victory. II Chron. 20:1-30.

First-day. A godly king. I Kings 22:41-50.

Time.—B. C. 878-853 (Curtis), 922-897 (Beecher).

Parallel Reigns in Kingdom of Israel. —Ahab, 18 years; Joram, 7 years.

Prophets.—In Israel, Elijah, Micaiah; in Judah, Jehu, son of Hanani, Jahaziel.

Places.—Judah and neighborhood, and Ramoth-Gilead, east of the Jordan.

Parallel Passages.—None.

With the exception of part of verse 1 the narrative of the lesson is peculiar to Chronicles. Jehoshaphat was the son of Asa (see Lesson III). As he was 35 at the time of his accession, he had grown up before Asa fell under the Divine displeasure. His desires and efforts were for good. He was in later times ranked with Hezekiah. He was, so far as known, the only son of Asa; his mother was Azubah. His character and reign appealed to the compiler of Chronicles, for only nine verses in Kings are given particularly to his reign. The central fact in the account in Kings is, that "he made peace with the King of Israel," which was certainly a wise thing to do from a political and ethical point of view. If Jehoshaphat had stopped here nothing but praise could be given him, but he went further, moved no doubt by policy, and cemented the peace by an alliance between his son Jehoram and Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel—a union which brought great trouble upon Judah.

1-2. "Strengthened himself against Israel." (2 Chron. 16:1, 9). "Fenced." Fortified. "Cities of Ephraim," etc. Compare 2 Chron. 15:8.

3. "The first ways." That is before David fell into sin. "Sought not unto the Baalim." R. V. The false gods in contrast with Jehovah.

4. "The doings of Israel." I Kings 12:28; 2 Chron. 11:15.

5. "Therefore." Because of his faithfulness. This lesson is emphasized again and again in Chronicles. Indeed in the Old Testament that outward prosperity was a token of God's favor is a lesson constantly taught.

6. "His heart was lifted up." Here used in a good sense. "He took away the high places and the Asherim out of Judah." R. V. But compare I Kings 22:43; 2 Chron. 20:32, 33. It is not practicable with our present knowledge to explain this discrepancy. The Asherim were wooden poles set up like the stone pillars at sanctuaries. They are analogous to the "totem" poles in Alaska.

7-8. An account of how Jehoshaphat sent prominent men to teach the people the law of Jehovah. Compare 2 Chron. 19:4-11, where there is a fuller account.

9. "They." The princes, the Levites, and the priests. See verses 7, 8.

10. "And the fear of the Lord," etc. The peace and prosperity of Judah inspired the neighboring nations with a wholesome dread of the Divinity who had thus blessed Jehoshaphat. The "fear" here referred to is not that usually spoken of, as "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," but rather a terror or supernatural dread. The margin of the R. V. has "a terror from Jehovah." That is as a reward for Jehoshaphat's faithfulness. Jehovah sent such a terror into the hearts of the bordering nations that they were afraid to attack Judah.

11. "Arabian" means, primarily, a dweller in a desert. The word here, probably, means the kingdom of the Nabateans, a strong nation south and south-east of Judah. They are also mentioned in chapters 22:1; 26:7. The large presents and the tribute give an idea of the success and power of Judah. The Philistines, living along the coast, south of Tyre and Sidon, were always a thorn in the side of the Israelites. The origin of the Philistines is not known. They were a Semitic or partly Semitic people, and there seems no doubt that they entered Palestine by way of Egypt, though not in any sense Egyptians. It is not unlikely that they reached Palestine from the south, as the Israelites reached it from the east, about the same time. Some think they came originally from Crete, others from Cyprus, but there is no certain knowledge as yet. They disappear from history about 625 B. C. It is strange that though this people have long since vanished, their name is still preserved in common usage, for Palestine is Philistia in the Greek form, Palestiné, taken into Latin as Palestina, and from this comes the English, Palestine. The name, first applied to the narrow strip, was afterward extended to the whole country, known in recent times as the "Holy Land." For Old Testament usage see Ex. 15:14; Is. 14:29, 31; Joel 3:4. Comparing A. V. and R. V. Ps. 60:8; 87:4; 108:9.

12. "Waxed great exceedingly." Was extremely rich. The context implies that this was in military stores, etc.

13. "And he had many works in the cities of Judah." Great property, especially military supplies. "And men of war, mighty men of valor in Jerusalem." R. V.

The whole picture is one of great military power, and prosperity as the direct reward of faithfulness. The rest of the history of Jehoshaphat is found in chapters 18-20 and it should be read. It is one of the most interesting and graphic episodes recorded in Chronicles. The only shortcomings of Jehoshaphat, as recorded, are his political alliances, as a result of which he narrowly escaped death at Ramoth-Gilead (chapter 18), and lost his ships (chapter 20:37).

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. Jehoshaphat sought for protection against outside enemies.

2. He sought to drive out internal enemies by religious education and training.

3. As a result, he gained success, prosperity, and strength, and the blessing of the Lord.

The Home Comers, by W. Kirkland. Publishers, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., New York. Price $1.20, net.

A story which centers about a sweet brave-hearted, grandmother whose dearest wish is to see her four orphaned grand-children brought together under the old home roof. A small legacy finally makes this possible and the task, so long looked forward to, is eagerly assumed. But conditions on the old farm are very different from those to which the children have been accustomed and while Dumpling and Jennie hail with delight the freedom of the new life the older children must be won by patient love and an unwavering faith in the final victory of their better selves. The characters are well drawn and we have a very readable story with many touches of appealing pathos.

Scottie & His Lady, by Margaret

FAMILY OF FIVE.

ALL DRANK COFFEE FROM INFANCY.

It is a common thing in this country to see whole families growing up with nervous systems weakened by coffee drinking.

That is because many parents do not realize that coffee contains a drug—caffeine—which causes the trouble.

"There are five children in my family," writes an Iowa mother, "all of whom drank coffee from infancy up to two years ago.

"My husband and I had heart trouble and were advised to quit coffee. We did so and began to use Postum. We now are doing without medicine and are entirely relieved of heart trouble.

(Caffeine causes heart trouble when continually used as in coffee drinking.)

"Our eleven-year old boy had a weak digestion from birth, and yet always craved, and was given, coffee. When we changed to Postum he liked it and we gave him all he wanted. He has been restored to health by Postum and still likes it.

"Long live the discoverer of Postum!"

This story narrates the career of a collie beginning with his kennel days. The description of his moods and mental attitude as a growing pup, is lively and suggestive. Later the dog finds a mistress, but no sooner has he become deeply attached to her than he is stolen by thieves. Then follows a series of wanderings in which "Scottie" tries to find his mistress. By introducing the reader intimately into the dog's thought, the story excites sympathy for canines.

Lights and Shadows of Life on the Pacific Coast, by S. D. Woods. Publishers, Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York. Price $1.20, net.

The author of the book is an old resident of California. He rounded Cape Horn in 1849, and has been a keen observer of events in the "empire west of the Rocky Mountains" from the days of the "gold rush" to the present time. The author narrates many of his experiences, and comments on the social, political, and industrial changes that have taken place on our western coast in the last sixty years.

The Journal of the Friends Historical Society (London) for Twelfth month, 1910, has just been issued. It was somewhat delayed on account of the comprehensive index which the editor, Norman Penney, has prepared of the volume for 1910.

The frontispiece is an excellent photograph of the Castle of Chambord, France, and much of the magazine is given to a reproduction of the documents which were found in the public archives at Blois and give evidence of proposals made by certain Friends to establish schools of industry at this castle in the closing years of the eighteenth century.

Of special interest to American Friends are the "Notes on the American descendants of John Reckless of Nottingham."

The opening of the New Year is an excellent time to become a member of the society. The annual dues are $1.25, and the Journal is sent free to all members. Address Herman Newman, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Outlook, New York, edited by Lyman Abbott and Hamilton Mabie, and for which Theodore Roosevelt is a regular editorial contributor, is well known to many of our readers. It undoubtedly has the widest circulation among Friends of any weekly east of the Mississippi. This is due to its ably written and comprehensive review of current events. Its articles are of a wholesome character, well calculated to enhance good citizenship. The subscription price of the paper is $3.00 a year.

Is the most attractive that has yet appeared in the "Quaker Calendar" series. It is artistic in every detail. The cover is a smoke-tint, oak paper which will harmonize admirably with many backgrounds. The leaves are a dull cream, printed in Flemish brown, and are backed by a heavy mount, with a silk cord for hanging. On each of the twelve pages is a quaint illustration of Quaker life.

The Life of Elizabeth Fry

By GEORGIA KING LEWIS

Is a charming biography of one of the most remarkable women of the 19th century. What Frances E. Willard was to the temperance cause of America, Elizabeth Fry was to prison reform in England. She was a member of a famous household, a sister of Joseph John Gurney. Incidentally it is an interesting sketch of Quaker life a century ago and a suggestive commentary on the social conditions.

FRIENDS ALFALFA MEAL MILL

SCOTT CITY, KANSAS

Our many friends, in every American Yearly Meeting, will be glad to know, that since our last report, Friends have secured nine hundred and sixty additional acres of our sub-irrigated alfalfa land, in Alfalfa Valley. This brings our total holdings up to 9,600 acres, which is now worth fully $450,000. When the land we now own is all seeded to alfalfa, we will be shipping one hundred tons of alfalfa meal each day. If the reader will ascertain the price of alfalfa meal in his locality, he can know about what our daily income will be. This income for a year will be surprisingly large. About one half of the retail price will be net profit to the producer. We purpose to not only produce but to manufacture and market our alfalfa product in New York and Europe. This is the financial foundation back of this Home Missionary Movement.

During the year 1910, we built in Scott City, four large, substantial and modern buildings, at a cost of about $26,000, all of which is paid for. They are our steam-cure, cement brick plant, the meeting house, the manse and the office building, in which will be located our administrative and printing departments. The year that has just closed, was crowned with many tokens of Divine favor and blessings.

Forty acres of our sub-irrigated land with a good stand of well rooted alfalfa, can be depended on to pay $1,000 a year net, and where the owner does the work himself, $2,000 a year. We often do much better, but this is dependable.

Our building fund now owns and has just offered for sale sixteen forty-acre tracts.

These are close to town, so that if desired the owner can have a home in town with all of its advantages, and at the same time care for his alfalfa.

These are our very best land with richest, black soil ten feet deep. The sub-irrigation is perfect, as it is but twelve feet to never failing water.

The land will be deeded July 1st, all seeded to alfalfa, with perfect title. Contracts are given now, as soon as the purchaser has made his selection.

Considering the quality and location it is the best bargain in seeded land, in Alfalfa Valley. Nothing else as good can be had for less than $100 an acre.

The prices on these forties average $3,000 each.

Only $1,500 cash required. Balance of purchase price can run ten years with optional payments, thus providing abundant time for the product from the land to pay expenses, interest and principal.

In our judgment this is the best proposition ever offered to one with small capital, in Alfalfa Valley. This opportunity was arranged to secure the interest and co-operation of many who could not handle the larger tracts. The $1,500 cash required may be paid one-third with contract, one-third April 1st, and one-third July 1st. So great has been the demand for seeded tracts close to town and especially in forty-acre tracts that we expect these to be sold within a short time. To secure an early choice it will be advisable to act at once. Many who will read these lines have been writing us. Many others are thinking. We have done our very best to meet your needs and it is not expected that ever again will so favorable an opportunity be available. It would be best to come on the first train.

THE MANSE - FRIENDS - SCOTT CITY, KANS.

The Friends Meeting House, Scott City, Kans.

Alfalfa Valley notes are being issued each month. We shall be glad to send one to all who are interested. These little leaflets give items of interest concerning alfalfa, personal, opportunities, developments, the meeting here, the institute, Friends Rocky Mountain Chautauqua, and our home mission work. Our building program for 1911 is the erection of the institute building. It is to cost about twenty thousand dollars. Some three thousand dollars of material are now on the ground. We plan to open the institute about October 1st next. Should the acreage seeded to alfalfa, this coming year justify it, we will put in the alfalfa meal mill in 1912. Our interest in alfalfa and other material things are only as they minister unto the great end for which we live—The Coming Kingdom. For health, home, income, independence and social, educational and religious advantages, we account ourselves rich indeed. We shall be glad to welcome you.

The Tracing of a Wiser Hand

Whatever turn the path may take to left or right,
I think it follows
The tracing of a wiser hand, through dark and light,
Across the hills and in the shady hollows.

I only know that every day brings good above
My poor deserving;
I only feel that on the road of life true love
Is leading me along and never swerving.

Whatever gifts the hours bestow, or great or small,
I would not measure
As worth a certain price in praise, but take them all
And use them all, with simple, heartfelt pleasure.

SUGGESTIONS TO LEADERS FOR THIS MEETING.

1. It is an anniversary meeting, and should fittingly set forth the history and work of the world-wide Christian Endeavor movement.

2. Secure from the United Society of Christian Endeavor in Boston or Chicago "The Story of the Year," by Dr. Francis E. Clark. Let someone read his first chapter on "Thirty Years of Christian Endeavor."

3. The story of the past year, including the Great Increase Campaign, if read or told by someone appointed for that purpose will give an inspiration to the meeting and call out testimonies concerning the personal value of Christian Endeavor.

Christian Endeavor is the giant child of the Church. In celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of the birth of the society, we are reminded that Christian Endeavor's first thirty years have been more remarkable in growth and development than the corresponding period in any organization allied with or growing out of the Christian Church in the last century. The Bible Societies, the Missionary Programme, the International Sunday School Movement, the Charities within and outside the Church, the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., are mighty auxiliaries of the Church, but none of them made a record growth and accomplishment in the first thirty years of their history that can compare with the wonderful history of the Christian Endeavor Society.

Christian Endeavor started in 1881 in Williston Church in Portland, Maine, with one pastor, Dr. Francis E. Clark, and a small group of boys and girls; it closed the year 1910 with an enrollment of more than 74,000 societies, with a membership of more than 3,750,000 in more than 80 denominations and in every country in the world. Last year an increase of more than 4,000 societies was reported at headquarters.

The Apostle Paul says that the law is our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ; the twentieth century Church appreciates the fact that the law has a strong assistant schoolmaster in the Christian Endeavor Society, which not only brings us to Christ, but also trains us in the school of Christ to become efficient in character and also in service.

The Bible School and the Christian Endeavor vie with each other in wholesome rivalry in bringing the boys and girls to the rich full life of service in the Church of Christ. The Bible School aims to impart knowledge of the truth about Christ, that the youth may attain unto a personal Christian experience; the Christian Endeavor aims to develop the ability of self expression in Christian service that the youth may attain unto a personal Christian experience. The end in each case is the same, the approach is different. Thus the Bible School and the Christian Endeavor are co-workers in the great work of developing the religious life of young people.

Love, service and sacrifice are the three fundamental laws of the Kingdom of God. We believe in Christian Endeavor because it develops the spirit of love for Christ and the Church, it trains the powers of youth in service for Christ and the Church, it shows the reasonableness of sacrifice (Rom. 12:1, 2) for Christ and the Church.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CRITICIZED BY FRIENDS.

Christian Endeavor has been criticized by Friends because of its rigid requirements for personal religious expression in the prayer-meeting as set forth in its pledge. Theoretically and ideally the criticism may appear just, but practically it is beside the mark. Christian Endeavor is educational in its method. The teacher in day school calls for recitation of the lesson not simply to find out what the pupil knows, but also and more especially to clarify and intensify in the child's mind the knowledge it possesses. A college professor once informed the writer that a person did not know a thing which he could not verbally express. Self expression intensifies experience, and often takes the emotion which is ephemeral and makes it a component part of the life. The mind of youth feeds on emotion and imagination. Its findings in these realms become assimilated as a part of life and character only as they find expression in words and action. The Christian Endeavor Society insists on words and actions as the expressions of religious impulses and emotions.

The Christian Endeavor Society is not opposed to, but allied with the promptings of the Holy Spirit. Our innate mental lethargy, our diffidence, our verbal inefficiency are the forces that oppose and hinder the leadership of the Holy Spirit. Christian Endeavor aims to waken the mind, to dispel timidity, to train the voice to express the feeling of the heart, and thus the life naturally deaf to the voice of the Spirit, becomes quick to hear, and ready to act.

If Christian Endeavor is properly conserved among Friends, it has the power to develop more gifts in the ministry than any other agency with which we are acquainted. I venture to assert that three-fourths of the young ministers of the on-coming generation received their first incentive for public religious utterance in the Endeavor Society, and found within its field of activity the easiest and most natural place for the expression and development of these ministerial gifts of speech and service.

News in Brief

A reapportionment bill has been presented to the House fixing its membership at 433, exclusive of Arizona and New Mexico. The committee's report was unanimous and a vote will be taken at an early date.

The opening gun in the fight for the fortification of the Panama Canal was fired in the House of Representatives last week when the postoffice appropriation bill ostensibly was under consideration. Representative Keifer, of Ohio, spoke for an hour in favor of the neutralization of the canal. He declared that the latest estimate of $12,000,000 for the fortification of the canal would not be sufficient. He asserted that it would cost at least $100,000,000 to fortify the

The Gains of Peace

While there seem to be just now some temporary setbacks in the long fight against the liquor saloon, as soon as we turn to the warfare against war the signs and prognostications are very encouraging.

If the attention is turned only to the war budgets of the great powers the natural conclusion would be that war was never so immovably intrenched in the world as it is today. In Germany alone there are three-quarters of a million of men under arms, producing nothing, but consuming all the time, and costing the taxpayer a terrific sum. In this fairly non-military republic, 70 cents out of every dollar raised through taxation is appropriated for wars, future or past.

There is almost a mania for Dreadnought-building, as the great nations race to keep pace with each other in turning out these titanic fighting-machines, each one costing about ten millions of dollars.

But as soon as we look away from the survival of barbaric ideals, the whole sky is light with the harbingers of peace, which is coming steadily on, in spite of the Dreadnought-builders. Nothing is so convincing as facts, and the array of peace-facts grows in significance every year. The year just closed saw the peaceful settlement of the fisheries dispute between Great Britain and the United States. The dispute had rankled for a hundred years, but The Hague court settled it with the same august dignity and finality which marks the decisions of our Supreme Court. Another important achievement in the same direction was the settlement, without friction, of a quarrel between the United States and Venezuela.

During last mid-summer the Russians and Japanese formed on a peace basis a treaty which was more important in its bearing upon the affairs of the Far East than was the treaty won at the cost of the awful slaughter in Manchuria. The South African Union, formed also in the past year, is accomplishing, without the loss of a single life, what all those fearful battles over the kopje of the Transvaal could not accomplish.

Every event of this nature demonstrates that the word is more powerful than the sword and that the time is near when the man who tills his field will not be compelled to carry a soldier on his back. But besides these facts which prove that war is not necessary any longer, there are many other constructive forces at work. Andrew Carnegie has endowed a "Peace Foundation" with $10,000,000, under the direction of some of the foremost educators of America. The income is to be used to advance methods of peace, to educate the world to ideals of peace, and to promote plans for judicial settlement of disputes. It is an amazing step for a man to take who has made his money in steel and who has had his share in making armor-plate! Perhaps even more important than the act of this money-king will prove the work of our President, William Taft, who is at present pledged and devoted to the formation of a complete arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States. Then the money intended for the fortification of the Panama Canal could be used to transform the barbaric slums of great cities, and the appropriation for Dreadnoughts could go to the Friends colleges! Gertrude W. Cartland

A letter just received from Amesbury, Massachusetts, says that our friend, Gertrude W. Cartland, passed away on the morning of the 16th. There were, of course, many of our readers who did not know her and who will hear of her death unmoved, but for those who did know her the announcement will come as a solemn word. She was almost eighty-nine years old, and had survived most of her intimate associates, but she had a way of winning the love of young people, and many of us not of her generation loved her and admired her.

She was a cousin of the poet, Whittier, and, being a woman of beautiful feeling, refinement and culture, they were very intimate throughout the poet's life. I remember with much joy a visit which Edward Grubb and I had with Gertrude Cartland during the winter of 1900, when we were visiting the scenes of Whittier's life. She told us much of the man himself—his character, his spirit, his aspirations—and the old snow-bound birthplace became more impressive to us because of our visit with this woman who had given us a living impression of the great poet. She was for many years a leading teacher in the Friends school at Providence, where she put her impress upon the Quaker girls of New England; and at a later period, many of us who had not had the privilege of knowing her as a teacher, came to look upon her as a most beautiful type of Quaker woman, fair to see, pure in spirit, broad in sympathies, high-minded, loyal to truth, and yet full of charity for those who did not see as she did. I would that our new generation of Friends might embody the great traits of these dear souls who one by one are going away from us to the Father's House.

Current Events and Comments

The Friends Year Book—1911

The Friends Year Book for 1911, issued by a committee of London Friends, is a complete directory of the meetings, officers, committees, schools, settlements, institutes, missions, lecture courses and literature of London and Dublin Yearly Meetings. It is designed primarily as a book of reference, but contains much of general interest and educational value.

By way of suggestion, American Friends will find invaluable the diversity of activities indicated, as well as the organization and policy of committees, the literature suggested and the lecture themes listed. The amount of good work indicated, together with its many sidedness, is indeed impressive when compared with that done by Friends on this side of the Atlantic.

Among the forthcoming books which the Year Book announces are the following:

"The Beginnings of Quakerism," by William C. Braithwaite, with introduction by Rufus M. Jones. This volume, which is part of the Rowntree historical series, and covers the rise of Quakerism during the Commonwealth period, is the first attempt to write this chapter of our history from original and, to a large extent, contemporary sources.

"The Quakers in the American Colonies—1656-1780," by Rufus M. Jones which is another volume of the Rowntree series, based on a fresh study of original sources, throws much new light not only on the origin of American Quakerism, but likewise on the Quaker influences which contributed to the making of the American colonies. The section on Pennsylvania is by Isaac Sharpless; that on New Jersey by Amelia Mott Gummere."

"The Journal of George Fox," taken from the original manuscript, written at the dictation of George Fox, is to be issued, by the Cambridge University Press, in two volumes of about 500 pages each.

A similar year book for American Friends would be exceedingly useful.

Ministry in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting

In commenting upon the proportionate number of ministers in our several yearly meetings, we said, in an editorial of the 29th ult., that "Philadelphia stands at the foot of the list, with a minister for every 130 members." Since publishing this statement, we have been informed that there are four more ministers in the yearly meeting than our figures indicate, besides five or six from other yearly meetings who reside in or near Philadelphia and take an active part in the meetings for worship. This brings the total up to 42 or 43—about one for every 100 members, and ranks Philadelphia ahead of Wilmington, Western, North Carolina and Indiana.

In comparing the ministry of Philadelphia with that of other yearly meetings, however, there are a number of features more significant than statistics. The average Philadelphia minister is not likely to appear in vocal service as often as his brother in another yearly meeting, but, on the other hand, the ministry is more diversified and a larger proportionate number speak from the body of the meeting. In this count we do not include those who merely offer "testimony" or repeat texts. Such exercises have a measure of religious worth, but they hardly compare with the more original messages coming from a deeper moving. It is this quiet, spiritual travail, finding vocal utterance through a considerable number, including many of the members as well as the recognized ministers and elders, that gives to the ministry of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting its unique quality. If this deeper expression of religious life could become more general it would mark a forward step in American Quakerism.

Senatorial Elections

The will of the people as expressed by popular nomination has been confirmed by the Legislatures of Indiana, Michigan, Nebraska and Washington in the election of John W. Kern (Democrat), Chas. E. Townsend (Republican), G. A. Hitchcock (Democrat) and Miles Poindexter (Progressive Republican) to succeed Senators, Beveridge, Burrows, Burkett and Piles. Through the instrumentality of party caucuses the way has been paved for the election of Atlee Pomerene (Democrat) in Ohio, Chas. F. Johnson (Democrat) in Maine and George P. McLean (Republican) in Connecticut, and doubtless the re-election of Henry A. du Pont (Republican) in Delaware. In each of these instances the caucus was necessary in order to eliminate rival aspirants within the party. A number of re-elections have been made without this friction, i. e., Moses E. Clapp (Progressive Republican) in Minnesota, Geo. T. Oliver (Republican) in Pennsylvania, John A. Bankhead (Democrat) in Alabama and Geo. A. Southerland in Utah. One of the sharpest contests took place in Massachusetts, where Henry C. Lodge (Republican) has been re-elected with a bare majority. Henry F. Lippitt, successor to Senator Aldrich, Rhode Island, also won on a small margin. In Iowa no choice has been made, the votes at the time of this writing being distributed among nine candidates. New York, Tennessee and Montana are having like difficulties. North Dakota, with two Senators to elect, has divided the honor between the wings of the Republican party, choosing Porter J. McCumber a "Stalwart" and A. J. Gronna a "Progressive." In Missouri, Jas. A. Reed (Democrat) succeeds Senator Warner.

An unusual situation has developed in West Virginia, where 15 Republicans are preventing the organization of the State Senate by absenting themselves from the chamber. One of their number being required to make up a quorum, they have fled to Cincinnati to prevent arrest. The Democrats, who control the house, and the other 15 Senators have chosen Clarence W. Watson and Wm. E. Chelton for United States Senators, but the Governor has refused to recognize the action as "regular."

The Passing of the "Old Guard"

It will be a new Senate that comes together for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress; 55 of the 86 members who were in office six years ago will not appear in the chamber after Third month 4th, while 34 men holding seats two years ago will be absent at the opening of next session. Senator Cullom, Illinois, will then be the oldest Senator in point of service. He was sixth on the list in 1905. Other Senators of national reputation and large consequence at that time who will not be present when the Senate meets again are: Morgan, of Alabama; Hale, of Maine; Aldrich, of Rhode Island; Teller, of Colorado; Redfield Proctor, of Vermont; Burrows, of Michigan; Elkins, of West Virginia; Clay, of Georgia; Foraker, of Ohio; Platt and Depew, of New York; Spooner, of Wisconsin; Blackburn, of Kentucky; Dryden, of New Jersey; Hemenway, of Indiana; Fulton, of Oregon; and 29 others of lesser consequence.

The "old guard" has already been partially mustered out, and many of the remaining members will leave the ranks at the close of the present session. A majority of the Republicans will be "conservative," but the spirit of the ancient conservatism will be gone. Not only is Nelson W. Aldrich retiring, but his cohort of intimate associates will also be absent. Hale, Burrows, Elkins, Scott, Depew, Piles, Dick, Flint, Warner, Carter, Buckley and Kean will not be there when the Vice-president calls the Senators together for the Sixty-second Congress. Death has claimed one of them, and defeat the others. This makes the choosing of a new leader a matter of considerable moment. Frye and Cullom have been suggested for the position, but they are well on in years, and it is not likely that they could be induced to assume the responsibility of leadership. Among the "Progressives" there are two or three excellent men, well qualified for the task, but it is not likely that the "Conservatives" will give them the position. But whoever the leader may be, one thing is certain, his choice will mark the beginning of a new rule in the Senate.

The Income Tax Amendment

Fifth-day of last week was an auspicious time for the Income Tax Amendment, which has been submitted to the several State Legislatures for endorsement. On that day the Ohio House concurred with the State Senate in approving the amendment. The vote stood 100 to 3. Within a few hours the Legislatures of Oregon and Kansas also ratified the amendment, and Governor Bass, New Hampshire, sent a special message to the legislature urging its endorsement, and the matter was made a special order in the House for Fourth-day of this week. Twelve States have now ratified the Income Tax Amendment; the nine not mentioned above are Alabama, Illinois, Maryland, Oklahoma, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, South Carolina and Texas. Five States have voted negatively; they are New York, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Virginia and Louisiana. Friends of the amendment have reason to be encouraged, since the chances are now good that the amendment will receive sufficient endorsement to make it part of the Federal Constitution.

Scientific and Philanthropic Journals Hard Hit.

A large number of scientific and philanthropic associations publish a journal for circulation among their members, the subscription price of which is included in the membership fee. Among these are the Red Cross Society, the National Geographical Society, the American Peace Society, the American Forestry Association and a score of other like organizations. In practically every instance, if not in all, the journal is issued to promote the interests of the organization, and not for profit. In order to meet part of the necessary cost of publication, some have put advertisements in their columns, and a few depend upon this additional source of revenue for their existence. The Third Assistant Postmaster-general, who has absolute authority in the matter, has decided that such journals with advertisements are not admissible to the mails as second-class matter. Under this ruling the societies are obliged to pay a higher rate of postage, to eliminate all advertisements, or make subscription to their journals a voluntary matter apart from membership. This is a positive hindrance to scientific and philanthropic work, the ultimate result of which, if the order remains in force, may seriously cripple some of the societies.

The Great Essentials

BY HARRY R. HOLE.

"Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?" Ps. 15: 1.

It would be pleasant if we could find perfection in everything—if our homes, our business, our machines, our friends, could satisfy us in every particular. I mean it would be pleasant for a moment, for such a world would be rather monotonous, with nothing to be attained by striving.

In religion also we are inclined to murmur at the imperfection which is everywhere, yet is not this too, in part, our Father's way of making us really happy, and should we find true satisfaction in the mere contemplation of a finished product which would be incapable of improvement?

The great question then is this: What are the essential features without which any desired thing cannot serve its intended use? Finite things do not possess infinite perfection except to eyes blinded by ignorance or love; but millions of earthly good things are relatively perfect because they serve the purpose for which they were made. A wagon will carry a load whether it is beautiful or not; a draft horse need not be swift, nor a servant highly educated; a husband or wife may be lacking in some exceedingly desirable traits without creating regret in the least degree over the choice of a life companion. A Christian may be very full of faults in creed and conduct, yet be as true as steel.

In every case, then, we are to look first for the essentials. Having found these, we may give heed to the rest. And in considering our religious experience and associations we must, if we have the mind of Christ, put these above our personal preferences, whether in matters of doctrine, practice, system or incidentals.

The psalmist asks the vexing question, but for him there seems to be no vexation in it. He is perfectly clear in his own mind as to just what it takes to make a true citizen of Zion. And in the light of the New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ it seems unnecessary that we should be uncertain as to just what are the essential characteristics of the man or woman or child who has become a citizen of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Isaiah asks and answers very much the same question (33: 14-16), but does not answer with the same completeness as David in this passage; for here we find in suggestion all the elements which are elsewhere named as the whole requirement of God for us.

There are at least four Scripture passages which embody such a comprehensive statement, two in the Old Testament and two in the New. The wording is different, but the thought is the same, and the same order is observed. The threefold requirement is, "to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God" (Micah 6: 8); "truth * * * mercy * * * knowledge of God" (Hosea 4: 1); "judgment, mercy, and faith" (Matt. 23: 23); or,

"righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost" (Rom. 14: 17).

Anyone who is blessed with an elementary conception of ethics recognizes the duty of honesty. Not all would agree in defining its scope, but certainly the scriptural order, in which justice is placed first, would meet the approval of every sound mind. Witness the proverb which says that we must be honest before we can be generous. Jesus commands the worshiper whose affairs are not arranged with uprightness to leave his worship until he is reconciled with his brother. And certainly any true religious experience would be impossible without honesty toward God and one's own heart. Honesty thus is seen to be, in the terminology of the college catalogue, a "prerequisite" to every other virtue. In its comprehensive sense it must include every form of honor and righteousness.

The "natural" man describes his ideal character as one having regard to the law of uprightness, and sometimes stops there; but if reminded of some other human duties, he will acknowledge that the perfect man must not only pay his debts in the usual sense of the word, but that he must also be interested in the welfare of the weak and the unfortunate. Philanthropy is not the primary virtue, but it is a close second; so it must be acknowledged by sound reason, and so it is placed in the Bible. Jesus makes "mercy" a prerequisite of spirituality when He teaches that forgiveness of our fellow-men is a condition of forgiveness from God.

The third requirement is religious. It demands reverence for the true God, inward illumination, confidence in Maker and Redeemer, with the joy which is the necessary outgrowth of such a life. Here is where the "natural" man cannot follow us, for when he does, in the true sense, he ceases to be the "natural" man and becomes a "new creation."

The analysis of the perfect man under the old dispensation was exactly the same as under the new, Christ merely broadening and deepening the meaning of every point and bringing in a completeness to that which had been previously begun. It is in this perfecting of the old truths that He shows the character of His Kingdom and of the people who compose it.

(To be concluded next week.)

The California Field

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

IV. Sketch of Alamitos Meeting and Neighborhood.

Looking southward from a line drawn from Los Angeles through Whittier and ten miles beyond, a wide expanse of fertile land, embracing 400 square miles, descends gently to the sea. In this area, 16 miles southward of Whittier, is located Alamitos Monthly Meeting of Friends, including about 20 families, in a section possessing peculiarly interesting features, the ocean being only 10 miles distant.

Here in former years water for irrigation spouted up wherever the earth was perforated with a shaft; but increased pumping in the higher sections, and the draining of wet lands lying seaward, gradually weakened and finally stopped this artesian flow. This seeming misfortune has, however, proven a great advantage. With the top soil no longer water soaked as formerly, trees have been found to thrive much better, and the ease with which water may be pumped from a few feet below the surface with today's improved machinery makes an abundant supply always available. Under these conditions pasture lands are being subdivided and planted to fruit, especially oranges, which assures much larger profits. This change, with the late coming of the electric line from Los Angeles, marks a period of rejuvenation in this section that is full of promise.

In 1877 there came to this neighborhood from St. Catharine's, near Niagara Falls, Canada, two families of Friends, including John and Susan Beckett and their niece, and Alfred and Mercy Beckett and three daughters. Others, then here, from the same place who joined with Friends at the organization of the meeting, years later, were Mary Ann Hansler and children, and James Swayze.

The Becketts, being thorough Friends, cherished the hope that a meeting would be established here, and, as possibly opening the way for this, took a leading part in maintaining a Bible school, of which Susan Beckett was superintendent for six years following 1885, during which time they had occasional visits from ministering Friends, among them John Henry Douglas, who held a meeting in the schoolhouse in the summer of 1890.

In the autumn of this year, under arrangement of L. M. Baldwin, evangelistic superintendent, a large tent was pitched near the Beckett house, and Jeremiah A. Grinnell and Ella C. Veeder, with Sadie Bond and Mattie Wood as leaders of the song service, conducted a series of meetings continuing three weeks, resulting in many conversions. Steps were immediately taken for the establishment of a meeting, the enrollment of membership being largely made up of those not formerly Friends, and giving a signal illustration of successful work in Church extension. Among the pleasing features of this time of refreshing was the graceful yielding by the elder Becketts of their very decided conservative predilections, insomuch that they enjoyed and participated in the evangelistic methods of the revival.

A neat church building was soon erected, and was dedicated in Fourth month, 1891, William Wetherald and Jeremiah A. Grinnell having charge of the services. A monthly meeting was established in Eighth month following. Ella C. Veeder was chosen first pastor, continuing in this position six years. Among the valued members still remaining who joined or moved in during this period are Donald and James McMillan, J. Elmer Miller, and Alfred and Luther Newsome.

Pastors following Ella C. Veeder were Miles Reece, Tilman Hobson, Thomas Armstrong, Caroline N. Hunnicutt, George Taylor, Clifford Jones and John F. Hadley, the present pastor.

John F. Hadley is of the sturdy Quaker stock that has furnished to the Church so many efficient workmen bearing this family name, and is among the many whose lives have been impelled toward high ideals by the student associations of Earlham College. He previously served as pastor at Hadley, Amo, Mill Creek and Plainfield, Indiana, and at Lawrence, Kansas, where Governor Stubbs and family were among his parishioners. It is notable that many of the members of this meeting not formerly Friends are especially earnest in maintaining the Quaker standards and ideals, and highly prize the wider privileges accorded them in Church activities, with no disposition to misuse them. That this leads to wholesome freedom in worship, with no assertion of "one-man power" from the pulpit, was recently evident when seven prayers and twelve testimonies found prompt and edifying voluntary utterance preceding the sermon.

The Bible school here gives evidence of earnest and reverent interest in Scripture study, an impressive feature of the exercises which I witnessed being an earnest prayer by Superintendent Anna Parish for blessing on a little girl as she brought her birthday contribution, and a like invocation by Susan Beckett, when a member in advanced years made an offering numbering the milestones passed.

Of the elderly members active in establishing the work here, only Susan Beckett and Mary Ann

A CALIFORNIA CELERY FIELD.

Hansler now remain to serve with a deepening devotion the cause they love, as sunset sheds its amber beams about their pathway. Alfred and Mercy Beckett, pioneers in the meeting, now reside in Alhambra. Of the younger members of the original Canadian colony who are valued members of the meeting still resident here are James and Effie Swayze, Nellie Miller, Rosa Newsome and William J. Hansler.

An important improvement added to the church property a few years since is a commodious manse, which affords to each incoming pastor a comfortable home.

A remarkable physical feature of this section is found in the Peat Lands, a few miles seaward. These, years ago, were a vast bog of 5,000 acres, over which the vegetable mold of ages had formed a black soil, to which was added an incrustation of weeds and grass roots. But this was so yielding that horses in plowing it had to be provided with shoes 10 inches square, made of inch board, and were kept strictly to the land side to prevent bogging in the furrow. After the plowing, cultivating was done with hand implements, but the enormous crop production in this teeming soil was simply incredible. This area has been reclaimed by ditching and tilling, so that it is now cultivated with ease, but still the water oozes from the sub-soil in such abundance that 300 miners' inches are carried seaward during the present dry weather in one of the main drainage canals.

Celery grows luxuriantly on these lands, and 2,500 acres of this product are now being harvested, requiring a shipment of 25 cars per day. The sight of these green celery fields stretching far in the distance under the warm sunshine, as I viewed them on the 3d day of First month, with hundreds of busy hands preparing the product for market, gave some measurement of one of California's most remarkable agricultural industries.

English walnuts do well in the Alamitos neighborhood, and sugar beet growing has assumed large proportions. One of the four sugar factories of Orange County is only a few miles away, and uses 800 tons of beets per day in the season. Unimproved land suitable for any of these products, or for oranges, may still be bought here for $300 to $350 per acre.

Santa Ana, the county seat, a city of 9,000 people, is six miles distant, while Garden Grove, a growing town, is nearby. Both are reached by electric line.

Persons desiring further information may address Arthur Lewis, Garden Grove, or Wm. J. Hansler, R. F. D. 2, Santa Ana.

As significant of what this generation may do for the next in timber growing in California, I measured a eucalyptus tree at Alamitos, planted the year before the Becketts came, and found its circumference eleven feet, three feet above the ground. It is estimated to be 125 feet high.

Why Neutralize the Panama Canal?

A statement emanating from Boston gives six reasons why the Panama Canal should be neutralized—not fortified. Richard Olney, ex-Secretary of State; David Starr Jordan, president of Leland Stanford, Jr., University; William Dean Howells, author; Charles P. Anderson, Protestant Episcopal bishop, Chicago; William H. P. Faunce, president of Brown University; Jane Addams, Hull House, Chicago; George B. Holt, justice of the United States district court; Henry Wade Rogers, dean of the Yale Law School; and George Foster Peabody, the New York banker, are among the sponsors of the document. The statement follows:

1. Because the canal would be safer in war-time without fortification. According to the agreement signed by The Hague Conference in 1907, unfortified coast places cannot be bombarded.

2. Because the original intention of our Government, as distinctly expressed in 1900, and previously, was to prohibit fortifications on the canal. Though this prohibition was omitted in the finally revised Hay-Pauncefote treaty, signed in 1902, this in no wise implies that we ought to fortify it, nor was its construction proposed as primarily a military undertaking.

3. Because, though the Suez Canal was built with English money, England agreed to its neutralization. The Straits of Magellan are also neutralized, and the Interparliamentary Union, in 1910, declared in favor of the neutralization of all interoceanic waterways.

4. Because the United States in all its history has never been attacked, and began every foreign war it ever had, and it is too important a customer for any great nation at this late day to wantonly attack. Though an enemy might, in stress of war, be tempted to break its pledge to us, no nation would dare break its neutralization pledge with the combined Powers, as the penalty of non-intercourse, which could be included in the general treaty, would involve commercial ruin.

5. Because, with the experience of nearly a century's peace with England, insured by our undefended Canadian borderline, until we have asked for complete arbitration treaties with all possible future enemies, and have been refused, we should be insincere in increasing our war measures. This is especially true in view of the facts that since 1902 the nations have signed 100 arbitration treaties, and President Taft has made the impressive declaration that he sees no reason why any question whatever should not be arbitrated; that the second Hague Conference in various ways diminished the likelihood of war; that not only the prize court, but the court of arbitral justice, is practically assured; and that in the summer of 1910 Congress unanimously passed a resolution asking the President to appoint a commission of five to consider the utilization of existing agencies to limit the armaments of the world by mutual agreement of the nations, and to constitute the world navies "an international force for the preservation of universal peace and to consider other means to diminish expenditures for military purposes."

6. Because, in the words of Hon. David J. Foster, chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, "The initial expense of the necessary fortifications would not be less than $25,000,000; in all probability it would not be less than $50,000,000. The annual expense of maintaining such fortifications 2,000 miles from home would probably amount to $5,000,000. With all the fortifications possible, it is still apparent that in order that the canal might be of military advantage to the United States in time of war, a guard of battle-ships at each of its entrances would be an absolute necessity. It is equally apparent that with such a guard the fortifications would be unnecessary, if not entirely useless. We are bound by solemn treaty obligations to see to it that the canal shall be and remain forever open to British ships, in time of war as well as in time of peace, and while it is probably true that no other nation could claim any advantage by virtue of this treaty, it is also true that we have thereby placed ourselves under moral obligation to maintain an open canal for the ships of all nations at all times, in war as well as in peace."

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

Keystone meeting, in Marion Quarterly Meeting, Indiana, has just closed a successful series of meetings, led by the pastor, E. E. Hartley, assisted by DeWitt Foster.

* * *

Evangelistic meetings are now in progress at Sycamore, Ind., conducted by Bertha Day. Their local pastor, Ira Johnson, is expected to join in the work before the meetings close.

* * *

Professor J. Edwin Jay and wife and little son, Howard, of Guilford College, spent the holiday season in the city of Tampa, Fla., and visited other places of interest in the State.

* * *

The 11th inst., the faculty and staff of Bryn Mawr College, Bryn Mawr, Pa., gave a tea for the graduate students in Denbigh Hall. The tea was largely attended and was very successful.

* * *

A meeting has been announced for the Second Friends Meeting in Marion, Ind., to begin the 22d inst., conducted by Ada E. Lee, the resident pastor, assisted by Virgil Brock, Fairmount.

* * *

On invitation of Dr. Horace Porter, Riverside, Cal., President Thomas Newlin, of Whittier College, gave an address in the First Congregational Church of the city, the 8th inst., on "The New Nationalism," the discourse being on the line of the World Peace Movement.

At a recent meeting of the directors of the Whittier Board of Trade, Thomas Newlin, president of Whittier College, was chosen president of the organization for the third year in succession.

Friends at Mt. Airy, N. C., observed peace day the 18th inst. The pastor, Leannah Hobson, preached on the subject at the morning service to a large congregation. The evening meeting was on missions.

* * *

New England Yearly Meeting is remembered with a bequest of $5,000 in the will of the late Jonathan B. Farnum, a birth-right Friend, which was admitted to probate at Woonsocket, R. I., on the 17th inst. The money is to be used for the purpose for which the Society was organized.

* * *

Clarence Garner of New Salem Monthly Meeting, Ind., closed a successful revival of three weeks the 25th ult., at Lapel, Ind. India Freeman, Westfield, led in the singing. There was a general awakening among the young people, three conversions, two renewals, and many blessed through the ministry of the young man.

* * *

Miriam A. Maxwell, Cupertino, Cal., passed her ninetieth birthday the 9th inst., and over 50 of her friends sent letters or cards, as tokens of their love and esteem. They came from nearly every State in the union. One Friend in his ninety-fourth year said, "Thy name is on my marriage certificate, dated 1839; the only one living I believe." In addition to letters and cards, a number called personally to see her.

* * *

Willis Bond is assisting E. J. Carter, Azolia, Ind., in a series of meetings and visiting the families of Sand Creek meeting, where he was formerly pastor.

John Thomas, brother of the late Francis Thomas is in his ninety-first year and is still able to go to church when the weather will permit.

* * *

One of our subscribers, William Zimmerman, Hillsboro, Ala., who is in his eighty-eighth year says he has taken The Friends Review and THE AMERICAN FRIEND for nearly two-thirds of a century, and adds: "I cannot see how any Friend who is interested in the movement and progress of the church, can be satisfied without it."

* * *

The new academy building at Northbranch, Kans., is nearing completion. The academy students are preparing a play which will be given when the new building can be used. At the mid-week meeting of the church, the students have the regular endeavor lesson and then others follow or the pastor gives a talk always well suited to the young.

* * *

The meeting at Greensboro, N. C., had adopted the policy of printing a list of its officers and committees in convenient form for framing. One copy is hung in the meeting-house and each family is provided with a copy. During the five years which this has been done it has greatly enhanced the efficiency of the working force in the meeting.

* * *

Truman Kenworthy, pastor in East Main Street Meeting, Richmond, Ind., and Ida Parker, pastor in the local meeting, held an eight days' mission at West Elkton, Ohio, the 15th inst. The weather conditions were unfavorable, and the appearance of two cases of scarlet fever in the neighborhood made it seem proper to close sooner than had been planned.

* * *

Since the retirement of L. Oscar Moon as pastor of the Friends meeting at Fall River, Mass., who was engaged as Field Secretary of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting, the Fall River meeting has not called a regular pastor. Any minister of the Society of Friends, feeling called to make application for the position should do so by writing to A. Homer Skinner, P. O. Box 414, Fall River, Mass.

Leander Chambers, pastor in West River and Old Center meetings, Ind., has held revival services in both places within the past few weeks with good success. At the former place he was much handicapped, yet a good work was done and two conversions resulted. At the latter place much interest was shown and the attendance was excellent. At the close of the meeting there were twelve accessions to the church.

The eighteenth quarterly meeting belonging to Kansas Yearly Meeting was set up in Eleventh month. It is known as Gate Quarterly Meeting and formerly comprised the western part of Stella Quarterly Meeting in Oklahoma. At the opening session of the quarterly meeting a request was granted for the setting up of a new monthly meeting at Knowles—First month 28th was fixed as the date.

* * *

Dr. I. S. Harold, who is at present managing Siloam Sanitarium, Soap Lake, Washington, is visiting his family and friends at Richmond, Ind., where he had practiced medicine for a number of years. He made a short visit with his son, Earle J. Harold, and family, in Worcester, Mass., attending the annual supper and rollcall of the Worcester meeting the 12th inst., and the morning meeting on the 15th.

* * *

Ira D. Kellogg, a minister of Des Moines, Iowa, held a series of meetings at Miami, Okla., from the 8th to the 15th inst. The members were revived and much good was done. Every family in the meeting was visited, also the two large public schools of the city. This feature of Ira D. Kellogg's work was most effective, though a full house at every meeting told how much the people appreciated his talks.

* * *

A series of evangelistic meetings closed at Leavenworth, Kans., the 8th inst. They were conducted by Frank Smith, Leon, Kans. Besides one conversion and three renewals, many were definitely blessed. Frank Smith expected to begin a meeting at Springdale on the 11th inst., and later hold meetings at Stanwood, but was called home by telegram. Thus the revival work in Springdale Quarterly Meeting was postponed for a time.

* * *

The two adult classes in the Bible school of East Whittier meeting, located four miles from Whittier, Cal., recently devised the plan of uniting in a monthly social as a means of promoting the interests of the school. This is held at different homes in turn, and includes an interesting program and the serving of refreshments, those not attending the school being especially invited. Material additions to the Bible school enrollment have been secured in this way.

* * *

A delegation from the Representative Meeting of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, in company with Congressman Butler, Pennsylvania, called on President Taft last week and presented an address on universal peace. It contained not only arguments on universal peace, but specifically urged that the President use his influence to prevent the fortification of the Panama Canal, and to take all necessary steps to secure the early ratification of an arbitration treaty with Great Britain.

* * *

A three weeks meeting has just closed at West Milton, Ohio. It was conducted by John L. Kittrell, Farmland, Indiana, assisted by the pastor, Martha F. Harris, and her husband, Chester F. Harris, who is a gospel singer. It was the greatest awakening experienced in the place for years. John Kittrell used great liberty in the Gospel, and Chester F. Harris contributed very much to the success of the meetings as leader in chorus and song. Old and young were reclaimed or converted to the number of about 75. Of this number a great part will unite with Friends.

* * *

Mary A. Sibbett, Wichita, Kansas Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Temperance, favored the meeting at Tonganoxie, First-day morning, the 8th inst., with an excellent sermon. In the evening she delivered one of her stirring temperance addresses to a large and attentive audience.

On the 16th inst., the local meeting was again favored with the presence of Charles E. Tebbetts, of the American Friends Mission Board.

Calvin C. Kesinger, of Tonganoxie Meeting, has returned from Friendswood, Texas, where he went as a member of the committee to establish a new quarterly meeting.

Stanton Pearson and wife and an invalid daughter are spending the winter in Mexico for the benefit of the latter's health.

Stanton Pearson has been a leader in the Tonganoxie Meeting for nearly forty years. He is identified with the business interests of Tonganoxie and is now president of the Farmers' and Merchants' State Bank.

The recent session of the monthly meeting in Toronto, Can., was a time of unusual interest and profit. The annual reports from all departments of the meeting were presented. They show steady progress. A young people's prayer meeting has been established to meet half an hour before the First-day evening meeting. These meetings are well attended and are times of refreshing.

The letters from absent members were heard with much appreciation. There were ten young people received into membership by request.

* * *

A revival effort of three and a half weeks closed at Marshall, Ind., Christmas time. The meetings were held by Martilia Cox, assisted by her sister, Mary A. Cox, who is the local pastor.

People from all the churches were in attendance and several confessed their sins, some acknowledging that church-membership was not Christianity.

More than 25 were definitely blessed. Eight or ten were added to the church. The work goes on by the organization of new Bible classes and a C. E. for the young people.

Revival meetings continuing through two and one-half weeks, were concluded the 11th inst., at Keystone, Ind. The pastor, Edward E. Hartley, was ably assisted by Murel Wilson, Charlottesville, Ind., from Twelfth month 25th to First month 7th, and by Dewitt Foster, Penville, Ind., from First month 1st, to the close. The preaching was very convincing and helpful. There were several conversions and renewals and the church was strengthened. At the last session opportunity was given and five united with Friends, four of whom were heads of families. More are expected to join in the near future.

Baltimore Quarterly Meeting held a conference at Washington, D. C., the 14th inst., to discuss "Consistent and Adequate Methods of Work." The subject was taken up in two sections, "the development of the present membership," and second, "church extension." Under the first division "ordinary activities" and "infrequent activities, or innovations," were considered; and under the second grand division, the "established meetings," "occupation of new fields," and "methods in new fields," were discussed. The conference could scarcely have been more comprehensive and practical.

Friends at Newberg, Oregon, took it upon themselves to celebrate the fifteenth anniversary of the marriage of their pastor and wife, Abijah J. and Ivaln Weaver, the 2d inst. The manse was beautifully decorated in different greens from the woods, mixed with carnations, calla-lilies and roses fresh from the garden. During the afternoon and evening many friends called to extend congratulations and good wishes. The ladies of the meeting served light refreshments. In the evening music was furnished by the Junior Choir, followed by an orchestra from the Senior Choir. Gifts of crystal and a liberal purse, manifested the love and appreciation of many hearts.

In writing of his recent visit to Fishertown, Pa., L. Oscar Moon, Field Secretary of Baltimore Yearly Meeting says: "During the special meetings held most of the evenings throughout my fortnight's visit and on First-days, a steady increase could be noted in the attendance and the impression upon the community. People of varying religious persuasions were invariably present, notably of the other branch of Friends, and all were disposed to unite in the effort to serve the best religious interests of their town and surrounding country. Steps were taken to form a Quaker Round Table and to organize the young people into a society for worship and service, so that the interest aroused may be properly followed up."

The death of Richard A. Ricks, Richmond, Va., means a great loss to the little Richmond meeting of which he was an esteemed elder, and for whose welfare he felt deeply concerned.

He was born in Southampton County, Va., but most of his life was spent in Caroline County, where he took an active interest not only in the education of the white children of his county, but also of the colored children. For many years he personally taught a colored Bible school. He was also interested in all other matters of public concern, and represented his county in the Legislature of 1893-4.

His life was an exemplary one. Quiet and unostentatious in his manner, he manifested his religion by his every-day life.

Jonathan Votaw, whose obituary appears in this issue, was born in Wayne County, Indiana, Twelfth month 26, 1823. He removed to Iowa in an early day and settled in Henry County, where he and his wife lived on the same farm for thirty-six years, until their seventh child was grown. They moved to Tacoma in 1884, subsequently spending a short time in California, but finally made their home in Tacoma. His widow, Jane B. Votaw, survives him. They were married sixty-two years, and celebrated their diamond wedding anniversary two years ago. Besides a widow, he is survived by two sons, Moses, of Tacoma, and Luther, of Raymond, Wash., and two daughters, Rachel Whitacre, California, and Bell Williamson, Tacoma. Three sons are dead, one of them being the late Henry L. Votaw, postmaster of Tacoma, who died Twelfth month 9, 1910. For fifty years Jonathan Votaw was active in the Society of Friends and was an elder in the meeting.

Scipio Quarterly Meeting was held at Poplar Ridge, N. Y., the 14th and 15th inst. S. Adelbert Wood from Sandwich Meeting, New Hampshire, and Richard R. Newby, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, were present, and their ministry much appreciated.

The quarterly meeting concurred with Scipio Monthly Meeting in recording Walter H. Wood, Principal of Oakwood Seminary, as a minister of the Gospel. Friends at Union Springs asked that the quarterly meeting be held there in Fourth month instead of Skaneateles, and the meeting so adjourned. An inspiring and instructive message was received from David Tatum, and a committee was appointed to prepare a suitable reply. In the absence of the clerk, Charles B. Weaver was appointed clerk for the day.

William Wilmore, president of the local C. E. society arranged for a rally the evening of the 13th. Other nearby societies were invited to take part, and the field secretary of the yearly meeting C. E. Union, Dr. Bernard Clausen, gave an instructive address. Richard R. Newby also spoke with much feeling.

On First-day the third of First month, there was distributed to the members and attenders of the Minneapolis meeting, a bulletin which gave a brief summary of the work of the church for the past calendar year. The first page is devoted to a fine cut of the meeting-house and a directory of the various officers of the meeting and allied organizations. On the inside pages are messages from the pastor, superintendent of the Bible school and presidents of the W. F. M. S. and C. E., besides various items of local interest.

On the last page is an annual statement of receipts and expenditures of the six different departments of work and a summary thereof. From the latter we note that there has been raised $2,691.77 in all, of which $165 went to foreign work, $286.53 to home benevolences and $2,240.24 for home expenses, including ministerial support. There are about 60 contributing members in the meeting which makes an average of about $45 per member.

At the close of the meeting the right hand of fellowship was extended to five new members, four men and one woman.

On the 7th inst., a meeting of the Bryn Mawr alumnae of eastern Pennsylvania, southern New Jersey and Delaware was held in the college tea room immediately succeeding a luncheon which was attended by about 100 alumnae. The meeting was called to discuss whether a branch association of the alumnae association should be formed for the purpose of acquainting the alumnae in the neighborhood of Philadelphia with the question which would be discussed at the general alumnae meetings at the end of First month, the idea being that branches of the alumnae association should be formed in different parts of the country with the same object in view, one advantage being that the alumnae who could not attend the annual meeting should still be able to express their opinion and to hear what business was being undertaken by the association. It was unanimously decided to form a branch, members of the alumnae association living in the specified districts being ipso facto members of the branch. Elizabeth Butler Kirkbridge was elected chairman of the meeting and president of the branch association which was formed. The branch will have one meeting annually in Eleventh month.

The death of Nathan T. Pickett, noted elsewhere in this issue, marks the passing of one of the strong Friends in Oregon. Liberal in thought and kind in action, he was known as everybody's friend.

He was born in Randolph County, N. C., Eighth month 31, 1829. Left an orphan at ten years of age, he was taken to Indiana and lived with the late Nathan Pickett, Kokomo, Ind., who educated him at the Bloomingdale Academy, Bloomingdale, Ind. Ninth month 8, 1852, he and Kesiah Barker were united in marriage in Sugar Plain Meeting, Thornton, Ind., and located at Crawfordsville where he was employed in school teaching.

In 1861, he moved to Walnut Grove, Ind., and twenty-one years later to Dallas County, Iowa. Later he passed two years at Western Springs, Illinois, and from there went to Salem, Oregon, where he resided until death.

He was a life-long member of Friends, a firm believer in the Christian faith, and demonstrated by a consistent life, the claims he made for the Gospel he loved.

His wife, who shared his life for fifty-eight years, and seven children survive him.

Friends in Worcester, Mass., brought all the business of their monthly meeting to a focus the last Fourth-day in Twelfth month, when all committees, trustees of funds, the Bible school, Endeavor Society, Women's Foreign Missionary Society, Pastoral Committee and pastor made reports and recommendations, and various officers and committees were elected for the ensuing year. The annual church supper and rollcall occurred on Fifth-day, the 12th inst., and was a most delightful occasion. In response to their names, many of the members expressed hearty thankfulness for the blessings of the present year, and declared their renewed allegiance to their Master and His Church. Responses were read from absent members residing in Lansdowne, Pa.; Upper Darby, Pa.; Providence, R. I.; Southbridge, Enfield, Mendon, Shelburne Falls and East Brimfield, Mass., and Danielson, Conn. A ladies' quartet sang "A Song of the Seasons," and in response to his name, Earle J. Harold, the pastor, sang "Fear Ye Not, O Israel." As the annual business meeting marks the close of the year, so the annual supper and rollcall mark the beginning of the new year. The Quaker Round Table meets the first and third Sixth-day of each month, and great interest is shown by both older and younger people. The attendance has ranged from 18 to 30. The next meeting will be "Whittier Evening," with "Snowbound" experienced in the old-fashioned way, if the plans of the committee and the snowfall can "work out" together. Cottage prayer meetings are being held in the homes of members of the meeting living in the various sections of the city, and especially where Friends are not able to attend the meetings at the meeting-house. It is hoped in this way to reach some who are not members of any church, as well as to encourage those who are. For the second winter Earle J. Harold, the pastor, is conducting a noon shop Bible class in one of the machine shops, in connection with the Y. M. C. A. of the city. There are 15 different classes conducted by ministers and laymen, preaching the Gospel to over 6,000 men each week. These leaders meet every Seventh-day at the Y. M. C. A. for dinner and reports and discussion of the work. A Men's Brotherhood was organized last month, although the men had been together for supper and "a talk" a few times before. At the last meeting Winthrop G. Hall, assistant superintendent of the Spencer Wire Mills, gave a very interesting and instructive talk on the "Manufacture of Wire."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I desire to call the attention of Friends to an article in The Christian Endeavor World of First month 5th. On page 283 of the paper is an article by Chas. H. Parkhurst, pastor of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York City, entitled "Commune with Your Own Heart." One of the foundation principles of our religion is here dwelt upon in a manner most penetrating and illuminating by a master mind. The article in question occupies more than a page of the paper, and seems to touch on so many aspects of a great truth, and yet the thoughtful reader feels that not a sentence can be spared.

Thy friend,

RICHARD SIMMS.

Selma, Ohio, First month 15, 1911.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I think it may interest American Friends to hear the following pronouncement by a Romish Archbishop of Philadelphia, against validity of marriage of Friends with Churchmen or Presbyterians. It came out in the following manner:

A Presbyterian woman was married to a Roman Catholic in a Presbyterian meeting-house near Belfast, and the pair lived happily together for three years, when a priest called and told the woman her marriage (which was fully in accordance with British law) was illegal and her children illegitimate and she must be married again by a priest; as she positively refused to do so, her husband was frightened by the priest and connived at the two infants, one about a month old and the other about a year old, being kidnapped, and the furniture of their house being taken away.

Notwithstanding all her exertion, the mother cannot find her children, and her husband has disappeared entirely, but the priest promises, if she will submit to the second marriage, the children will be restored.

Several of the Romish clergy here in their sermons have publicly justified the priest's action. This intolerance has caused great indignation through Ulster and at a monster demonstration held in Belfast last night to protest against the attempt by Romanists to set up a Papal decree as overriding the law of the land, the Protestant Bishop of Doan Connor and Drumore, said: "The decree, as summed up in a recent pamphlet by the Rev. John T. M'Nicholas, O. P., which he held in his hand, with imprimatur on it of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Philadelphia, stated 'Marriage of a Protestant to a Protestant (provided they were never baptised in the Catholic Church) is valid.' He feared they were not thankful as they ought to be for that generous concession. And for this reason, if for none other, the right to declare a marriage valid implied also the right to deny its validity; and they know how Rome had denied the validity of Protestant marriages when she had the power to do so, as in Spain and France; and they had no mind to submit their actions to her decision. Nay, more, this very decree claimed a power far outside the case of followers of Rome if the Rev. John T. M'Nicholas is correct, for in his summary he further states, 'Marriage of a Protestant (baptised) to a non-baptised party is no marriage at all.' Quakers and such like were living in open sin if married to a Churchman or to a Presbyterian!"

Thine truly,

JOHN PIM.

Belfast, Ireland, First month 1, 1911.

BIBLE BEES.

The "Bees of the Bible" are very numerous. They never sting; they yield a great deal of honey, and it is their nature to be found together in swarms. Here is a specimen of them:

"Be kindly affectioned one to another."

"Be sober and watch unto prayer."

"Be content with such things as you have."

"Be strong in the Lord."

"Be courteous."

"Be not wise in your own conceit."

"Be not unmindful to entertain strangers."

"Be not children in understanding."

"Be followers of God as dear children."

FIRST QUARTER. LESSON VI.

SECOND MONTH 5, 1911.

ELIJAH THE PROPHET APPEARS IN ISRAEL.

1 KINGS 17.

For Special Study, Verses 1-16.

GOLDEN TEXT.—They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing. Ps. 34:10.

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, First month 30th. Note of defiance. 1 Kings 17:1-7.

Third-day. Unwasting meal. 1 Kings 17:8-16.

Fourth-day. Widow's son restored. 1 Kings 17:17-24.

Fifth-day. Upheld in famine. Ps. 37:1-27.

Sixth-day. Elijah sent to Zaraphath. Luke 4:16-30.

Seventh-day. Of like passions. James 5:1-20.

Time.—It is not possible to give very accurate limits. Elijah lived during the reign of Ahab in Israel and Jehoshaphat in Judah, and their successors, perhaps, between 878-857 (Curtis) or 920-900 (Beecher.)

Place.—Different places in Israel and in Phenicia. Cherith, a brook flowing into the Jordan from the east. Zarephath was a Phenician town between Tyre and Sidon, it is called Sarepta in Luke 4:26. A. V.

Parallel Passage.—None.

Five lessons are now devoted to the life and work of Elijah. We hear little of the history of the kingdom, the interest in the great man of God throws all else into the shade; and so of his great successor, Elisha. Without any preface the figure of Elijah comes upon the Biblical canvas and dominates all else. Fond as the Jews were of genealogy, no parent or descent is given, but with abruptness, he is brought before us. In the words of Ecclesiasticus "There arose Elijah the prophet as fire, and his word burned like a torch," (48:1). No character in the Old Testament is more picturesque, few more interesting. Clad in sheepskin robes, with a leathern girdle about his loins, with bare limbs, and hair unkempt, he was certainly a figure to startle a luxurious monarch. He was the ideal Hebrew prophet—suddenly appearing, and as suddenly passing out of sight, speaking words of warning that terrified the souls of his hearers. So deep was the impression he made, that others would fain copy his outward garb, and so strive to "assume his authority without his inspiration," (Zech. 13:4). When it was needed to describe the character of his great successor it was said, "He shall go before his face in the spirit and power of Elijah," (Luke 1:17). There could be no higher characteristics.

1. "Elijah the Tishbite." Note that he is not called a prophet, but simply designated by his dwelling-place. The Septuagint has here "Tishbeh of Gilead." From the Apocrypha (Tobit 1:2) we know there was a place of the same name in Galilee. Like Amos (Amos 7:14, 15) he seems to have received the Divine call as a private person. His name means, "Jehovah is my God." "As the Lord, the God of Israel, liveth, before whom I stand." R. V. This was his authority. He was in the service of Jehovah. Compare Chapter 10:8. "There shall not be dew nor rain."

Drought was always considered to be a mark of Divine displeasure. Compare Deut. 28:23, 24.

2, 3. He delivered his message, but his mission in life was not ended, and so he was sent away from the wrath of the king. "Brook Cherith." The word "brook" is not a good rendering of the original; "ravine" would be better. Deep ravines are common in Palestine; at the bottom of these there is frequently a stream in winter. Cherith has not been identified; it was doubtless in Gilead and in territory known to Elijah. "Before Jordan," a phrase to express what we mean by "east of the Jordan." "Hence," means from the court and surroundings of Ahab.

4. "Drink of the brook." As long as there was water. "Ravens." This famous passage so woven into the story of Elijah has given rise to an immense amount of discussion. The raven was an unclean bird to the Israelite (Deut. 14:14), could it be that such a bird should be chosen to supply the prophet with food? It is not possible to answer this objection unless the Hebrew word has been wrongly translated. As is well known, the ancient Hebrew has no vowels indicated; therefore it is quite possible the word has been mistaken. To illustrate: suppose in English the Hebrew practice was followed, and one came across the letters h t, by supplying vowels, we should get hat, hit, hot, or hut, and only the connection would show which was meant. In this place supplying the Hebrew consonants with other vowels a word is formed which means "desert-dwellers," or Arabs. This would answer every objection and be not out of harmony with the context. It makes little real difference what view is taken, for the essential point is, that God promised his wants should be supplied, and He could use the wild Arab, as well as the wild raven, to carry out His purpose and fulfil His promise.

7. The rainy season closed, and the torrent, as is the case with numberless streams in that land today, dried up.

9. "Widow woman." An archaic expression, common in the 17th century. The Amer. R. V. omits "woman."

10-16. Few stories are more graphically and at the same time as simply told as this. It needs no comment. "Oil." Olive oil, still a most important article of food in the Mediterranean lands. "Cruse." An old word, meaning an earthenware jar or jug. It is allied to "crock," from which "crocery" comes.

"Barrel," (verse 12), better, "jar." The Hebrews did not have barrels in the modern sense.

The rest of the chapter should be read.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. God may make use of unknown, and even of most unlikely, persons to carry His message.

2. "God gives us, almost every day, new and sad experiences to educate and test us."

3. No matter how humble and insignificant we are, it may be our lot to minister to great saints, or, at any rate, to minister to the needs of another.

CHEATED FOR YEARS.

PREJUDICE WILL CHEAT US OFTEN IF WE LET IT.

You will be astonished to find how largely you are influenced in every way by unreasoning prejudice. In many cases you will also find that the prejudice has swindled you, or rather made you swindle yourself. A case in illustration:

"I have been a constant user of Grape-Nuts for nearly three years," says a correspondent, "and I am happy to say that I am well pleased with the result of the experiment, for such it has been."

"Seeing your advertisement in almost all of the periodicals, for a long time I looked upon it as a hoax. But after years of suffering with gaseous and bitter eructations from my stomach, together with more or less loss of appetite and flesh, I concluded to try Grape-Nuts food for a little time and note the result."

"I found it delicious, and it was not long till I began to experience the beneficial effects. My stomach resumed its normal state, the eructations and bitterness ceased and I have gained all my lost weight back."

"I am so well satisfied with the result that so long as I may live and retain my reason Grape-Nuts shall constitute quite a portion of my daily food."

canal so it could be held against the attack of any first-class power.

He asserted that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which still is in effect, specifically provides for the neutralization of the Isthmian waterway. "For 100 years," he said, "the United States has been committed by treaties to the neutralization of the canal across the Isthmus, regardless of the nation that built it."

* * *

The general effect of the agreement secured by consultation with Canada and Newfoundland in regard to disputes over the fisheries is to eliminate the necessity of reference to The Hague tribunal. The United States and its neighbors on the north prefer to settle all these matters quietly by conference or appeal to a tribunal mutually constituted. This is the result of recent conferences in Washington and the appointment of this tribunal of appeal will follow. In regard to the regulations of Canada and Newfoundland complained of by American fishermen, Canada has made a few slight concessions and the Newfoundland government is considering the requests of the United States. But in general it may be said that while we are to enjoy the rights secured by treaty and confirmed in The Hague decision, our fishermen are to be subject to the same regulations as the Canadian and Newfoundland people, and matters of dispute are to go to the new arbitration board.

Ten million dollars for peace; think of it, and Andrew Carnegie is the man who gave it. In fact he turned over to a board of trustees, securities valued at $11,500,000 as a "foundation" for the establishment of universal peace by the abolition of war between nations and such friction as may impair the progress and happiness of man. When wars between nations shall have ceased the fund is to be applied to such altruistic purposes as will best help man in his glorious ascent by the banishment of the "most degrading evil or evils" found to be harassing mankind then and in ages to come.

Twenty-seven prominent men are named on the board of trustees, among whom are Elihu Root, United States Senator; Nicholas Murray Butler, president Columbia University; Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching; Joseph H. Choate, lawyer, ex-Ambassador to Great Britain; Albert K. Smiley, Lake Mohonk and Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University.

While in the Chamber of Deputies last Third-day, the French Premier, Briand, was the mark of a would-be assassin. The man fired two shots from the spectators' gallery before he was seized, but both of them missed their mark. One of them struck Leon Mirman, director of the Department of Public Assistance, who was sitting near the Premier. His wound, however, was slight, and recovery should be rapid. This is the second attack on Premier Briand's life within the past few months. It is a little difficult to explain why he should be a "marked" man, because he has come from the "common people" and is a conscientious and able official. He has had a brilliant public career.

As a Socialist he was little heard of until he was made reporter of the Church and State Separation bill. His work resulted in his elevation to the post of minister of public instruction and worship in 1906, and he became a prominent figure during the turmoil over the Separation act. Upon the death of M. Guyot-Dessaigne, in December, 1907, he became minister of justice, retaining also the portfolio of public worship. When the Clemenceau ministry fell, M. Briand was called upon to form a Cabinet.

During the recent railway strike in France, the premier won a notable victory for law and order. He suppressed lawlessness with a firm hand, and at the same time secured concessions for the strikers. At the time his course was bitterly attacked by the Socialists, but he was vindicated by Parliament, which endorsed his actions with a vote of confidence.

M. Briand was born in Nantes in 1862. He studied law and was early recognized as a brilliant scholar and orator. The responsibilities of office sobered his judgment, and as he became more conservative, the Socialists frequently twitted him of his early radical leanings and especially of his defence of Hervé in 1903, when the latter was prosecuted for his anti-military writings.

INSIDE HISTORY.

SOME SELF-EXPLANATORY LETTERS.

Battle Creek, Mich., Jan. 7, '11.

Dr. E. H. Pratt,

Suite, 1202, 100 State St.,

Chicago, Illinois.

My Dear Doctor:

"Owing to some disagreement with... magazine several years ago they have become quite vituperative, and of late have publicly charged me with falsehoods in my statements that we have genuine testimonial letters.

"It has been our rule to refrain from publishing the names either of laymen or physicians who have written to us in a complimentary way, and we have declined to accede to the demand of attorneys that we turn these letters over to them.

"I am asking a few men whom I deem to be friends to permit me to reproduce some of their letters over their signatures in order to refute the falsehoods.

"We have hundreds of letters from physicians, but I esteem the one that you wrote to me in 1906 among the very best, particularly in view of the fact that it recognizes the work I have been trying to do partly through the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

"I do not sell or attempt to sell the higher thought which is more important than the kind of food, but I have taken considerable pains to extend to humanity such facts as may have come to me on this subject.

"In order that your mind may be refreshed I am herewith enclosing a copy of your good letter, also a copy of the little book, and if you will give me the privilege of printing this over your signature I will accompany the printing with an explanation as to why you permitted its use in publication in order to refute falsehoods, and under that method of treatment I feel, so far as I know, there would be no breach of the code of ethics.

"I trust this winter weather is finding you well, contented and enjoying the fruits that are yours by right.

"With all best wishes, I am,

"Yours very truly,

"C. W. Post."

Dr. Pratt, who is one of the most prominent and skillful surgeons in America, very kindly granted our request in the cause of truth and justice.

Mr. C. W. Post,

Battle Creek, Mich.

Chicago, Aug. 31, 1906.

My Dear Sir:

"I write to express my personal appreciation of one of your business methods, that of accompanying each package of your Grape-Nuts production with that little booklet "The Road to Wellville." A more appropriate, clear headed and effective presentation of health-giving auto-suggestions could scarcely be penned.

"Grape-Nuts is a good food in itself, but the food contained in this little article is still better stuff. I commend the practice because I know that the greed and strenuousness, the consequent graft and other types of thievery and malicious mischief generally can never be cured by legislative action.

"The only hope for the betterment of the race rests in individual soul culture.

"In taking a step in this direction, your process has been so original and unique that it must set a pace for other concerns until finally the whole country gets flavored with genuine, practical Christianity.

"I shall do all that lies in my power to aid in the appreciation of Grape-Nuts, not so much for the sake of the food itself as for the accompanying suggestions.

"Visiting Battle Creek the other day with a friend, Dr. Kelly of Evanston, Illinois, while I was consulting with Mr. Gregory, my friend visited your factories and came away greatly amazed, not only at the luxurious furnishings of the offices generally and the general equipment of the place, but with the sweet spirit of courtesy and kindness that seemed to fill the air with a spiritual ozone that was good to breathe.

"The principles expressed in the little booklet, "The Road to Wellville," I well know are practical and they work in business of all kinds, including sanitariums, as will be fairly tested before time is done.

"I know you will not regard this letter of appreciation as an intruding one. It is simply the salutation of good fellowship to you from a man who, although he has never seen you, feels drawn to you by the kinship of thought.

"The only thing that makes a man live forever in the hearts of his countrymen and his race is the good that he does. Your position in this respect is an enviable one and I wish to extend my congratulations.

"Yours respectfully,

"E. H. PRATT."

Arcturus.

O crimson star, how can you shine so bright
Above the blackness of yon eastern hill?
War, pestilence and famine, gruesome ill
Of sense and soul have stalked beneath your light.
Three thousand years since, to Job's failing sight,
You brought forth faith and armed anew his will.
Mankind, grown weary of the flesh, would still Curse God and die but for that sense of right,
Holding all life in an unswerving way.
You through the ages destined to endure
Some mighty sun burning with healing ray—
Man in his fitful, passionate, insecure
Moment in endless space—still praise that name
Whose precepts are from age to age the same.

TOPIC FOR SECOND MONTH 12, 1911.

LESSONS FROM GREAT LIVES: II. JOSEPH.

Gen 41: 14-41.

(Consecration Meeting).

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Second month 6th. The value of dreams. Gen. 37: 5-11.

Third-day. Consecrated purity. Gen. 39: 7-21.

Fourth-day. The world's hatred. Gen. 37: 3, 4, 23-28.

Fifth-day. Patient in tribulation. Gen. 41: 1, 9-13.

Sixth-day. Virtue exalted. Gen. 41: 14-16, 41.

Seventh-day. Forgiving love. Gen. 45: 4-15.

The beginning of Joseph's career found him as a young man the petted son of a partial father, and the only person on his horizon was himself.

The unfolding of Joseph's career found him in slavery and then in prison, the unfortunate victim of intrigue and false accusation, but the trusted servant of an Egyptian soldier and the ready helper of two unfortunate court officials.

The climax of Joseph's career found him on the throne with Pharaoh, grappling with the exigencies of a great famine, saving a nation's life, killing by kindness the hatred of his brethren and bringing an unlooked for joy to a father's broken heart.

Joseph was a youth whose early life became a series of bitter disappointments. Ambition, success, reputation fell in utter ruin at his feet. The wheel of circumstance dealt harshly with him. Fate seemed against him. All his hopes were thwarted, but he learned that fate doesn't govern life. Faith taught him a faithlessness in fate. He learned that disappointment is His appointment. (Gen. 45: 5-8, a most remarkable estimate of life.)

* * *

The wheel of circumstance is run by God. Your life is the clay. God is the potter.

"Time's wheel runs back or stops: Potter and clay endure."

"O Will, that wiltest good alone,

Lead Thou the way, Thou guidest best;

A silent child, I follow on,

And trusting lean upon Thy breast.

And if in gloom I see Thee not,

I lean upon Thy love unknown;

In me Thy blessed will is wrought,

If I will nothing of my own."

* * *

Few lines in the Old Testament which echo the world-wide experience of misfortune are more Christian in their outcome than that of Joseph. In the life of Noah, peace follows storm, but it comes through the ceasing of the tempest; in the life of Job, happiness follows misfortune, but it comes in spite of the loss and suffering; in the life of Joseph, personal prosperity follows personal disaster, and miserv, but it comes because of and through the trouble. This is Christian philosophy. Life comes because of death. The resurrection is made possible by the cross. The thorns make possible the crown.

"Then, welcome each rebuff

That turns earth's smoothness rough,

Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand but go!

Be our joys three-parts pain!

Strive, and hold cheap the strain;

Learn, nor account the pang; dare, never grudge the throe!"

* * *

Joseph was recognized as one in whom the Spirit of God dwelt. (Gen. 41: 38.) This was the testimony of other people, not Joseph himself. Your associates will know of your fellowship with Christ, not by what you say or what you wear, but by what you are. Titles or badges, or garb in the realm of the Spirit are nil, character is everything. "Your life speaks so loud I cannot hear what you say," is pertinent centuries after Christ and centuries before Christ. Customs, speeches, manners, beliefs change, the principles of character estimation abide.

* * *

Man easily recognizes God's hand in the molding process of peoples and nations; he often fails to perceive that hand in the carving of his own character. Joseph saw God's hand in both the individual and humanity. He found God making his own life, then using his life to save the life of humanity. This is ideal, this is Christly.

* * *

Joseph's life tells the story of how a spoiled and petted son became a man of strong character. It was a severe lesson, but the case was a severe one and promised dire consequences. "The coat of many colors" or more correctly, "the long coat with sleeves" marked him as the dandy, the fop, the dude of his day. Considering his poor start, and judging by the general results from such beginnings the miracle of his successful and unselfish life is the more remarkable. Surely the Lord was with Joseph. (Gen. 39: 2.)

"It took thirteen years to fulfil Joseph's dream! But it was a great dream, and God took time to work it out. The baker and butler had theirs answered in three days.

"Thirteen years discipline for Joseph. But remember, God was now training a spoiled child."

Joseph exemplifies the power of divine leadership, especially amid outward conditions where the superficial observer would say that a man was the victim of capricious and fateful circumstance.

"Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne,— Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown, Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own."

"Joseph may be said to be a type of Christ. The Master's purity and unselfishness, His readiness to serve, the envy and hatred which burned in the hearts of those who should have welcomed Him and which hounded Him to His death, His uniform kindness even to His enemies, and His conquest of those enemies by the power of love—all find exemplification in the Old Testament picture of Joseph. Though these awaited their full manifestation till the coming of the Son of Man, the story of the life of Joseph, fondly repeated or read from generation to generation, was preparing the world for His advent, and for His matchless work."

News in Brief

Chicago liquor dealers are receiving their dues. Fines aggregating $51,550 and penitentiary sentences ranging from fifteen months to two and a half years, have been imposed on a number of the dealers by Judge Landis in the United States District Court.

Dr. Edward Samuel Corwin is to be advanced to the rank of a full professor in history and politics to take the place of Dr. Woodrow Wilson, in Princeton University. Dr. Corwin is a graduate of the University of Michigan, later receiving the degree of Ph.D. in American history at Pennsylvania.

A bill providing for a permanent tariff board of five members to investigate all questions for the benefit of Congress as well as the President, has been unanimously agreed upon by the House Committee on Ways and Means, and the bill was expected to come up early this week. The prospect for its passage is good.

The demand in this country for diamonds and other gems in 1910 has resulted in the importation of about $40,000,000 worth of cut and uncut precious stones and pearls by New York dealers. In 1908 only $12,862,896 worth of gems were entered at this port. In no previous years, with the exceptions of 1906 and 1909, has the total ever reached $40,000,000. In 1906, which was a big year in the diamond trade, the appraised value of gems at the port was $43,573,488, and in 1909 the gems were valued at $40,494,356.

Andrew Carnegie's gift for research has already accomplished much for knowledge and has encouraged him to add to its resources another $10,000,000, making $25,000,000 in all which he has devoted to this work. The Dangers of Literalism

We are all agreed in our estimate of the incomparable value of the Bible as a source of spiritual truth and illumination. After all these years of minute study, merciless research and fearless investigation, the Bible still remains the great Book of divine revelation, offering age after age its messages which make us wise unto salvation and its living words of reproof and discipline and instruction.

The real differences regarding the Bible, at least among Evangelical Christians, are differences in the method of studying and interpreting it. How shall we find out what this spiritual legacy to the race truly means? That is, I think, the important question, and that question is answered differently by different persons.

"Take it literally just as it reads; do not twist its words or wrench them this way or that," is one answer to the question, How shall we study it? One trouble with this answer is that we cannot translate it from its original languages—the Hebrew, the Aramaic and the Greek—without somewhat changing its meaning to suit our own ideas, for each original word has many English meanings, among which we must select one, and the one we select will always be the one we prefer.

But that is not the main difficulty with this method of taking Scripture "literally just as it reads." If you take it literally, you almost certainly miss its meaning, for a book which is saturated with inspiration cannot be a mere literal statement of fact like a book on geography or mathematics, but it must, on the contrary, be loaded with spiritual meanings and suggestions. One has only to make the experiment to see how the literal method breaks down and fails. For instance, there is a wonderful passage which says that "God sitteth on the circle of the heavens and the people on the earth look to Him like grasshoppers." It would be very difficult to take that literally, and equally so that fine passage which declares that "they that wait upon the Lord shall mount up with wings as eagles!" You do not get the meaning until you penetrate the spirit of the words and feel their deeper significance. Try the literal method with almost any words of Jesus. For example: "If any man take thy coat let him have thy cloak." "If thy right hand offend thee cut it off." It does not work well. The real meaning always lies beneath the crust of the bare words, and in almost every case, the letter kills the true meaning.

The fact is, the literalist only works his method in spots. When it suits his purpose to take the words literally, he does so; but when it does not, then he spiritualizes them. If he is an advocate of the rite of baptism, then all passages which use the word "baptize" must be taken to mean baptize with literal water, while he quietly spiritualizes the command to give all your goods to the poor, and the command to wash each others' feet! He thus gets out of the Bible what he wants, but he never finds out what it really teaches.

It would not so much matter if this method did not play such havoc with the Book, and still worse havoc with Christian beliefs. The bitterest controversies have grown out of this capricious literalism. One party says, "This passage is to be taken literally"; the other party says, "No, it isn't, but that other text is." So the war of words goes on, and both parties are missing the real message.

Anyone who takes the pains to read the literature on "Christ's second coming" will be impressed with the truth of what I have been saying. It is a controversy of texts.

The person who advocates a second coming, as yet to occur, takes many texts literally, but by a strange oversight he never sees the texts which positively say that persons then living shall not taste death till they see the Son of Man come, and the equally positive passage of St. Paul that "we (including himself) which are now alive shall be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." If second-coming teaching is to be taken literally, then it is certain that the coming must have occurred in the lifetime of the disciples and of St. Paul.

But what I have said is sufficient to make it evident that the literal method is an impossible method of interpretation—it does not lead to truth; it only leads to the conclusions which the interpreter is seeking to establish. I shall endeavor next week to discuss another method of arriving at the truth of Scripture.

Current Events and Comments

Friends and the New "Defense Law" in Australia

Australian Friends deserve universal sympathy on account of the distressing conditions imposed by the new "Defense Law," which went into effect the first of this year. It appears that all children over twelve years of age are subject to military drill, and that all adult males are liable to service in the army. Every boy from twelve to fourteen is considered a "Junior Cadet," and may be exempted from military drill providing the government authorities are satisfied that he is receiving adequate calisthenic "drill" in the local school. It is not unlikely that the Friends school at Hobart can satisfy the authorities in this requirement; but when a boy reaches fourteen he becomes a "Senior Cadet," and school drill will not suffice. He must then go to the military drill ground or to the barracks. If he fails to join the cadet corps or to present himself for military drill when called upon, he will be arrested and detained as a prisoner so long as he refuses to comply with the requirements of the law. There seems to be no exception.

In the case of army service a slight concession is made to those who are conscientiously opposed to war. They may be used for subsidiary duties, such as ambulance work, camp functions and transport operations. Friends, however, do not feel that this concession in any wise meets their scruples, since it is quite as much against their principles to serve under orders and abet in carnage as it is to handle artillery. Australian Friends made a quiet yet firm remonstrance while the bill was before the national parliament, but were unsuccessful in their demands; and while they regret exceedingly that the government has forced them into an apparent opposition to the laws of their country, they will not consent to the military training of their children or to service in the army. They do not wish to pose as martyrs, but undoubtedly this will be their lot.

The following paragraphs are taken from a letter written to the Minister of Defense defining the position of Friends. Considering the circumstances under which they were penned, they seem moderate indeed, and we cannot help admiring their spirit:

"Because the character and mission of Jesus Christ should influence His professed followers under all conditions, such obligation must be paramount in that particular aspect of human relationships which we are now considering. And let it be noted that He gave very few directions as to what should be done under specified circumstances. He left with His disciples a general principle which would be applicable everywhere and always.

"That He expected this principle would not receive application in human laws all at once, but only gradually, is clear enough; because He told them they should have tribulation in their early endeavors to translate their belief into practice; yet He bade them look forward to a time when the world would be overcome by His spirit. Has not this been the experience of the last nineteen centuries? When a sufficient number of men have become enlightened upon any particular point, legislation has moved in that direction; and this process is still going on. But, unless a few people are willing to act upon their convictions, regardless of consequences, how is it possible for any improvement to come about?

"I think if this view of the matter is carefully thought out the members of our religious body will not be accounted impracticable dreamers, unfitted for this work-a-day world. They will be seen to be just as practical as when they worked towards religious liberty, political freedom, cessation of slavery, reform in prison discipline, and a right attitude of thought, as well as a proper sense of justice, towards manual labor."

A Reciprocity Arrangement with Canada

A reciprocity arrangement affecting about 90 per cent. of the trade between the United States and Canada has been negotiated and the measure has been submitted to Congress and the Canadian Parliament. The arrangement is intended to enlarge and liberalize trade, and will undoubtedly have a tendency to check the present rise in the cost of living; but it also has a deeper social and moral significance in that it strengthens the ties which bind together the two principal nations of North America.

According to an announcement from the State Department, the basis of the agreement is reciprocal lists on leading food products, such as wheat and other grain, dairy products, fresh fruits and vegetables, fish of all kinds, eggs and poultry, cattle, sheep and other live animals.

Also certain commodities now free in one country are to be made free by the other, such as cottonseed oil by Canada and rough lumber by the United States. Tin andterne plates, now dutiable in both countries, are made mutually free.

Barbed-wire fencing, now exempted from duty by Canada, is also exempted by the United States. Some raw materials, such as mica and gypsum, which enter into numerous industries, are to be made free by the United States. Printing-paper is to become free on the removal of all restriction on the exportation of pulp wood.

The total amount of duties to be remitted by the United States is $4,850,000; by Canada, $2,560,000.

There will be considerable opposition to the measure and it will be an easy matter to keep it from coming to a vote at this Congress; but President

Taft has made up his mind to push it, and he may call an extra session of Congress if such a move seems likely to get the arrangement ratified.

Fancy Salaries a Thing of the Past

The death of Paul Morton furnishes an opportunity for the Equitable Life Assurance Society to reduce the salary of its president from $80,000 to $50,000 a year. When Morton assumed this position, in 1905, the salary of the president was $100,000. However, on account of the public agitation respecting the high cost of insurance management, and the unpleasant disclosures attending the Armstrong investigation, he requested that his salary be reduced 20 per cent., so that he might ask other officials of the company to accept similar reductions. The trustees have now agreed on $50,000 as a maximum salary for a president. This followed the announcement that the salary of James A. Farrell, the new president of the United States Steel Corporation, would be $50,000 a year instead of $100,000, which has been paid to William E. Corey, the retiring president. There has been an extraordinary change in corporation management in the last few years. Only six years ago Richard A. McCurdy, then president of the Mutual Life Insurance Co., in testifying before the Armstrong Committee, told how he had been pleasantly surprised one day on hearing that his salary had been raised from $100,000 to $150,000 a year. The salary of McCurdy, however, will probably stand out for all time as the highest price paid to any officer of a corporation. Those who know say that $50,000 hereafter will be the maximum pay of corporation officials in the United States. There are only a few exceptions to this now on Wall Street, and in the country at large there are probably not over half a dozen men receiving more than $35,000 a year.

French Academy Refuses to Admit Madame Curie

It is to be regretted that the French Academy of Science has finally decided that none but men can be admitted to its membership. The occasion for this action was the candidacy of Madame Marie Curie for the seat once occupied by her husband, and after his death by the late M. Gernez. Madame Curie was a co-laborer with her husband, Prof. Pierre Curie, in discovering radium, and her brilliant work in scientific research is everywhere recognized as placing her in the front rank of scientists. Some time ago there developed in the academy a strong movement to honor her with a membership, but the Institute of France, which is made up of five academies, decided to adhere to its old policy of admitting men only, and the Paris academy followed the lead of the larger organization. The discussion, however, was heated and the vote close. Though the French academy has failed to admit Madame Curie as a member, her place in the scientific world is secure.

Senatorial Elections Last Week

The election of James E. Martine (Democrat) by the New Jersey Legislature is not only a victory for a worthy candidate, but for honorable methods in politics. Governor Wilson has led the fight on the "machine," and though not an experienced politician, he has completely routed the opposition. To use the words of another: "He has not bought support with offices or promises of office; he has not pitted against underground methods other underground methods. His appeal has been made to public sentiment; his victory is a victory of public sentiment; his confidence in the outcome was nothing more nor less than confidence that the people were sound at the core. In the fullest possible sense of the word, Woodrow Wilson's victory is a victory for honest politics."

The Tennessee Legislature has chosen Luke Lea (Fusionist) as successor to Senator Frazier. Lea is only thirty-two years old, and will be the youngest member in the Senate.

The deadlock continues in New York, Iowa and Colorado, and the tangle in the West Virginia Legislature has not been unraveled.

Another Achievement in Aviation

Heretofore the problem in connection with the use of aeroplanes in naval warfare has been to provide a smooth surface sufficiently large for starting and landing the machines. This Glenn H. Curtiss has solved by providing attachments so that his machine can float as a skiff. In a trial effort last week he succeeded in starting his biplane from the surface of San Diego Bay, in alighting in the water and then rising again. An aeroplane thus equipped can be lowered from a dreadnaught at will, and launched and landed in the water alongside. This is another invention which should have a salutary influence, since it increases the hazards of war.

Remember the Maine

When the truth is known, the supporters of the late Spanish War will not be so keen to "Remember the Maine." According to information which has reached the War Department from Havana, the battleship "Maine" was sunk by an explosion from the inside. Engineers are now preparing to raise the old hulk from the Havana harbor, where it has remained a gaunt reminder of the Spanish War, since the tragedy of Second month, 1898. The operations have disclosed the presence of human bones and a considerable quantity of coal outside the ship in the mud of the harbor, and it is the opinion of the engineers that the men were killed by an internal explosion which forced their bodies, with the coal, through the hull of the ship. This was the contention of the Spanish authorities at the time of the catastrophe, but the American public was too much beside itself to heed.

The Malihini Christmas Tree

BY CHAS. E. LEWIS.

A few years ago a small party of American tourists found themselves in Honolulu at the Christmas season, 3,000 miles from home, and among entire strangers. They had not before realized that they were so far from home and friends. Tourists seldom experience loneliness or homesickness until the time of one of the old home festivals approaches.

While talking over the gloomy prospect, it occurred to them that they might make the Christmas time a merry one for many of the children of Honolulu whom poverty might otherwise bar from such happiness. No sooner had the plan formed in their minds than all homesickness vanished, and they at once set out to bring about a fulfilment of the happy thought. They asked the city mission superintendents, slum and settlement workers, Salvation Army people and others interested to inform them of the number of tickets to the Christmas tree they could distribute among the poor children of the city who, for any reason, would have no part in Christmas Day joys. The workers appealed to at once promised their hearty co-operation, and the tickets were placed in their hands. They did their part faithfully, reaching as nearly every eligible child as the short time would permit. In the meantime none were so busy as the Malihinis (the Hawaiian word for strangers or newcomers, equivalent for the California "tenderfoot"). They had secured a suitable tree, and had made wholesale purchases of candies, nuts, fruits and of all kinds of toys that delight the hearts of children.

Across the street from the Alexander Young Hotel, where the tourists were staying, is a small, open, grassy park surrounded by ornamental trees—an ideal place for a Christmas celebration in this climate. The authorities readily granted the use of the park, and here on Christmas morning the large tree was set up and gorgeously decorated with all that goes to make a Christmas tree beautiful. Probably only a very small number of the throng of children present had ever seen a Christmas tree, perhaps most of them coming from pagan homes.

And probably no one present had ever seen a more beautiful one, fairly loaded with good things and dazzlingly radiant in the morning sun. Everyone in the city learned of the Malihini Christmas tree, and the people came by the thousand to witness the Christmas cheer, until the adjacent streets were solidly packed, and from every vantage point of the surrounding buildings—doors, windows, roof gardens—beaming faces looked down upon the happy scene in the park.

The children streamed past the loaded tables in long, double lines, and no one was allowed to pass until pockets, hands and arms were filled. The mingled astonishment and happiness on the faces of the 1,200 children was good to see. And none were more happy than the Malihinis themselves, who had thus turned a lonesome Christmas into the most delightful one they had ever had, realizing anew the old truth that, as they expressed it, "it is more fun to give than to get." When each child had received his presents, a prominent judge of the territory entered the park, most warmly commended the strangers in the name of the people of the city, and made a short address to the children regarding the meaning of it all. Thus came about the Malihini Christmas tree.

The charm of it took such hold upon the people of the city that it has become a regular feature at the Christmas festivities of Honolulu. Although it is no longer in the hands of strangers, it is called the Malihini Christmas tree, in honor of its founders. It is in charge of a committee of citizens, prominent in social, business and governmental circles. Contributions for the expenses are all entirely voluntary, no soliciting of any kind being used except a simple announcement in the papers as to the manner in which they will be received and used. It has outgrown the small park where it was first held, and this season it was held in the spacious capitol grounds. The tree, a splendid fir, more than 40 feet high, was planted midway on the front steps of the old royal palace, and the sun, bursting through the morning clouds, transformed it into a sparkling vision of beauty. From the central flagstaff of the palace floated Old Glory, while from the lower turrets waved the flags of the old royal régime. The Royal Hawaiian Band played the national anthems and old Christmas carols, and the whole scene was one of pleasant festivity. The entrance to the rope enclosure about the front of the building was a beautiful arch of palm branches. About this and in long, double lines about the grounds, in perfect order, were nearly 2,500 children—clean, and bright, and expectant, but showing many marks of privation.

While the final preparations were being made, the venerable Sanford B. Dole, Hawaii's first president after the revolution, was introduced to the children and gave them a happy and most fitting talk, closing by suggesting three cheers for the strangers who instituted the happy custom, and their successors. The cheers were given by the children with a hearty good will, which fairly made the city ring with Christmascheer for blocks around. Then there was a busy time for Santa Claus and his 50 helpers at the tables as the children poured in through the arched gateway and past the tables, where they were loaded with candy, fruits, dolls, toys of every description, pocket-knives, baseballs (bushels of them were standing about the tables), masks and other things that gladden the child-heart. More than $1,000 had been contributed to the fund during the two or three weeks preceding Christmas, and the supply of good things for the children was quite ample.

It was a motley throng of little ones that passed the beautiful tree to receive their simple gifts. Every nationality of the many in the islands was represented. There were faces of every shade, and costumes of every race. Some of the children carried little tots too small to walk in the line. Some were lame and walked with crutches. All went away with full hands and happy hearts. And who knows but that these simple Christmas tokens of love may be seeds of truth dropped into darkened hearts, ready to spring up when watered by the sweet story of the Christ Child as told by some of His faithful messengers. Long live the beautiful custom of the Malihini Christmas tree!

The Great Essentials

BY HARRY R. HOLE.

(Concluded.)

There are not many essentials to Christianity, but there are a few things which are indispensable. It is not safe to proceed in our enumeration without very clear authority from the divine Founder. It is very questionable to regard anything as an essential except what is clearly named as such in the great, authoritative handbook of the Christian religion, the New Testament. Some of these things we find in statements introduced by the significant word "except," while in other cases the word is not used, but implied; but wherever such a sweeping statement occurs, only the rankest disloyalty to Christ can admit any exception whatsoever. Such statements may, perhaps, be grouped under five headings. They refer largely to spirituality, and assume that the "prerequisites" have been taken care of—unless in cases where these same prerequisites must needs be enforced upon unregenerate men.

1. Regeneration. "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God" (John 3:3, 5). "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18:3).

2. Consecration. The demand that disciples should hate and forsake all that was dear to them was made not only upon those called apostles, whose duty it became to go from place to place with Him, but upon all who would be His disciples. As a universal condition of discipleship, it was most clearly stated, proclaimed in the ears of the great multitude that went out after Him (Luke 14:25-33). This is a high standard, and one which, no doubt, was expected to limit or reduce the number of followers, for it meant, in the words of Paul, that all things must be counted refuse for the excellency of this knowledge; and it meant in practical life, as it means today, that sensuous and social and intellectual pleasure should cease to be regarded as the criterion of happiness, and that earthly life should be filled full with the new purpose of spreading the Kingdom of God.

3. Sanctification or holiness is an essential to genuine and complete Christianity not in the highly specialized sense, nor wrapped in the unwarranted technicalities with which an overactive reasoning faculty and an underexercised intelligence have commonly invested it, but in the plain, simple, practical and incontrovertible sense of holy Scripture. Without this no man shall see the Lord; for into the eternal city shall in no wise enter anything that defileth; "for the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world" (Titus 2:11, 12). The characteristics of scriptural holiness are purity of heart and cleanness of hands; its sum and substance is perfect love toward God supremely, toward men equally. Its normal fruit is a life which men must approve, as well as emotions which the possessor can feel.

4. Communion. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you" (John 6:53). "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me" (John 15:4). "Watch and pray * * * for the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak."

5. Faith. Perhaps it is at this point that we are most perplexed to know just what is essential; but our difficulty is of our own making, or results from an ignorance of the nature of faith.

"Without faith it is impossible to please him, for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him" (Heb. 11:6). "He that believeth not is condemned already * * * And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil" (John 3:18, 19). "Then said they unto him, What shall we do, that we might work the works of God? Jesus answered and said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent" (John 6:29).

What is the saving faith? Is it faith in the Scriptures? No, for we read of those to whom He said, "Ye search the scriptures, because ye think that in them ye have eternal life; and these are they that bear witness of me; and ye will not come to me, that ye may have life" (John 5:39, 40). Is it faith in the Church? There is no such suggestion in Holy Writ. Is it believing in Satan? No, for however convincing the evidence of his existence, we have no cause for confidence in him.

All the emphasis is put upon faith in Christ, as when Jesus found the man born blind and asked him, "Dost thou believe in the Son of God?" (John 9:35). When the Philippian jailer cried out, "What must I do to be saved?" the answer was simple and direct, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

But what must we believe about Christ? There are many good things to be believed, and yet we find very few items in the test creed of the New Testament. When Philip would put the Ethiopian to the final test, he did not enlarge upon the articles of faith, but he did enlarge upon the man's state of heart: "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest." A few fundamentals thoroughly believed are better than the whole of the most elaborate confession casually accepted.

A suggestion is found in the words of the Saviour to the Jews, when He said, "for except that ye believe that I am he, ye shall die in your sins" (John 8:24). To the one who rejects the only sacrifice for sins, there remaineth no other (Heb. 10:26); so, to those who rejected the only Messiah who ever had come or should come, there was no redemption. To them the great necessity was to believe that Jesus was the Lord's anointed, for earnest people, believing, must submit themselves to His sway.

The saving faith is the faith that worketh by love. True faith is a confidence sufficient to lead to action, which in this case means obedience to His commands. It is more than a mere acceptance of facts; it is confidence practically demonstrated, proving its own existence by the fulfilment of the prerequisites and the other essentials which have been named. It is spiritual rather than intellectual.

Let it not be thought that these essentials can be fulfilled in isolation the one from the other. The flesh has fruits, but the Spirit has fruit; the flesh has works, but the Master prescribes one work. The Christian life is a unit, not a combination of characteristics. There can be no perfect honesty without a measure of mercy, nor a full-fledged goodness apart from faith. Regeneration and consecration and holiness are inseparable, however necessary that special attention be given to each in its own order; to pretend to hold to one and repudiate others is solemn mockery.

If this seems too much to ask of humanity, if anyone is inclined to cry, with the psalmist, "It is high, I cannot attain unto it," the reply is this: It is not for any man to make the standard of the Gospel. It is already made. It is for us to accept or reject. But if any honest soul feels the vastness which separates the real from the ideal, let him not forget that the same Lord who lays down these laws has likened true faith to a grain of mustard seed, noted not for its great size, but for the principle of life within it. And He has thus taught us to look not to the accomplishments already recorded, but to the true and honest purpose of our hearts, and to His unfailing grace, that we may put ourselves into position to "grow * * * in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

The Nestorian Tablet

One of the most ancient and reliable testimonies to the missionary zeal of the early Christian centuries is the Nestorian Tablet at Sianfu, China, which was the subject of an interesting paper presented by Dr. J. W. Davis to a meeting of missionaries recently held in the "Quakerage" at Nan-king. A digest of Dr. Davis' discussion is given in the Friends Oriental News, as follows:

The Nestorian tablet consists of a stone slab, seven feet high and three feet wide, containing an inscription of 1,700 characters. With base and capital included, the whole tablet stands twelve feet in height. It was erected in 781 A. D., and discovered in 1625 by a Jesuit priest. This tablet stood for a long time outside the city of Sianfu, in the province of Shensi, but is now suitably placed within the walls.

The tablet contains an inscription in Chinese and Syriac. That in Syriac is a list of ministers; the Chinese inscription is of far more interest. It consists in:

- I. An outline of some Christian teachings.
- II. A rehearsal of the patronage of Chinese emperors of the true faith.
- III. Praise of God, religion and Christian emperors.

This inscription refers to God as the Creator of all things, visible and invisible; to man as created of God, holy and commanded to rule the world; to Satan, the seducer of man; to the Messiah, emptied of His glory and coming to the world in the form of man, heralded by angels, born of a virgin, located by a star, visited by Persians (wise men), revealing life and destroying death, fulfilling ancient laws (Old Testament), setting forth original conversion for the soul's deliverance, and instituting the baptism of water and of the Spirit.

This tablet confirms the fact in Church history that the Nestorian missionaries came to China with their statement of the Christian faith; it also testifies that for nearly three hundred years, about 600 A. D. to 900 A. D., the Nestorians were very influential in the empire, China at that period being the most civilized country on earth, while Europe sat in the darkness of the Middle Ages.

It seems unlikely that the Nestorians translated the Bible in the vernacular for the use of the common people; on the other hand, there are indications that a translation was placed in the palace at the capital (at that time Sianfu). Dr. Davis remarks: "It is a warning to beware of trying to plant Christianity in China without the Bible. It is also a great encouragement. If Christianity made such an impression upon an age so enlightened as the Tang dynasty, and continued to stand through successive eras and to be so widely extended as the Nestorian Church undoubtedly was up to the fourteenth century, and all this without the printed Bible, what may we not expect if Christianity is established upon the Word of God?"

A duplicate of this tablet was made in 1900 and taken to New York City, where it can be seen in the Metropolitan Art Museum.

"Wait"

BY ANNA S. JONES.

John Kitto, in his most interesting "Bible Illustrations," devotes one chapter to these words of Isaiah: "For they shall not be ashamed that wait for me."

He writes: "This little monosyllable is fuller of meaning than any other word in the language, applicable to all ages and circumstances; so simple a thing as scarcely entitled to be called a grace, yet larger promises are made to it than to any other except to faith; and hardly indeed with that exception, for the grace of 'waiting' is part of the grace of faith."

At once my mind turns to the old-time custom of Friends of "waiting before the Lord," and to the recent articles in THE AMERICAN FRIEND on "Progressive and Conservative Quakerism." While, as a progressive, so-called, I sanction and enjoy many of the "innovations" which have been adopted under "the stress of new conditions," I do believe that in this quiet waiting before the Lord lies the real secret of the attractiveness and power of a Friends meeting, that through obedience to this "form of faith" they "stand this day as one not ashamed." And not only in "meeting," but in daily life have Friends maintained this characteristic of "waiting," of "constant looking to the Lord," of "constant dependence on Him," of "vital faith in Him," which in many trying circumstances, political, social and otherwise, has marked them as a "peculiar people." "Blessed are all they that wait for Him," for "in quietness and confidence shall be your strength."

Dear Friends, let us not depart from this; no matter the urgent need of new methods, there can always be a time in which to "keep silence" before Him, that the "people may renew their strength."

"Wait on the Lord, trust also in Him and He shall bring it to pass." In this real waiting before Him, such blessings may rain down from the "heavens full of pentecosts" as to "make people quake as in the days of early Friends."

"Wait, applicable to all circumstances," and to none more so than to missionary life among the heathen. No one needs more to learn this blessed privilege of waiting, as I can truly testify.

"To take heed and be quiet, that we may so follow after love that we may live it into the lives of these heathen; that 'standing still' they may see the salvation of the Lord." "Be still and know that I am God. I will be exalted above the heathen."

To wait on Him for courage, patience, strength, three vital requisites in a worker's life. "Wait on the Lord, be of good courage and He shall strengthen thy heart. Wait I say on the Lord."

How blessed this waiting! How gracious the Father! What perfect peace of a "mind stayed" on Him. For no one can say, "I waited patiently for the Lord," without the joyful sequence, "and He heard me."

"They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength. They shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint."

Laurence Friends Academy

Out on the rolling prairies of Beaver County, Okla., formerly known as "No Man's Land," on the southwestern frontier of Kansas Yearly Meeting, in one of the largest and most important fields of service in the Church, stands Laurence Friends Academy. It is the radiating center of a new quarterly meeting, composed of seven monthly meetings which cover a territory nearly 100 miles across and embrace a membership of nearly 500. The academy is experiencing a year of unprecedented prosperity, and while in the act of paying off a large debt of former years, the friends of the school have been taxed to their limit with the additional burden of providing means for the erection of a boys' hall and a principal's cottage. Many Friends and others have contributed to this work by donations of money and labor. The lower story has been finished and tastefully arranged as a pleasant home for the boys and teachers. The building so far has cost in the neighborhood of $600, outside of the donated labor involved in its construction. Two hundred dollars are still needed to complete the building in order to accommodate the increasing attendance. All funds coming in from tuition, over a bare living for the teachers who are directing the work, are going back into the development of the school.

Besides work in the regular four years' academic courses, students have the advantage of superior instruction in music, agriculture and art under the direction of graduates in these subjects. The special course in agriculture, conducted by William Pinkham Newsom, B.S., a graduate of Purdue University, Indiana, is arousing the interest of the farmers of the surrounding country who are attending and taking part in the discussion of the topics presented.

It is the purpose to hold a farmers' institute soon, to be addressed by some of the most prominent agriculturists of the West.

Situated over 200 miles from the State Agricultural and Mechanical College, the academy presents an admirable point for the establishment and maintenance of a secondary school wherein agriculture, carpentry, smithing and broom-making could be taught under the supervision of a special teacher.

A large number of students are taking regular work and Bible study, and some are preparing for the foreign mission field. The girls' hall, in charge of Carrie Miser, formerly superintendent of the William Foster Home, Maryville, Tenn., is proving a great blessing to the large number of young women who live there. Carrie Miser's coming has proven a real benediction to the young people of the school.

Since the dedication of the new meeting-house at Muncie, Ind., three years ago, the local church has commemorated the anniversary by a "Thank offering" service. This year the service is to be held the 5th inst., and it is hoped that $1,000 will be subscribed at that time. The local Ladies' Aid Society has already pledged an offering of $300 to apply on the amount.

Pomona meeting, Greensboro, N. C., has just concluded a very successful series of evangelistic meetings. Amos Kenworthy, Whittier, Cal., had charge during the first two weeks, and laid a good foundation for the work of John S. Kimber, Providence, R. I., during the last week. Under the ministry of the latter over a hundred persons were definitely blessed. The meeting has been established less than a year and is to be congratulated on its aggressive work in soul winning.

Rhoda Little Farr whose death is reported this week was at the time of her death probably the oldest Friend in America, having almost reached her 102d birthday. She was born in China, Maine, but was a member of Manchester meeting in that State. Her son Lincoln I. Farr and her daughter, Mrs. J. Nelson Jones came to New Jersey to live and the latter part of her life was passed there. She was a loyal Friend all her days.

Elam Henderson who went to Jamaica to fill the place made vacant by the death of Arthur Swift, has been in the United States since the latter part of Tenth month, receiving medical treatment. It was his hope in the early stages of his affliction, that he might be able to return to the mission field for a short time at least, but the physicians have all agreed that this is impossible. Accordingly his family have also returned. Elam Henderson is now doing pastoral work at Vassalboro, Maine.

Our friend, Irving King, of Iowa State University, whose "religious psychology" was reviewed in our columns last summer, has prepared a series of lectures for institutes, teachers' associations, commencements, chautauquas, and the like. The lectures are classified under the following themes: "Practical Pedagogy," "The Larger Problems of Education," and "The Philosophy of Personal Efficiency." Several institutions, where he has given a series of these lectures, speak very highly of his work.

The address of Prof. William S. Monroe, Montclair, N. J., before the Friends Educational Association of Philadelphia, on the 21st ult., was most inspiring and instructive. Prof. Monroe's theme was "Problems of Mental Work," and he devoted considerable time to the question of fatigue. He showed how in growing children a certain amount of fatigue was indispensable for development. He also pointed out the dangers of excessive fatigue, which he believed to be responsible for a great deal of insanity.

A committee of the Young People's Union of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has prepared an outline for a course of study in Friends history, doctrine, and biography, and a course in religions. Under history, ten subjects have been selected; under doctrine, six; and under biography, five. Eight studies are outlines on religion. These subjects are so arranged that they may be used for topics in a local union or round table and about 30 Friends in the yearly meeting have agreed to prepare themselves thoroughly upon one or more of the themes, each taking a different subject, and holding themselves in readiness to lecture or read a paper on it whenever invited. The thought is that the local unions will invite different ones to speak before them, thus encouraging study and visitation. The outline also gives a bibliography of 53 books.

It is encouraging to learn from the current number of the Africa Record, that Kansas Friends have raised $3,000 for the building of a hospital at Kaimosi in connection with the Africa Industrial Mission. The proposed building is to be of brick, 80 feet long by 18 feet wide with an annex at the center of the building, 22 by 18 feet. One end is to be used for a men's ward and the other for a women's ward, with a reception hall in the center, and an operating room in the wing. The estimated cost of the building with equipment is $2,550. The generosity of Kansas Friends assures the construction of this much-needed building.

One of our subscribers sends us a clipping from the Ohio State Journal commenting on Representative Tawney's speech on the Army Appropriation Bill. The Journal concludes: "If we had the courage to rely on our sense of justice and the spirit of good will, we would save that $2,000,000,000 and turn it into forms of education, and public works, and the promotion of agriculture, science and art. These are the things that make a nation strong, and when a nation is strong in these things it is unconquerable. Oh, that we had statesmanship in this country that was broad and lofty enough to recognize the strength there is in peace itself."

The chairman of the Executive Committee on Legislation of the Five Years Meeting has addressed the following letter to all Congressmen from States where Friends reside in any considerable number:

DEAR SIR: As chairman of the Executive Committee on Legislation of the Five Years Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, which comprises Eleven American Yearly Meetings and represents a membership of nearly 100,000—I write to protest against the proposed expenditure of the public funds for the fortification of the Panama Canal and request that you vote and use your influence against such use of the public funds, and I respectfully urge upon you the advantages of procuring by international agreements the neutralization of the whole canal zone.

Very truly yours,

JAMES WOOD,

Chairman Executive Committee on Legislation.

It would help greatly if this letter could be reinforced with private letters and telegrams from individual Friends encouraging their representatives along the same line.

Emory J. Rees, of the Africa Industrial Mission, now home on a furlough, attended the meeting at Noblesville, Ind., the 22d ult. In the morning he preached an inspiring sermon, emphasizing a Christian's duty to help spread the Gospel. In the afternoon he spoke to about 175 children. They were intensely interested while he exhibited a number of African curios and talked of the customs and practices of the people in that land. In the evening he delivered an address to a large audience on "Native Life in Africa, and What Christian Missions Are Doing for That Country." The information which the Friends gained concerning this mission field in private conversation with Emory J. Rees was a valuable supplement to his public lecture. The interest of Noblesville Friends was considerably stimulated by this visit.

Farmington Quarterly Meeting was held at Collins, N. Y., the 20th to 22d ult.

Richard R. Newby, Yearly Meeting Evangelistic Superintendent was present at all the sessions and was the only visiting minister in attendance. The services of all the ministers were in the spirit and with power.

One evening was largely devoted to the interests of the Christian Endeavor work and another to that of the Bible school. A quarterly meeting Bible conference was organized about thirty-five years ago and with very few exceptions has been held in connection with the quarterly meeting four times each year since its organization. Discussions upon Bible school problems with reports from the several schools from time to time and lectures and papers have proved very helpful to the work. The reports at this time show a decided gain as compared with the reports of two years ago in enrolment, in average attendance and amount raised for school purposes and for the work of missions.

The Christian Endeavor work gives promise for the future, a society is about to be organized at Collins. Each of the six denominations will then have a Christian Endeavor Society and a Bible school and one additional school near Elber meeting.

The Forward Movement Campaign for Wilmington College, Wilmington, Ohio, has been successful. Some months ago, Albert I. Bailey, a warm friend of the college, offered to give $15,000 to increase the endowment fund, provided $30,000 should be raised from other sources before First month 1, 1911. President Albert J. Brown began in the autumn a hundred days' campaign. All the friends of the college became interested in the success of the undertaking; members of the college board and of the faculty were active in soliciting, and at four o'clock, Twelfth month 31st, the required sum had been subscribed. It was a great day for Wilmington College, and there was much rejoicing throughout the community, when the college bell rang out the news of victory. The raising of this money is a triumph, and the sum has more than a monetary value, coming as it does from many contributors, all of whom now feel a personal interest in the welfare of the institution. The college now has, after all debts are paid, a productive endowment of $80,000.

On the 13th ult., the president and the faculty of the college gave a reception to the contributors and although the day was disagreeable, 300 were present. In this gathering, much enthusiasm was manifested over the outlook for the college, since the sum raised at this time is but the promise of future benefactions.

At a meeting of the board on the 20th ult., a resolution was passed, bestowing upon the new science building the name of Bailey Hall, in honor of Albert I. Bailey.

Rose E. Browne, who entered into rest at Indianapolis, the 19th ult., was well-known both throughout Western Yearly Meeting and in the general community in which, for forty years, she had lived. She was a woman of exceptional originality and energy, and deeply impressed herself upon those whom she touched in both private and public life.

She was born Fourth month 17, 1848, at Crawfordsville, Ind., of Quaker parents, Joseph and Ruthanna Greist, and was the sixth of ten children. On the 22d of Fourth month, at Plainfield, Ind., she united in marriage with Joseph J. Browne, of Waynesville, Ohio, also of Quaker stock, who, with two daughters, wife of Arlando Marine, of New York, and of Wm. E. Birdsall, of Boston, survives her.

A devoted wife and mother, when her own children went out of the home she had so lovingly made for them, her heart turned in solicitude to other girls in the rapidly growing city, who were deprived of the comfort and the protection of home influence, and she conceived the idea of such a home for business girls. With untiring energy, with patience, originality and perseverance, she set about the realization of this idea, and ere long there was founded and placed upon a sound financial basis the "Friends Boarding Home for Girls." In this project she was able to interest several strong friends and a man of means, who, sorrowing for a young daughter, erected as a memorial to her, the present building known as "the Bertha Ballard Home." With the management of this institution, she was actively associated as president of the board of directors for fifteen years, leaving it at the time of her withdrawal in 1904, not only in a prosperous financial condition, but favorably known as one of the established philanthropies of the city.

In addition to her church and benevolent work, she was actively identified with the club interests which are so large a feature of Indianapolis life, and deeply endeared herself to a wide circle of friends through her membership in the Clio Club, Woman's Research Club and Women's Christian Temperance Union, of all of which she was a member.

The end came in the quiet of sleep, with her family at her bedside, and the funeral occurred at Plainfield, Ind., the 22d ult., with a simple and impressive service in which A. B. Storms, a minister of Indianapolis, Eliza C. Armstrong, of Plainfield, and Lydia Taylor Painter, of Monrovia, had a part.

FIRST QUARTER, LESSON VII.

SECOND MONTH 12, 1911.

ELIJAH'S VICTORY OVER THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.

I KINGS 18: 1, 2, 17-40.

(For special study, verses 25-39.)

GOLDEN TEXT.—Choose you this day whom ye will serve. Josh. 24: 14.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Second month 6. Summons of Elijah. I Kings 18: 1-19.

Third-day. The god that answereth by fire. I Kings 18: 20-24.

Fourth-day. Failure of the Baalites. I Kings 18: 25-29.

Fifth-day. Fire of Jehovah. I Kings 18: 30-40.

Sixth-day. Cloud of light. Exod. 14: 10-31.

Seventh-day. Fire out of the rock. Judg. 6: 1-24.

First-day. The angel. Judg. 13: 2-20.

Time.—About 878 to 857 (or 920-900) B. C. About three and a half years after Elijah's warning to Ahab (I Kings 17: 1; 18: 1).

Place.—Near the summit of Mt. Carmel.

Rulers.—Ahab and Jezebel, king and queen of Israel; Jehoshaphat, king of Judah.

Parallel account.—None.

The story is one of the most graphic in the Old Testament, and the whole of chapter 18 should be read. The narrative is exceedingly dramatic. There are clearly six scenes: (1) Ahab and Obadiah; (2) Obadiah and Elijah; (3) Ahab and Elijah; (4) The company on Mt. Carmel; (5) The great test; (6) The result. Few passages in literature equal the narrative in this wonderful chapter. It has been the subject of numerous sermons, essays, poems and hymns. It may seem, to modern ideas, strange that Ahab would go to meet Elijah, but it was wholly in consonance with the ideas of his day. A prophet was regarded as one possessed with supernatural powers, and filled with a spirit different from other men. He was regarded with fear and often with reverence. Such among the Indians were the "medicine men," the priests among other nations; and the priests in some of the most ignorant Christian nations of today. Much as Ahab hated Elijah, he feared him and his power as a prophet.

There could scarcely be found a better place for the purpose than Mt. Carmel. There was a terrace of natural rock, with a fine view of the country, and there was a perennial spring, which still gives forth its waters and bears testimony to this story of old. Elijah stood apparently alone:

"Among the faithless, faithful only he;
Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unfrighted."

He was the champion of moral purity, of the national faith, of religious freedom and simplicity, of the immediate access of man to God; they were the champions of fanatical and unhallowed religionism, of usurping priestcraft, of unnatural self-abasement, of persecuting despotism, of cruel and licentious rites." Elijah, full of faith was ready to make a supreme test, and his first challenge was to the people: "How long go ye limping between the two sides? If Jehovah be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him. And the people answered him not a word." Then Elijah laid down the conditions of the test (verses 22-24). Perfectly fair they were, for Baal was the sun god and if there was any truth in his divinity, it was asking him to use what was his special attribute. The test begins, for the prophets of Baal did not dare to refuse,

25. "Call on the name of your God." R. V. "Put no fire under." The test must be fair, and the priests of Baal were doubtless quite ready to cheat if opportunity afforded.

26. "From morning even until noon." Hour after hour. "Hear us." In the sense of "answer us." "But there was no voice, nor any that answered." How simple and yet how graphically told. "They leaped about." R. V. A sort of dance of incantation, possibly like the dance of the eastern dervishes.

27. An example of satire, not very often found in the Bible. "Either he is musing, or he is gone aside." R. V.

28. These taunts of Elijah, drove the priests of Baal into a frenzy. The idea was, and still is current among savage tribes, that the deity is pleased by such action. "Knives" or swords; "lancets" should be "lances." R. V.

29. "Propheesied." Used in the sense of being filled with a spirit of some kind. In those times "madman" and "prophet" were almost synonymous—the latter being used in a bad as well as in a good sense. (Compare I Sam. 18: 10; II Kings 9: 11; Jer. 29: 26).

30. "Come near unto me." He wished them to see all that he did—And he repaired the altar of Jehovah," etc. This shows that there had been a local altar to Jehovah at the place.

32. "Two measures." The size is not certainly known. The septuagint here has a word which means a measure of about nine gallons.

33, 34. "Fill four jars with water." Am. R. V. There were no barrels in those days. The water could be obtained from the never-failing spring nearby. He made assurance trebly sure.

35. To convince the people that there was no cheating, he further filled the trench with water.

36. "The offering of the evening oblation." R. V. This would be perhaps about 3 o'clock.

37. "May know that thou, Jehovah, art God." R. V. That they may know that thou art the true God, not as Baal a false God. "Hear," like the word in verse 26, has the meaning of "answer." Thou art the true God. Note that Eli-jah's prayer contains two petitions: "First, for the vindication of his own prophetic authority, a final proof that he had all along acted in accordance with the will of God; and, second, for the bringing back of the nation to faith in the one true God. On the answer he feels that he has staked the whole future of Israel's religion."

38. A most graphic description of the answer to Elijah's prayer. "The fire of the Lord." (Compare II Kings 1: 12; Numb. 11: 1, 3; Job. 1: 16; Gen. 19: 24).

39. The marvellous sight filled the people with dread, and convinced them that the God of Elijah, whose name he bore, was indeed the true God. The scene closes with the tragic destruction of the false prophets. We are not told that this was commanded, but it was in accord with the terrible lex talionis—the law of retaliation—which was the rule in those days (Deut. 13: 6-9; 17: 2-4). We can excuse Elijah, but it is hard to excuse those, who in later days, after the coming of the "King of Love," justified cruelty and persecution by the example of Elijah.

Michael Dugan, a journeyman plumber, was sent by his employer to the Hightower mansion to repair a gas leak in the drawing room. When the butler admitted him, he said to Dugan: "You are requested to be careful of the floors. They have just been polished." "There's no danger iv me slinnin' on thim," replied Dugan. "I hov spikes in me shoes."—Lippincott's.

EASY CHANGE.

WHEN COFFEE IS DOING HARM.

A lady writes from the land of cotton of the results of a four years' use of the food beverage—hot Postum.

"Ever since I can remember we had used coffee three times a day. It had a more or less injurious effect upon us all, and I myself suffered almost death from indigestion and nervousness caused by it.

"I know it was that, because when I would leave it off for a few day I would feel better. But it was hard to give it up, even though I realized how harmful it was to me.

"At last I found a perfectly easy way to make the change. Four years ago I abandoned the coffee habit and began to drink Postum, and I also influenced the rest of the family to do the same. Even the children are allowed to drink it freely as they do water. And it has done us all great good.

"I no longer suffer from indigestion, and my nerves are in admirable tone since I began to use Postum. We never use the old coffee any more.

"We appreciate Postum as a delightful and healthful beverage, which not only invigorates but supplies the best nourishment as well." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

existence, with which he hopes that new discoveries in the heavens may be made. How nearly we have reached the limits of profitable size in building telescopes the masters of astronomy are not agreed, but every real addition to power is worth trying for. Another achievement of the fund has delighted the donor, the voyage of the magnetically neutral yacht Carnegie, in which iron is not used but everywhere replaced by bronze. Corrections of the charts made by this vessel have been notable already, including the justification of the steamer captain who followed the chart and ran his ship on the shores of the Azores not long ago. Mr. Carnegie's pleasure in these results of research and in his provisioning of the searchers is pleasant to think about. He is enriching American science upon the side where of late years it has been relatively weakest—that of pure investigation and discovery.

Rioting in Hankow, China, last week caused no little uneasiness to foreigners with investments in the city. The disorders were started by the circulation of a report that the British police had killed a coolie. The man had been picked up by the policemen when he was near death. During the rioting considerable damage was done and British and German marines were landed from gunboats in the harbor to defend the foreign community. Fighting between the Chinese and the authorities supported by the marines resulted in the death, probably of twenty Chinamen and the injury of several foreigners.

Hankow has often been called the "Chicago of the East." Both from the rapidity of its growth and from the activity of its commerce, its claims to that title is amply justified. A few years ago it was but a large city, with a handful of foreigners living in the nearby foreign concession. Now there are five foreign concessions—English, German, Russian, French and Japanese—stretching two miles down the Yangtze. The Hanyang Iron Works, across the Hanho, are among the foremost of China's industries. They not only have the contract for supplying rails to all Chinese railroads, but also, it is said, are under-bidding America in the selling of pig-iron on the Pacific Coast.

A broad avenue, with spacious, shaded walks, separates the foreign concessions, one after another, from the shipping along the river front. This bund is the stage of incessant bustle of tea-laden coolies and man-laden rickshaws. Tea is the chief export.

For a year there has been considerable unrest, and discontent with Pekin and what it stands for, throughout the Yangtze Valley and the south. Precipitated by a rice famine, this discontent broke out into actual riot last spring in Changsha, two hundred odd miles up from Hankow. The foreigners, mostly missionaries, fled down the river to Hankow. The United States, England, Germany, and Japan at once sent gunboats to Hankow, until a very formidable array was gathered in the river. This demonstration of force prevented any trouble at the time. But the unrest was not quieted, and the present riot is undoubtedly but a new expression of it.

PREMIUMS

Is the most attractive that has yet appeared in the "Quaker Calendar" series. It is artistic in every detail. The cover is a smoke-tint, oak paper which will harmonize admirably with many backgrounds. The leaves are a dull cream, printed in Flemish brown, and are backed by a heavy mount, with a silk cord for hanging. On each of the twelve pages is a quaint illustration of Quaker life.

The Life of Elizabeth Fry

By GEORGIA KING LEWIS

Is a charming biography of one of the most remarkable women of the 19th century. What Frances E. Willard was to the temperance cause of America, Elizabeth Fry was to prison reform in England. She was a member of a famous household, a sister of Joseph John Gurney. Incidentally it is an interesting sketch of Quaker life a century ago and a suggestive commentary on the social conditions.

OUR SABBATH SCHOOL LITERATURE

OUR Friends Sabbath School literature consists of six different publications, as follows: "Teacher's Quarterlies;" "Advanced Quarterlies;" "Intermediate Quarterlies;" "Friends Lesson Sheet;" "The Child's Lesson Leaf" and the "Youth's Friend." Each of the various publications supplies a specific demand, and hence has a mission of its own. They were created in answer to a special need. They are most admirably adapted to our Sabbath School work, and should be taken by all of our schools.

The Teacher's Quarterly.

First comes the Teacher's Quarterly, embracing the Sabbath School lessons of one quarter, together with a special editorial department filled with just such instruction as may be most needed at any particular time. To each lesson is given four pages of treatment, dealing with different points specifically, and is designed for the use of Sabbath School teachers and superintendents. It should be taken also by many of the older scholars. It costs only 40 cents per year, and in clubs for Sabbath Schools, only 8 cents per quarter.

The Advanced Quarterly.

This contains a full quarter's Sabbath School lessons, thirteen in number, thoughtfully prepared, giving two pages to each lesson, bringing out the vital points. It costs much time and labor to prepare it, and is designed for our young people. It is equal to any publication of its kind issued by other denominations and publishing houses. The price is 14 cents per year, or 3½ cents per quarter.

The Intermediate Quarterly.

This publication contains the same lessons as the Advanced Quarterly above described, but the preparation is more simplified so as to bring the lessons down to the more easy comprehension of younger scholars, and should be in the hands of scholars from nine to fourteen years of age, or those attending the 4th to 8th grades in public schools. The price is the same as that of the Advanced Quarterly.

Friends Lesson Sheets.

This sheet contains the same matter as the Advanced Quarterly, and is published for the use of visitors and irregular scholars, or to be given out after the Quarterlies have been exhausted, lost or mislaid. Nothing else could well take its place. Each School should take a few of them for use as mentioned above. Price 10 cents per year, or 2½ cents per quarter.

The Child's Lesson Leaf.

This is a little four-page paper published on colored paper, consisting of the Sabbath School lessons told in a simple way and easy to be understood, and the questions and answers on the lessons. It also contains two pages of pictures and easy reading for the mother to entertain the little ones. It is designed for the Primary or Infant department. The price is 20 cents per year, or 5 cents per quarter.

The Youth's Friend.

This paper consists of 16 pages monthly and is free from all objectionable reading, and well illustrated. The departments are stories of: Animals; Home Games; Social Etiquette; Puzzles; Hints for Girls, Curious Things, etc. This is just suited to the great army of boys and girls of all classes. The circulation of this paper is too small. Every school should take enough copies to place one in every home where there are children and young people, it will be appreciated. Price only 50 cents per year, to Sabbath Schools in clubs sent to one address only 40 cents per year.

For the prices and sizes of our Sabbath School publications they will compare well with those published by any other denomination and hence our schools should not in any instance take that published outside of our own society. Our own literature is better for our own people, than any other literature that can be found. It is possible that Sabbath School literature can be found that is edited and published outside of any denomination just for the market, or simply as a money making enterprise, that may be a trifle cheaper than any denominational literature, yet some times this literature is not reliable in point of doctrine, and should not be chosen just because it is a little cheaper. We cannot be too careful in choosing pure doctrine for our Sabbath Schools in these days. Bad seed sown is very hard to dig up and cast out. The safe thing to do is to take our own literature.

Here are three great verses, windows facing heaven's sunrise, windows open to heaven's breezes. Stand in the window and look! What vistas of divinity! What calm of life! What power to conquer! From the first window I see God the Father, and Christ the Son bringing calm to troubled hearts. From the second window I see Jesus contributing as only He can peace in the midst of the world's restlessness. From the third window I see the world-conquering Christ distributing cheer to discouraged souls.

Serenity is secured by activity. The vessel under full headway rides the waves with a majestic poise; the vessel with no headway is tossed by the power of the waves, and the blasts of the wind. The idle life is subject to every whim of life's restless sea. The active life uses the sea's waves and storms to hurry it to the desired haven.

* * *

Serenity is not attained in or through idleness. The bicycle keeps upright by motion; the top maintains its balanced poise by its speed; the flying machine defies the law of gravitation and soars serenely like a bird because it avails itself of the laws of motion. Sluggishness, torpidity, laziness, inertness is not serenity. Pascal says: "Nothing is so insufferable to man as to be completely at rest, without passions, without business, without diversion, without study. He then feels his nothingness, his forlornness, his insufficiency, his dependence, his weakness, his emptiness. There will immediately arise from the depth of his heart, weariness, gloom, sadness, fretfulness, vexation, despair."

* * *

Serenity is secured by depth in experience. The shallow life can never be serene. The iceberg plows its way through the ocean waves, and against the wind; nothing can stop it, nothing can toss it about. Seven-eighths of its bulk is beneath the surface, and it moves against the surface disturbances because held in the grip of an ocean current. The piece of driftwood is never quiet. The wind, the tide, and the waves toss it hither and thither. The waves and storms of life are surface experiences. The depths of the divine presence are where the great eternal currents run undisturbed. That life is serene which is deep.

Serenity is secured by conforming the life to spiritual and eternal principles. The material law is at best a makeshift for a soul; the temporal law is ill adapted to govern an immortal spirit. These laws bring restlessness. Eternal principles bring peace. The serene life will conform to this.

"He holds on firmly to some thread of life—

(It is the life to lead perforce)

Which runs across some vast, distracting orb

Of glory on either side that meagre thread,

Which conscious of, he must not enter yet—

The spiritual life around the earthly life:

The law of that is known to him as this.

His heart and brain move there, his feet stay here."

Serenity versus worry. You can't worry and be serene. They are mutually exclusive. Worry is chronic with American life. It is as much a part of the mental life of most people as reading the daily paper. Many have worried so much that when they haven't anything to worry about, they imagine something, and thus keep the worry mill going. Worry concerns itself with the future. We admit there is often more joy in anticipation than in realization. Worry is anticipation directed toward the coming ills of life. There is greater suffering because of anticipated ill than ever comes in actual ill. Worry is the escape valve for a restless life, and the power of life goes off like steam through a leaky escape valve, instead of through the cylinders of life where potential energy becomes concrete action. No one enjoys seeing an engine standing still blowing off steam; everyone enjoys seeing an engine rushing with hissing cylinders upon its iron path. No one appreciates a life that stands still and vents its power in clouds of vaporous worry. Everyone appreciates a life that expresses its power in the pathway of service. Strenuous Christian service is a great medicine for the worry-sick life.

Uncontrolled temper, moodiness, sensitiveness and worry are the weeds that keep the flowers of serenity from blooming. You say that constitutionally you have a strong temper, constitutionally you are subject to moods, constitutionally you are subject to worry. Doubtless this is true, and you make the excuse for these things plausible by saying that the activities of the State and nation are subject to the constitution. The constitution is the ultimate court of appeal. Very well, but note that the Christian has been "born again," "born from above." His constitution is the constitution of the Kingdom of God, and this constitution outlaws uncontrolled temper, moodiness, sensitiveness and worry. He who excuses his sin by saying that he is constitutionally made thus and so is mistaking weeds for flowers, is untrue to his spiritual inheritance, is selling his birthright for worse than a mess of pottage, and is failing to satisfy his hunger with husks which are spiritually indigestible.

If you would know the meaning of serenity make these lines your personal experience.

"And so I find it well to come
For deeper rest to this still room;
For here the habit of the soul
Feels less the outer world's control,
And from the silence multiplied
By these still forms on every side
The world that time and sense have known Falls off and leaves us God alone."

WHY NOT.

"What is it, do you suppose, that keeps the moon in place and prevents it from falling?" asked Araminta.

"I think it must be the beams," replied Charlie, softly.—Exchange.

RESULTS OF FOOD.

HEALTH AND NATURAL CONDITIONS COME FROM FEELING RIGHT.

Man, physically, should be like a perfectly regulated machine, each part working easily in its appropriate place. A slight derangement causes undue friction and wear, and frequently ruins the entire system.

A well-known educator of Boston found a way to keep the brain and the body in that harmonious co-operation which makes a joy of living.

"Two years ago," she writes, "being in a condition of nervous exhaustion, I resigned my position as teacher, which I had held for over 40 years. Since then the entire rest has, of course, been a benefit, but the use of Grape-Nuts has removed one great cause of illness in the past, namely, constipation, and its attendant evils.

"I generally make my entire breakfast on a raw egg beaten into four spoonfuls of Grape-Nuts, with a little hot milk or hot water added. I like it extremely, my food assimilates, and my bowels take care of themselves. I find my brain power and physical endurance much greater and I know that the use of the Grape-Nuts has contributed largely to this result.

"It is with feelings of gratitude that I write this testimony, and trust it may be the means of aiding others in their search for health." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Treating the Bible as Allegory.

I pointed out last week some of the dangers of literalism in Bible study, but it turns out to be almost as dangerous to fly to the opposite extreme and allegorize or "spiritualize" everything. The tendency to turn the Old Testament into allegory had begun before the Christian Church was formed. The great Jewish teachers of Alexandria, in their desire to bring the lofty truths of Hebrew religion into favor with the thoughtful people of the Greek-speaking world, found it necessary to invent a new way of interpreting the words of Scripture. The Greek world was not interested in the dry details of Hebrew history and cared little for the story of Canaanitish wars. If they were to read these narratives at all, they must be helped to find something spiritual in them. The same thing was true of the legal system of the Pentateuch. The regulations for building the Tabernacle and the elaborate specifications for sacrifices, priesthood, purification, ritual, clean and unclean beasts, etc., made no appeal to the serious-minded pagans. And forthwith the pious Jews resorted to allegory to discover a deeper meaning in these things. The seven candlesticks now became a symbol of the seven planets; the four colors of the Tabernacle stood for the four elements, earth, air, fire and water; the forecourt of the Tabernacle signified the visible world, and the inner sanctuary the ideal world; Jacob's pillow of stone meant that the patriarch really put the solid truth under his mind!

When the early Church adopted the Old Testament as one of the two great books of its religion, allegory became even more necessary than before. Much of the Old Testament, if taken literally, now ceased to have value and meaning for those of the new faith. The ceremonies and ritual were "nailed to the cross," and both tabernacle and temple were outdated and done away. To those who followed the Prince of Peace, the wars of Israel were a heavy burden, and they found their relief from all these things by adopting wholesale the method of allegorizing which the Jews of Alexandria had made familiar. There was now no limit to the spiritual message that an ingenious man could draw out of a battle with the Philistines or out of any chapter of Leviticus.

Here is a specimen of the method, taken from St. Augustine's "City of God." The Ark of Noah, he says, is an allegory of the Church. The Ark of wood saved Noah, and the wood of the Cross has saved the world. Noah's wife, sons, daughters-in-law and the animals represent the mixed character of the persons who compose the Church in the world, with some good and some bad in it. The dimensions of the Ark are a figure of Christ's human body, as follows: "The length of the human body is six times its breadth from side to side and ten times its depth or thickness, and therefore the Ark was made 300 cubits in length, 50 in breadth and 30 in height!" The door in the side of the Ark represented the spear-wound in Christ's side. The fact that the Ark was made of squared beams signifies the immovable steadiness of the life of the saints, "for however you turn a cube over, it still stands." The three stories of the Ark may represent faith, hope and charity, but Augustine prefers to have them stand for the three spiritual grades of life—the ground floor is chaste marriage; the second floor is chaste widowhood, and the top floor is chaste virginity.

Every other passage of the Old Testament can be made to yield as spiritual a meaning as the Ark narrative. Every incident in Joseph's life and every movement in the wilderness journey flow with spiritual milk and honey. Even "the begat chapters" are loaded with gospel truth. Every name is significant and every word is a secret passage which leads towards the new Jerusalem. Before one's eyes, under this method, all the events of the past melt away as events and become, instead, allegories of the soul's wanderings and return, mighty types and figures of deeper realities. The New Testament, too, gets allegorized in the same fashion. Every detail both of the miracles and the parables is turned to use and made to bear a hidden meaning. The swine, the husks, the ring, the shoes, the robe, the fatted calf in the parable of the prodigal, are loaded with deep significance. St. Paul's journeys and experiences are translated into symbols and are read as parables; and before we are aware of it, we have lost the history of the early Church and have a great allegory in its place, an allegory which each person takes in his own way and uses to suit his own purposes, as, in slavery days, poor Onesimus, in St. Paul's epistle to Philemon, was allegorized to mean that runaway slaves should be returned to their masters by Christian people!

It is true, no doubt, that the Bible does contain much that is of the nature of parable and allegory. It is not a Book of mere facts and events. It is a Book of inspiration, of vision, of insight into the things of the spirit, and the reader must learn how to see, through the letter, the deeper truths which throb within. But capricious allegorizing is not a safe and sound method of interpretation. It runs into wild imaginings and often misses the plain, clear truth which the Book holds for us. To construct the history of Israel into a detailed typology is to miss its real lessons and to make the Bible unreal to those who have become serious students of the world's great literature.

I shall endeavor next week to describe another method of interpretation which avoids both dangers which I have now discussed, and which preserves all the good features of literalism and allegory.

Current Events and Comments

New Friends Books

Someone has said that the devil is little concerned about a man's orthodoxy providing he can get him to contend for the faith in an un-orthodox spirit. In other words, it is more important to have a regenerated heart than to hold right opinions. That this was an important consideration with English Friends relative to George Keith is evidenced by some letters which have recently appeared in "A Quaker Post-Bag."* In writing to Sr. John Roades, Henry Gouldney says of him:

"He is not a man governed wth. that meekness that becomes his Doctrine who puts a great value upon the outward comeing of our Blessed Lord; wch. I hope all honnest ffrds. finds it their duty to doe; yet himselve far from makeing him a lively example in meekness and humility—ffrds. have had many private meetings wth. him, and by them all, I don't finde great hopes of his comeing more near us in spirit. His doctrines, in the generall, are I think owned by all sound ffrinds, but he seems to lay down abt. 7 points wch. he calls fudimentalls, in any of whome, if we disagree in, he cannot hold ffellowship, tho upon the whole, was not his spirit wrong, that would easily be accommodated—He takes commonly large time in meetings, but mostly fflat; he has a tone sometimes, especially wn. on one of his pticular points that he huggs more than ordinery, that he carrys off more lively—My accent. is in grosse, tis to large and beyond my memmorey to pticularize."

"A Quaker Post-Bag" is a collection of letters addressed to Sr. John Rodes, an English Friend who lived between 1670 and 1743. Five of the letters are from William Penn. They give a fair picture of a well-to-do Friend of the second generation of Quakers. A description of George Fox in his last illness, and allusions to other prominent Friends, are of special interest.

A very good brief account of Stephen Grellet appears in the fourth volume of "Quaker Biographies,"† recently issued. There never has been a Friend, or anyone else of humble origin, who visited and won the confidence and respect of more kings and queens than did Stephen Grellet. His gift was unique, and his wisdom and grace remarkable. He was equally at home in the courts of Europe and with the Indians and frontiersmen of North America. He was a great traveler, and his many journeys are simply and graphically told in this short biography of about 125 pages. The volume also contains a sketch of Rebecca Jones, the Fothergills, Elizabeth Fry, Nicholas Waln and Daniel Wheeler.

An excellent comment on the homely virtues of a Christian life is found in "Selections from the Works of William Penn,"‡ by Isaac Sharpless. A character sketch of the great Quaker statesman serves as an introduction to the work.

The Committee on Legislation and Its Recent Action

The advantage of having a standing Legislative Committee representing a large proportion of the Friends in America has again been proven by the recent action of the Executive Committee on Legislation of the Five Years' Meeting. Some of our readers will remember that almost immediately following the organization of the committee in 1902 it was instrumental in presenting the objections of Friends to the militia bill then before Congress, and, through the good offices of Senator Beveridge and others, in securing exemption from militia service.

As reported last week, James Wood, Mt. Kisco,

N. Y., chairman of the committee, sent letters to members of the Senate and House of Representatives from those States in which Friends are most numerous, protesting against the fortification of the Panama Canal and urging upon them the advantages of procuring, by international agreement, the neutralization of the whole canal zone. The letter was immediately laid before the House by Gen. Sherwood, Ohio, who, in an able argument against fortifications, said: "This letter speaks for 100,000 Quakers; and, as I have said before upon the floor of this House, I believe if there is any one thing that this country needs more than another, it is more Quakers and fewer battleships."

It is very gratifying that so many acknowledgments have been received from Senators and Representatives expressing concurrence with the objects of the letter.

Large Sums for Y. M. C. A. Work

That the Y. M. C. A. is meeting a widely-felt need in our large cities is evidenced by the hearty support which it is receiving from men of various religious faiths. During the fifteen days ending First month 31st, the citizens and business men of Philadelphia raised $1,030,000 for the work. The city has a large central association and three branches. The West Philadelphia branch and the one in Kensington are to be moved to more advantageous locations and equipped with new buildings, at a cost of $250,000 each. A like sum will be used for enlarging the central plant, and $150,000 in erecting an annex to the Germantown building. This will give the Philadelphia associations a natural equipment equal to the best in the country.

Only a few days since, Julius Rosenwald, Chicago, gave $25,000 to complete a sum of $100,000 to purchase land and erect a building for the colored men's association of that city. In presenting the gift, he offered to make a like donation in any community where the colored people would raise an additional $75,000. Although a Hebrew, Rosenwald believes that the Y. M. C. A. is doing a great work for young men, and doing it better than any other organization now in existence.

During the last five years, in more than 60 cities in the United States and Canada, about $15,000,000 has been raised for new buildings, as against $12,000,000 raised for that purpose in forty years from 1852 to 1892. Last year alone $4,259,000 was secured. This was done in short campaigns lasting from six to fifteen days. The greatest of these campaigns occurred in Toronto last Fifth month, when $685,000 was secured in nine days, and by noon on the twelfth day the total had reached $800,000, the last $150,000 going to the Young Women's Christian Association.

To Meet the Demands of a Growing West

The announcement of the Union Pacific management that it proposes to spend $75,000,000 in double-tracking its lines between the Mississippi River and the Pacific coast is significant in many ways. Forty years ago, when these lines were first built, they passed through wide stretches of country unimproved and practically uninhabited, their principal use being to connect the extreme coast region with the Central West and East. At that time a single track, with occasional sidings, was quite sufficient; but, as the president of the road says, "the time will soon come—if it is not already here—when double tracks will be necessary to handle our business." It also demonstrates that the Union Pacific management considers that the advantages to be gained in providing ample facilities for a rapidly growing business will more than offset what is generally regarded in railroad circles as "blocks to progress," such as government supervision of rates and the demand for higher wages by employes.

Objecting to Religious (?) Plays

The Mayor of Philadelphia, last week, prohibited Sarah Bernhardt, a noted actress, and her troupe from presenting "La Samaritaine" in the city. This came as the result of protests offered by the ministers and other citizens who condemned the play not because it was immoral, but because Jesus and His Disciples were represented by persons of questionable character.

In line with this feeling, Charles M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," has persistently objected to having his famous story dramatized by theatrical promoters. He has, however, consented to having it staged in his church at Topeka, Kansas, by members of the Christian Endeavor Societies of his congregation. No curtain was used, and the only stage properties were a desk and a few chairs. The work of the young people is said to have been excellent even from a dramatic standpoint, and their own earnest desire to convey a religious lesson was well met in the effect on spectators. This unusual departure for a church does not seem to have awakened any serious criticism.

San Francisco, the Exposition City in 1915

During the past few months there has been a sharp contest between San Francisco and New Orleans for recognition from Congress as the city in which an international exposition may be held in 1915, celebrating the completion of the Panama Canal. San Francisco has secured pledges and State appropriations sufficient to finance the project; while New Orleans asked Congress to aid her to the extent of $1,000,000. The House has decided in favor of San Francisco, and while the Senate has not yet acted, it is likely to concur in the decision. It is not surprising that an effort to include a provision for an international naval parade from Hampton Roads through the Panama Canal and up the Western coast to San Francisco was readily put aside, since the naval exhibit at the Jamestown Exposition so signally failed to attract public interest.

Whittier College.

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

Consistent with the practice of Friends, wherever they have settled in America, those who came to Whittier, California, with the founding of the Quaker colony in 1887, immediately turned their attention to educational interests. They planned for a college that should have the ample proportions that every improvement assumed in those days of the "boom," and, joined by many that had only a speculative interest in the undertaking, about $140,000 was subscribed, plans and specifications of the building were drawn, an organization was formed, with Dr. Samuel D. Coffin as president and Dr. C. R. Dixon secretary, and the enthusiasm in the undertaking seemed unbounded. But the collapse of the boom carried with it the collapse of the enterprise in the chaos that involved land titles and values, of which the subscriptions largely consisted.

In 1889 another effort was made to further educational interests, and under direction of a committee of the monthly meeting, C. Bevan Johnson was employed as teacher, and a school of academic grade was opened in a room of the Bailey Street Public School Building; but, with insufficient support, it closed with the second term. In the summer of 1891, after a lapse of another year, Dr. W. V. Coffin and Prof. John Chawner talked over with some of their friends the matter of starting an academy, which resulted in the calling of a meeting in the office of the Pickering Land and Water Co., at which there were present, as nearly as can be recalled: Dr. W. V. Coffin, Prof. John Chawner, Dr. C. J. Cook, T. E. Newlin, Cyrus Trueblood, Lydia J. Jackson, L. M. Baldwin, Hermon D. Williams, Thomas Armstrong, I. H. Cammack and Alva Starbuck.

This little company appeared small in contrast with the tumultuous mass-meeting that had subscribed $140,000, but its deliberations were serious and businesslike, and its determination to form an organization and to open a school was the real foundation work of Whittier College.

The Whittier Educational Association was immediately incorporated as a stock company, with the following Board of Trustees: Dr. C. J. Cook, president; Thomas Armstrong, vice-president; T. E. Newlin, secretary; Lydia J. Jackson, treasurer; Lydia Jenkins, L. M. Baldwin, I. H. Cammack, Jane M. Grinnell and Hannah Hadley.

W. V. Coffin, L. M. Baldwin and N. D. Ellis, with a sprightly broncho team, traversed the several Friends neighborhoods, awakening considerable enthusiasm in the undertaking, and securing several hundred dollars toward its support. In the autumn, school was opened with 13 students, in a vacant store room on East Philadelphia Street, now used as a printing office. Professor Chawner served as principal and Dr. Coffin as assistant. There is no recorded account as to how these educators distributed their time among half a dozen students each, but the small-college idea of the teacher impressing his personality by close contact with those he instructs surely had here its opportunity. Mary Trueblood conducted an art department for several years from this date, which was later in charge of Ruth Trueblood.

The following year the school opened with 27 students, the position of the instructors being reversed for no reason now known except it were to divide honors equitably, Dr. Coffin serving as principal and Prof. Chawner as assistant. An adjoining store-room was utilized by making an opening in the partition, and a primary department was opened in the upper room of the building, with Alice Miller in charge.

The third year opened, in the autumn of 1893, with 51 students, with the same faculty excepting that Dora Jones taught the primary. By the close of the year the growth of the academy and its wholesome influence had evidently impressed the Church and the community with the importance of providing it with better quarters, and energetic steps were taken in this direction.

In the summer of 1894 the Pickering Land and Water Co. donated the slightly location now occupied, including ten acres of land, and Dr. Coffin canvassed Whittier meeting, securing a subscription of $1,800 in one day as the financial nucleus of the enterprise. Jesse F. Hunnicutt canvassed the other Friends meetings, securing about $3,000, and the erection of the new building was commenced. Dr. Coffin, with stereopticon outfit showing features of the undertaking and scenic views of California, visited several yearly meetings in the interest of the enterprise, and secured $2,000 from Iowa, $1,000 from Indiana, $500 from Western, and $500 from Kansas, it being the understanding that the building should be of a capacity to accommodate California Yearly Meeting, which was opened in Third month following.

The opening of school in the new building in Ninth month, 1894, was an event of great interest. Dr. Coffin having resigned the principalship to take a place in the State School, John W. Woody was associated with Professor Chawner in the faculty, the other teachers being B. M. Davis and Anna Moore.

John Chawner held the principalship in 1895, and Susan H. Johnson was added to the faculty, where she held a place for twelve succeeding years. J. John Jessup was placed at the head of the faculty in 1896, where he gave four years' service.

During the passing years the school steadily gained in students and in prestige, but the sacrifice necessary on the part of the few Friends in California to meet its growing demands was heavy, and this fell largely on those resident in Whittier, as the relation of the yearly meeting to the institution hitherto was only advisory. At the yearly meeting in 1900, Dr. C. J. Cook, president of the Board, feelingly stated that the institution, with accumulating financial burdens and the coming competition of was erected and the assembly hall reconstructed, at a cost of $15,000.

The year 1906 witnessed the climax in the financial history of the college in the addition of $100,000 to the endowment. This proposal at first seemed Utopian, but at a meeting held at the home of A. C. Johnson, in which Allen Jay led in an earnest prayer for guidance, the undertaking was determined on, and a letter to Andrew Carnegie, submitted in outline by President Tebbetts, was formulated, asking the assistance of the philanthropist. All this was on the basis of a proposition of Washington Hadley to give $20,000 on condition that $100,000 should be secured.

Andrew Carnegie gave favorable answer with a gift of $20,000, but the hope of liberal help in other yearly meetings was not realized, shutting up California Friends to the necessity of raising about $50,000, and they assumed this task with an energy that deserves commemoration.

Rayner W. Kelsey led the campaign, dividing the membership of the various meetings into working groups and encouraging them by a correspondence that tolerated no thought of failure. But with the good results from this canvass, and a subscription in the face of the yearly meeting, there was still a deficiency of several thousand dollars as the assembly approached its close; and now, when every resource seemed exhausted, and there was a silent waiting for some omen of hope, a liberal subscription from Joseph Allen, and one from Amos Cook which involved a sacrifice few would think of making, started a new contagion of giving, and the amount was quickly raised, marking a historic scene in California Yearly Meeting and in the achievements of Whittier College.

Upon the retirement of Charles E. Tebbetts to take up the work of secretary of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions, Thomas Newlin was placed at the head of the college, and is now in his fourth year of service. Under his efficient administration the college has made substantial advance on all lines, and now holds a position in public confidence; and as to its standard of work, it is second to no denominational institution on the coast. President Newlin, in pursuance of high ideals, has identified himself with the educational and civic affairs of the community and the public at large to the winning of many friends to the college outside of our denominational constituency and its influence, and to the strengthening of its hold on the public.

The religious spirit that pervades the college, and the leading place given to character-building as an objective point in all its work, are increasingly appreciated throughout the yearly meeting, and hold a prophecy of untold good to the Church through the devoted young people who shall go out from its walls with high ideals of service in any sphere they may fill. As emphasizing and furthering this higher purpose of the college, a biblical department, on an equality with all other departments, was added this a high school in Whittier, had reached a crisis where it must have the more general support of Friends, or close the doors of the only educational institution under their care in California. The yearly meeting accepted the trust offered by the Board, and the property of the Whittier Educational Association was legally conveyed to it by steps later taken.

Charles E. Tebbetts was placed at the head of the faculty, and efforts were now directed to making the institution a college in fact, the curriculum having heretofore included only the high school course. During the seven years' service of Charles E. Tebbetts as president there were strong additions to the faculty with varying terms of service—men and women from the best colleges and universities.

These years also record events of vital interest to the college financially. At the yearly meeting in 1903 an endowment of $50,000 was completed, Washington Hadley having headed it the previous year with a gift of $10,000.

In 1904 the south wing of the college building year, where students have a course of study and training that shall fit them for efficient work in the ministry, the missionary field, or related spheres of religious work.

Whittier College has lately been accredited at the University of California and Stanford University, these institutions thus putting its students on an equality with their own in recognizing its degrees. Through the initiative of the Woman's Auxiliary, an organization of 250 members that is giving splendid support to the college, public interest has been enlisted in a plan of improvements on the campus that includes grading and drives, and ornamentation with flowers, shrubbery and trees, that shall give a beautiful park-like effect to the entire grounds. The plan has been enlarged by the public to include a monument to the poet Whittier at the entrance to the campus.

Athletics, subordinate to the higher work of the institution, are given their important place as a promoter of health and college spirit, and the students take pride in Hadley Field as the best-equipped athletic arena owned by any college in southern California. The loyalty of the Alumni Association is sufficiently evidenced by the fact that, though only numbering 32 members, it has recently secured improvements for the athletic field costing $2,500. Among the lately added features of the college is the girls' cottage, a comfortable building costing $4,000, capable of accommodating 22 girls. This is under the care of a preceptress, and is supplied with every home comfort and convenience. A well-equipped dormitory in the main building affords like accommodation for boys.

In a summary of the material facilities afforded by Whittier College, we may include: The main building, with 50 rooms and a large assembly hall; the athletic field, girls' cottage and boys' dormitory named above; a spacious gymnasium; a good working and growing library; three well-equipped laboratories, and the incomparable site of the college, which from its elevation commands a view not only of the outspread valley, but of the coast line and the shimmering waters of San Pedro harbor.

Friends in the East, desiring a home in our balmy clime, with opportunity for "a guarded religious education" for their children that commands every modern facility, will surely find their wishes fulfilled in coming to Whittier.

Until recently, Whittier College was largely a preparatory school, both in number of students and equipment. California has as good a system of high schools as any other State, so with the increased facilities of Whittier College to do advanced work and the need for an academy becoming less all the time, the trustees decided last year to eliminate the preparatory department and give all the attention to collegiate work. This is felt to be a long step in advance, and puts Whittier College in the front rank of colleges.

It will be recognized by all who read this history that the task of founding a college of high rank in this new country of large ideals has been no small undertaking. It will also be seen that the possession of an institution of equal rank to anything on the coast is no small asset to the Church, and this ideal the builders and supporters have ever held uppermost; so that not only on its documents, but in its very foundation stones, is embedded the motto of the college—"Christian Culture."

Whittier, Cal.

BY LEVI T. PENNINGTON.

It has occurred to me frequently of late that humanity, and especially Christians, and still more especially Quakers, might not inaptly be divided into three classes, represented by the three principal marks of punctuation, the interrogation point, the exclamation point and the period.

The first of these classes lays most emphasis on the question; the second on the ejaculation; the third on the positive declaration.

The member of the first class sees and emphasizes the doubt. He recognizes the limitations of all things human, and wherever there is a chance to question, trust him to bring out that question and emphasize the doubt that may arise in consequence.

Is Jonah really narrative, or wholly parable? Trust him to ask the question. Why, if inspiration is what we have thought, does one of the Gospel writers say Jesus met the blind beggar as He was going into Jericho, and another say that the meeting occurred as He was coming out? Be sure the man of the question mark will ask it. Why does one of the Gospel writers say that the second time Peter was questioned, at the time of his denial, it was by the same maid who had questioned him first, while another writer says that it was another who questioned him the second time? Be sure the man of our first class will emphasize these questions and will breed doubt.

There are many things we cannot understand in the Book, and the wisest of us cannot explain. Let's admit it. But to be forever emphasizing the doubt is as foolish as for me to neglect the flesh of the fish on my table, and, picking out one of the bones, seek to get it crosswise in my own throat or, worse still, choke somebody else to death with it.

The second class places the supreme emphasis on the exclamation. Theirs is the life of excitement, of exuberant emotion, of outcry and glad camp-meeting song. Something is radically wrong, to their way of thinking, if they and those about them are not on the mountain of transfiguration. If clouds come, something is radically wrong—as though God were not the author of the rain as of the sunshine. In the continual search after emotional joy, they fail of finding the place of real service. Peter-like, they want to stay on the mountain, and often seek to stay, while the demoniac boy and his anguished father wait in the valley for help. No time to sit up with the sick neighbor, for camp-meeting is in session! No money to give for the heathen, for we are building our tabernacle! This is not a picture of all the exclamation-point people, but it is of some of them—too many by far.

God's heart must rejoice over the third class. In a world of doubt, and an age of question, they stand for positive truth in thought and life. They may not know just how God reveals Himself, but by a life that is hid with Christ in God, they convince the world that He does. They may not be able to split hairs with the interrogation points of the Church, nor show so much enthusiasm and outward demonstration as the exclamation points, but in their hearts they do believe and trust, and in their lives they do serve and sacrifice. They carry on the work of the college when the destructive critic would rob it of its power and the fanatic would rob it of its sanity. They carry on the work of the Church when ultra-conservatism would make the Church a morgue and fanaticism would make it a madhouse. They carry on the work of missions when dead formalism would leave the benighted of earth to die in their sins and fanaticism would trust them to the "tongues" movement, in which the "tongues" perversely fail, in every case, to be understood by the heathen, and to misguided enthusiasts, who go out without a proper home base and come back saddened, if not made infidels.

God give us men of the positive, period type; men who stand for the positive truth, not the doubt nor the ejaculation. God give us fewer interrogation points and exclamation points, or, if that be not best, at least more periods.

Quaker Schools and a French Castle.

The demand in several of our academies for industrial and agricultural training had its counterpart in the early days of our Society. Tho. Lawson, the Quaker botanist, writing to Sir John Rodes, in 1790, tells how "some years ago George ffox, William Pen, and others were concerned to purchase a piece of land near London for the use of a Garden School-house and a dwelling-house for the Master, in which garden, one or two or more of each sorte of our English plants were to be planted, as also many outlandish plants."

More ambitious still was the scheme of certain Friends to establish schools of industry in a great castle in the interior of France. The Journal of the Friends Historical Society (London)* for Twelfth month reproduces a number of letters which passed between the French authorities and Friends on the subject. It also gives Albert G. Linney's account of "A Visit to Chambord, 1910," the castle where the enterprise was to have been launched. The writer tells of cycling out over the flat country, "some dozen miles from Blois," to the old building, colossal in size, with its "bewildering array of spires, turrets, cones and minarets." From his description of the place one is led to believe that the scheme would have failed had it been started. He goes on to say:

"It was Francis I who was the founder of this gigantic castle, of which he was extremely fond. Under Louis XIV, Moliere gave here the first representation of his "Bourgeois Gentilhomme." It was the residence of the king of Poland from 1725 to 1733, and was afterwards given by Louis XV to one of his generals. Then came the Revolution, with the subsequent dispersion of royal domains. This was the moment when the idea of certain Friends to acquire the property took shape. It did not, however, enter their hands, and the castle bade fair to become a ruin, till Napoleon I made it into a barracks for the occupation of one of his legions. Plundered by the revolutionaries of 1792, the furniture sold or carried off, the woodland devastated, Chambord fell upon evil days indeed, until, after it had passed through the hands of Marshal Berthier, who received it from Napoleon, it was at length purchased by national subscription and presented to the Duke of Bordeaux at a cost of 1,500,000 francs. The duke also bore the title of Count of Chambord, and he handed the property to his two nephews, who, holding themselves aloof from French politics, have done what they could to keep in some degree of repair this 'flower of the Renaissance, the jewel of the Sologne.'

"But the hugeness of the structure is so overwhelming (there are 440 rooms, and stabling for over 1,000 horses) that one can well believe the statement that the repairs to the roof alone absorb many thousands of francs per annum. Certain it is that Chambord is no longer a residence, and we notice that many of the windows were without glass and were boarded up.

"The grounds, too, have a somewhat forlorn appearance, and though a good many visitors come to see the place, the caretakers seemed far more desirous of submitting sightseers to a fleecing process over post-cards and guide books than in showing the interior of the castle. Frankly, the inspection of the interior is disappointing; many rooms are quite bare and undecorated.

"The immense park, shut in by a wall 20 miles in length, is mainly filled by woodland and undergrowth, with roads running clear across and forest paths really romantic in appearance.

"Being aware of the attempt of Jean Marsillac and Robert Grubb to gain the estate for the Quaker enterprise in philanthropy, I tried to imagine Chambord under the conditions they planned. No satisfactory picture evolved itself, for the very magnitude and grotesque immensity of the place seemed out of harmony with the educational and industrial measures they planned to execute. One might reasonably expect to see bewigged and powdered gentlemen of a bygone day walking along the terraces; more likely, so I mused, to see some magician or geniarise out of the ground and point to the vast pile as the creation of an all-potent wand at the bidding of a prince.

"Then, in the end, I realized the truth: The castle of Chambord is today no more than a wonderful white elephant."

Upper and Nether Springs.

BY JOEL BEAN.

In our devotions there should be a dominant note of thanksgiving in a renewed sense of what God is to us in the immeasurable gifts of His grace and in the blessings of His providence. It seems fitting that our supplications should be with thanksgiving, as we are permitted to meet under a sunny sky, under the canopy of divine love, under the distilling of heavenly dews, and under the ministrations of the word of life.

But with thanksgiving there is need for prayer. In the division of the land of Canaan among the tribes and families of Israel there was one, Achsah, to whose lot a goodly portion fell; but she was not satisfied until she came to her father with the petition, "Thou hast given me a south land, give me also springs of water."

There are those to whose lot among the churches and people of God there has been given a spiritual inheritance, like unto a south land, fertile for the growth of the heavenly seed, open to the rays of the Son of Righteousness. But what is any land, even the best, without water? With all that has come to us through a godly ancestry and through a guarded and enlightened religious instruction, and with all the sacred influences that surround us, our lives must become like a dry and parched and barren ground, without living water from celestial springs.

To the petitioner of old, in answer to her request, there were given "the upper and the nether springs." Let us never be content, dear friends, with the inheritance of any favored lot without the water springs. We need the "upper and the nether springs"—the "upper springs" gushing out in the heights to enrich the most sacred relations and the sweetest joys of life, in the summit lands of earthly happiness. We need the "nether springs" upwelling in the low lands when we have to pass through the "valley of humiliation," to endure chastening and suffering and sorrow, in order that the lowest depths of our experience may be made fruitful and fragrant as with the spices of the "garden of the Lord."

So with thanksgiving for all that is given us richly to enjoy, let us not cease to pray for the fresh springs of eternal life.

Farmington Quarterly Meeting held at Collins, N. Y., the 20th to 22d ult., was a time of spiritual uplift and blessing. R. R. Newby, yearly meeting superintendent and four pastors of the quarterly meeting were present. The business sessions were of unusual interest. The subject for discussion at the meeting of ministry and oversight was "The relation of pastor and monthly meeting." R. R. Newby gave helpful messages at the C. E. and Bible school conference. On First-day, three meetings for worship were held. Dinner and supper were served in the manse during the three days which afforded opportunity for social intercourse.

The Friends of Pasadena, Cal., have a large representation in the faculties of the various schools of that city, 15 of their number being now engaged as teachers, including F. L. Thurston, Walter Wilson, Leroy D. Ely, Catharine Townsend, Estella McMillan, Vera Curl, Cynthia Ball, Frances Comfort, Mary Newby, Miriam Williams, Elvin Carter, Barbara Morrison, Lydia Newby, May Pearson and Edward Curl. Professor Thurston, in addition to his duties in the high school, teaches shorthand three nights in the week in the Y. M. C. A. School in Los Angeles. J. C. Owen, also a member of Pasadena meeting, is principal of the public schools in Pomona, Cal.

A two weeks series of meetings held at Fountain City, Ind., closed the 22d ult. It was conducted by Fred. E. Smith, the pastor. He was ably assisted by the beautiful singing of Roy Lacey, a Christian young man who is using his splendid voice in Gospel service. The whole community manifested an unusual interest. The meetings were characterized by deep conviction and solemnity. After the dismissal of the audience each evening the people seemed reluctant to leave. The members were aroused to greater unity and desire for the salvation of others than for years before. There were 50 conversions and renewals, many of them men and women of mature years. A large part of this number were birthright members, and nine others have joined with Friends.

The missionaries of Holguin Station, Cuba, greatly appreciate the fellowship, helpful service and wise counsel of Carolina M. Wood, Mt. Kisco, N. Y., and Anna E. Williams, Lewisville, N. C., the former reaching there the 21st ult., the latter the 24th.

The Cuban people were much animated by the hearty hand shaking, cheerful greeting and words of sympathy spoken by the Friends in the regular meetings of the church.

Carolina Wood and Anna Williams went on the 26th ult. to Puerte Padre for a short stay, expecting to go to Gibara and then on to Banos. They are members of the Cuban Field Committee under the A. F. B. F. M. and stopped at Holguin after visiting the stations in Havana Province.

Salem Quarterly Meeting, held in Boston, Mass., the 19th ult., was favored with the services of Mary J. Weaver, Batavia, N. Y., and of William Thompson, New Bedford, Mass.

During the business session, the meeting discussed the question, "How to interest men in the Bible and the Church."

At a previous quarterly meeting this topic was considered with so much interest as to cause a demand for a second opportunity. This time the speakers were chiefly business men and many helpful suggestions were offered.

In general it was felt that a loving interest in men, manifested by regular, prayerful, persistent, personal work, will go a long way toward solving this very difficult problem.

At the last meeting of the Men's Club, Brooklyn, N. Y., the pastor, Robert E. Pretlow, gave a very interesting talk on the present status of the Peace Movement in America. The club meets monthly, and light refreshments are served after the address of the evening.

The Quaker Study Club at its meeting the 27th ult., was entertained by A. S. Underhill with his illustrated lecture on the Passion Play. Professor Rayner W. Kelsey spoke at the previous meeting on different types of Friends and recent changes in the Society. Both lectures were very much appreciated.

Brooklyn Friends are making earnest efforts to contribute to the success of the Chapman-Alexander Meetings, and committees of workers, ushers, visitors, etc., are ready to enter into active work. All are praying and hoping for a mighty outpouring of the Spirit.

A revival meeting of three weeks duration closed the 22d ult., at Fairmount, Ind. The meeting was conducted by the pastor, Richard Haworth, assisted by Virgil P. Brock, an evangelistic singer, who is a student in Fairmount Academy. While there was no attempt at display or sensational methods, the attendance throughout was large. The plain, simple Gospel was preached. Holiness of heart and life was held up as the only true standard of Christian life and happiness. As a result about 80 persons professed either the forgiveness of their sins or the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Over 20 of the academy students were converted. One young man, converted in the meetings feels definitely called to the ministry. In general, the Church was very much strengthened and encouraged. Ten persons applied for membership at the close of the meetings.

Bryn Mawr College has sent out announcements concerning a number of fellowships and scholarships open for competition to the female graduates of any college of good standing. Bryn Mawr has 12 resident fellowships of the value of $525 open to Bachelors who have completed one year of graduate work; a research fellowship in chemistry of the value of $750 open to graduate students who have received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy or completed equivalent work; 18 resident graduate scholarships of the value of $200 open to graduates with or without advanced work.

One scholarship in Political Theory of the value of $250 founded in memory of Susan B. Anthony.

After having spent one or two years in studying in the graduate school of Bryn Mawr College, students become eligible for one of three foreign fellowships, two of the value of $500 and one of the value of $700, which enable the winners to spend a year at some foreign university.

The college also has five scholarships of the value of $405 each, which are open to women of British nationality and five scholarships open to women of German nationality who have similar qualifications to those required from candidates for the resident scholarships.

Friends at Kansas City, Mo., moved to their new church building the 5th inst. Their systematic effort to enlist all their resident membership in the work is unique and suggestive. Some days ago a return postcard was mailed to every member bearing this message:

"You are, of course, interested in the success of our church in the new location. It cannot succeed, as it ought, unless every member does his part. Will you not do your part? That we may have as definite an idea as possible of our strength numerically with which to undertake the work in the new neighborhood, will you not earnestly consider, sign and return the accompanying card?"

"Yours for the Church."

The reply read as follows:

"To help make the Friends Church a success in its new location, I hereby promise that I will let nothing but illness, or urgent necessity, prevent my attending the Bible School and the Morning Church Service for the ensuing three months.

Yours sincerely,

Later a house-to-house canvass was made, and a neat folder was left with each family. On the cover page of the folder was a line sketch of the new meeting-house with announcements of the Bible School services, and officers, and other personal mention on the inside.

Our California correspondent writes as follows concerning "A Family of Graduates":

"Dr. Enoch Lewis and Rebecca G. Lewis, with their seven children, formerly of Albion, Iowa, hold a record of interest in higher education not often duplicated in one family. The four sons and three daughters were all graduated from Penn College, and at one period five of these were students in the institution at the same time. Mary H. Lewis won a Bryn Mawr Scholarship. She also took a Master's degree at Penn College, her thesis being 'The Ministry of Women Among Friends in the seventeenth century.' Arthur Lewis completed the course at nineteen years of age, winning a Haverford Scholarship and was granted a Master's Degree by Penn College.

"The wholesome results of a guarded religious education are manifest in this case, as all these graduates are loyal and useful members of the Society. Mary H. Lewis resides with her mother at Pasadena, Cal. She spent the year 1908 teaching in the Friends Mission at Tokyo, Japan, where her sister Alice has taught for six years. Esther Lewis has held the position of reader in the Iowa State University for a time. She is now the wife of Judge Daniel R. Perkins of South Dakota. The sons have all followed the maxim, 'Back to the land,' Carl and George taking charge of the farm which was the family home near Marshalltown, Iowa, while Austin and Walter are engaged with land interests at Gate, Okla. Dr. Enoch Lewis passed away six years ago at Oskaloosa, Iowa.

"Were the example of these devoted parents, in educating their children at a cost of several thousand dollars, followed by any considerable portion of the membership of the Society of Friends, it would solve the problem of the support of our colleges.

"Some may find in the tendency that thus led an entire family to the pursuit of high ideals, support for the claims of heredity, in view of the fact that Rebecca G. Lewis is a descendant of Margaret Fell, being of the eighth generation in a direct line from this noted woman in Quaker annals, through her daughter, Sarah Mead, whose husband, William Mead, shared with William Penn sore persecution for preaching contrary to the tyrannical legal enactments of that day."

EDITOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

I notice in current number of THE AMERICAN FRIEND [issue for First month 26, 1911] an editorial note on the Year Book of English Friends. I frequently receive calls for our Year Book from prominent institutions desiring information concerning the work of the churches, and I am always humiliated to have to inform them we have none.

There is a very simple way in which the want may be provided. Let the minutes of all our yearly meetings be printed at the same place in uniform style and size. Then it will be possible to take those portions that deal with education from all the minutes and have a complete educational report of Friends work. In the same way we can have complete reports on Evangelistic and Church Extension, Home Mission Work, Foreign Mission Work, Bible Schools, Christian Endeavor, a complete church directory, and a complete year book without extra type setting.

In fact there will not be so much type setting. For there are certain parts common to all our minutes, as London General Epistle, Reports on Peace, Indian affairs, F. A. I. M., etc.; where now the type is set up 14 times. And in the case of Indiana and Western, one-third the entire matter of the minutes is common to both. This last year both these minutes were printed by the same firm with a very material saving in type setting.

There may be some practical difficulties, but none that cannot be overcome, and the gain in such reports as suggested will be of great value. All the Boards of our Five Years Meeting will have each year the material they need for their use, so far as our present work is concerned, and it will put in the hands of the superintendents and committees of each of our yearly meetings information as to what every other yearly meeting is doing in their department and thus each will have the advantage of the experience of all. Another thing that can be done is to print the Epistle of each yearly meeting, and the time of the yearly meeting can be saved from reading them, and they can be put in the hands of all our members who never go to yearly meetings to hear them. I hope our next Five Years Meeting may solve this problem.

Another reform I hope can be brought about. London Yearly Meeting now reads nothing in the face of the meeting except the minutes of its own decisions. Each report is printed beforehand and put in the hands of all members who care to take the trouble to get it. This gives opportunity for anyone who wishes to study the report before hand. When it comes before the yearly meeting some member of the committee introduces the report calling attention to the matters of most importance. All present have the report in their hands, and can follow the report intelligently. The entire time can be used for discussion, which can be intelligently done because interested members can prepare for it, as they cannot do when they have the report for the first time in the face of the meeting. The result is a lively valuable discussion, instead of the dull monotony of listening to reading. Indiana and Western are trying the experiment this year, and it would be interesting for other yearly meetings to do the same. It involves no extra type setting as that is done before yearly meeting instead of after as now. The minutes can be issued more promptly.

It will, however, if it is to be a success, involve the prompt and early preparation of reports in order to give time for printing and distribution. But I am satisfied it will add greatly to the interest and value of our yearly meetings.

EDITOR THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Elbert Russell's criticisms in THE AMERICAN FRIEND of First month 12th, of Isaac and Rebecca, stating that they were essentially irreligious, has been read with some astonishment accompanied with mental questioning. Was Rebecca a wayward and spoiled girl lured by jeweled trinkets, fine apparel, love of adventure and the prospect of a rich husband, or was the hand of God in the selection and acceptance? Faithful Eleazer in his account of the instructions given him by their uncle Abraham, that an angel would guide him and prosper his way, convinced them (Bethuel and Laban) so fully that they declared "This thing proceedeth from the Lord." In short, could Isaac or Rebecca have bettered themselves? They lived prosperous, happy and peaceful lives, and religious lives, we believe, to a good old age.

God blessed him frequently, at different times visited him, and he erected an altar at Beor Sheba and worshipped there, and the remaining thirty years of his one hundred and eighty years, spent there and at Mamre must have been years of worship and sacrifice.

Isaac prayed for Rebecca and his prayer was answered and Rebecca inquired of the Lord and was answered. Isaac led a quiet, peaceful life, not quarreling with his neighbors, consequently his life's history was shorter than that of the more eventful lives of Abraham and Jacob; but there is certainly enough history to establish the fact that he was a religious man and not an essentially irreligious one as claimed. Much stress is placed on the failure of Isaac to sacrifice at Abraham's altar before entering Sarah's tent, passing Abraham's altar on the way. This was Abraham's altar, not Isaac's. Isaac had not yet set up a family altar. Rebecca had ridden for many days on a camel's back and needed rest; besides there is no evidence that Abraham did not in due time prepare a sacrifice and celebrate the wedding by appropriate religious ceremonies; Isaac joining therein with Rebecca modestly acquiescing in the, to her, new religion.

Why in these comments must Abraham be called a sheik, a modern term applicable to a Bedouin, instead of Patriarch, the Bible term, and why must Rebecca be humiliated by having hung in her nose an ear ring without her consent or the consent of sacred or profane history. The writer of these few feeble comments has looked on Isaac as being the typical Quaker character of the Old Testament, and religious man who lived his religion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Although not a member of the Friends Church, I read with interest THE AMERICAN FRIEND, and I was much pleased with the article on Isaac and Rebecca in last week's issue. If the writer of the article seems to be indulging in hyperbole when he characterizes as "essentially irreligious" the life of one whose name appears on the roll of the faithful in Hebrews, we must remember that there are other names on that roll—Rahab and Jephtha for example—whose hold upon God was but little reflected in their every-day life, and after all man must judge by the outward conduct, although the Lord may look upon the heart. The story in Genesis pictures Isaac as not only inactive, but as self-centered and without vision. His comparative failure, with a great heritage and a great opportunity for usefulness to the world, should bring a lesson to the twentieth century Christian, and to the twentieth century church as well—for it was a church, and not a company of heathens, that the inspired apostle declared to be wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked, while they thought they were rich and increased with goods and had need of nothing. "Whatsoever things were written aforetime"—in both the patriarchal and the apostolic record—"were written for our learning."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Since reading the criticism some time ago in the Evangelical Friend, "That altogether too much was taken for granted when the Uniform Discipline was formulated, and now Friends are in a quandary. Beyond question the Uniform Discipline does not contain the declaration as an authorized part of it." And further, "A yearly meeting may, or may not accept the fundamentals of the Gospel." (See the issue of October 27, 1910.)

I think the last statement entirely too strong, in view of the declaration that was adopted, with the epistle of George Fox, and the declaration of the Richmond Conference of 1887, referred to "for more explicit and extended statements of belief."

The brief declaration of faith in our discipline of "essential truths," contains what was thought by the conference that prepared it, sufficient upon the fundamentals of Christian doctrine. For any, however, who might desire to see, "more explicit and extended statements of belief," they are cited to the epistle of George Fox to the Governor of Barbadoes, and to the more lengthy declaration of faith of the Richmond Conference of 1887.

While it might have been better to have formally adopted the Declaration of 1887, instead of the shorter one that was adopted, to my mind it comes with equal authority, when it is referred to as "officially put forth."

To illustrate why I think so, let me suppose THE AMERICAN FRIEND published a short statement of its belief, mentioning as the adopted Declaration does, "the sinful condition of man, the cleansing of sin in forgiveness, sanctification through the blood of Christ, the Deity and humanity of the Son of God, the atonement through Jesus Christ, the resurrection, the baptism with the Holy Spirit and endowment of power, the Divine authenticity of the Scriptures, having no need of any human priest, ordinance or ceremony," and wound up by saying, "For more explicit and extended statements of belief, see the Declaration of Faith issued by the Richmond Conference in 1887." Now would not all understand that a full acceptance and endorsement of said Declaration was meant?

When a minister expresses an opinion on a subject and cites scripture quotations to prove it, is it not fair to conclude that he accepts, believes, and adopts the same as his own even if he does not quote in full, the Scripture alluded to?

I most fully agree with Luke Woodard's article in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, First month 5, 1911, but cannot endorse all of "constant reader's" comment on the same, in the issue of First month 19th.

If a declaration or "Confession of Faith is not authoritative and binding upon the members of the church, I see but little use in having one at all. If such is for "outsiders, and to clear Friends from the charges of heretical and false views," and yet not binding upon the members, what would it be worth to the "outsider?"

In the Uniform Discipline (Form of Government, chap. 2) it is stated that "Friends admit into membership all who make a profession of faith . . . and have accepted the doctrines of the Gospel as held by the Friends." Associate members shall be enrolled as active members upon profession of faith when they "have accepted the doctrine as held by the Friends." How are we to know the "doctrine as held by Friends," except by their confession of faith? Where is the consistency of requiring those not members to subscribe to our statements of doctrine before becoming members, that are not authoritative or binding upon the members?

Before one can be recorded a minister, a committee from the quarterly meeting must know his doctrinal views, and each yearly meeting may use such methods as it may deem best to ascertain the doctrinal views of ministers and elders. If any do not hold and teach doctrine as held by friends, they should not be recorded, or retained in these stations. Is there a better way of deciding what Friends do believe than by examining their confession, or declaration of faith? I believe a declaration of faith is intended to be in a very important sense, "authoritative and binding upon the members" of the church.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

With due regard to any who want our "Church" called the "Quaker" Church, I must say our original name is certainly very sweet, Friends, from John 15:14, "Ye are my Friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." That is taking our name from the Bible, and we are really in name as we wish to be in spirit, the Friends of Jesus.

ELIJAH'S FLIGHT AND RETURN

I Kings 18:41-19:21.

For Special Study, 19:1-6.

GOLDEN TEXT.—They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength. Isa. 40:31.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Second month 13th. Elijah running before Ahab. I Kings 18:41-46.

Third-day. In the wilderness. I Kings 19:1-8.

Fourth-day. The still small voice. I Kings 19:9-14.

Fifth-day. The new ministration. I Kings 19:15-21.

Sixth-day. Appeal of Moses. Numb. 11:1-15.

Seventh-day. My heart faileth. Psa. 73:1-28.

First-day. My groaning is not hid. Psa. 38:1-22.

Time.—The day after the last lesson, 856, or 909 B. C.

Places.—1st, Jezreel, about 20 miles north of Samaria, a royal residence; 2d, the wilderness beyond Beersheba, 40 miles southwest of Jerusalem, and about 100 miles from Jezreel; 3d, Horeb, or Mount Sinai.

Rulers.—Ahab and Jezebel in Israel, Jehoshaphat in Judah.

Parallel Account.—None.

The graphic narrative continues from the close of last lesson, and should be read. As soon as the cloud arose, though it was "as small as a man's hand," Elijah knew that his prayer was answered. The rain in Palestine comes from the Mediterranean, from the west. From the nearest end of Carmel to Jezreel would be about 18 miles. Elijah's race is probably mentioned as an indication of his supernatural power.

1, 2. Jezebel, notwithstanding her power, was, doubtless, afraid to put Elijah to death, and determined so to frighten him that he would take refuge in flight. "So." No special words are used. The invoker was fearful of using words of ill-omen which might injure herself. This feeling was common and there are other instances in the Bible.

3. Elijah lost no time in starting and continuing in his flight. "Beersheba." Literally, "Well of the oath." It marks the southern limit of cultivation midway between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. Dan was in the extreme north; hence the proverb "From Dan to Beersheba" (1 Kings 4:25). Beersheba was 95 miles from Jezreel. "Servant." Rather, disciple. It was needful for him to be alone. Compare Matt. 26:36.

4. "A day's journey into the wilderness." An uninhabited place. "Juniper tree." A shrub of the broom family, which grows quite tall enough to give some shade. The passage reads, literally, "A single bush of broom." The following words are a wonderful picture of utter discouragement. After all said and done he was no better than his fathers. What had the great incidents of his life, even the triumph at Mt. Carmel accomplished? Here he was a fugitive in the wilderness without prospect of anything better. Many a discouraged soul since has felt just as Elijah did.

5, 6. "Arise and eat." Instead of taking away his life, the command came, strengthen that life. Partly from facts and partly from physical exhaustion, Elijah was down-cast and worn out.

Just when all seemed at its worst God's messenger came and told him what to do.

7. He needed more than to recuperate; he needed increased strength.

8. "Went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights." This does not necessarily mean that he ate nothing during that period, but that his normal strength was restored and more too, and that he was able to live on what food he could get in the wilderness. The distance to Horeb is about 170 miles. There was now no occasion for hurry and doubtless Elijah took his time. Horeb and Sinai are practically interchangeable names. Here was thought to be the special meeting place with Jehovah. This may have directed Elijah's flight.

9. "The word of the Lord came." It is not stated how. Probably in a vision. "What doest thou here, Elijah?" According as each of the three middle words of this question is emphasized, the meaning will be different. Doubtless all those meanings were included. What was he doing? Nothing. Thou, the prophet of the Lord, who hast been so blessed. Here in the desert, when there are men and women to be helped, scoffers to be rebuked, idolators to be reclaimed!

10. Elijah tells how he was overwhelmed with a sense of failure. "Jealous" has a suggestion of "zealous." He had been zealous in vain, as it appeared to him.

11, 12. The answer was, "Go stand before the mouth of the cave and wait and watch." The splendid description could hardly be surpassed, "Passed by." In the most striking and terrifying symbols of His power—whirlwind, earthquake, fire. "Still small voice." Literally, "a sound of gentle stillness." It was so still that the very silence seemed to speak.

13. Elijah, overawed, retired into the mouth of the cave and again he heard the same question. Fearing lest he might look on the face of Jehovah, he wrapped his face in his prophet's mantle. Compare Exod. 3:6.

14. Elijah, moved as he is, does not fully recognize the meaning of the revelation which he received, and repeats his former answer.

15, 16. Instead of answering Elijah directly, he is shown there are three things at least, for him to do—three men who are to carry on the work of the extirpation of Baal worship—Ahab was to be attacked from without by the Syrians under Hazael, a war-like king; Jehu, another great soldier, was to attack him from the south; and third, Elijah's place as a prophet was to be taken by Elisha. There is no mention of the anointing of Elisha.

17, 21. These verses carry on the story so far as Elisha is concerned.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. "Alas for him who never sees,
The sun shine through his cypress trees."

2. "If we weaken the body too much, we do not make it the slave of the spirit, but rather make the spirit its slave. By violating the laws of physical righteousness we only make moral and spiritual righteousness more difficult to attain."

3. The silent, often unobserved forces, are the ones of greatest and most lasting influence.

Life's Year

Full happy is the man who comes at last
Into the safe completion of his year;
Weathered the perils of his spring, that blast
How many blossoms promising and dear!
And of his summer, with dread passions fraught,
That oft, like fire through the ripening corn,
Blight all with mocking death and leave distraught
Loved ones to mourn the ruined waste, forlorn.
But now, tho autumn gave but harvest slight,
Oh, grateful is he to the powers above
For winter's sunshine, and the lengthened night
By hearth-side genial with the warmth of love.
Through silvered days of vistas gold and green
Contentedly he glides away, serene.

A MISSIONARY JOURNEY AROUND THE WORLD. II.

Missions in the United States. (South.)

ISAIAH 55:1-13.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Second month 20th. Outstretched hands. Ps. 68:31-35.

Third-day. First-fruits of Ethiopia. Acts 8:26-38.

Fourth-day. Neglected fields. Matt. 9:36-38.

Fifth-day. Blind to opportunity. Acts 10:9-17.

Sixth-day. Rural missions. Mark 1:35-39.

Seventh-day. Organized missions. Matt. 10:1-15.

The hope of the colored race in America lies not in Christian mission halls, but in Christian educational halls. The emotional nature of the negro yields quickly to the religious appeal. When the stimulus is removed it relaxes as quickly to the level of moral life to which the appeal was first made. Christian education arouses the life and then by training holds it upon the higher level until it becomes established. Forty years of this type of Christian missions in the South has vindicated its right to the field.

At the close of the Civil War only a negligible fraction of the negro population was literate. By 1890, the percentage of illiterates in the race had fallen to 59.1; by 1900, to 44.5. Thirty years ago a negro teacher would have been a curiosity; now there are 30,000 negro teachers instructing 2,000,000 children.

Booker T. Washington is the greatest living advocate of the transformation of the colored race through Christian industrial education. He and those working with him are disposed to waive all questions as to the social and political status of the negro, and to concentrate their energies upon the improvement of the economic position of the race. The practical methods advocated are industrial education and the development of thrift and the instinct of property ownership.

At the close of the Civil War, the negroes were penniless; now 400,000 own their own houses. 23,383 square miles of land in the United States are owned by 750,000 negro farmers.

We suggest that Friends Christian Endeavor societies consider what is being done by Friends for freedom in the South. We submit herewith brief statements regarding four such schools.

I. Institute for Colored Youth, Cheyney, Pa.

The Institute for Colored Youth was organized in Philadelphia in 1887. In 1903 the management decided to reorganize the work as carried on in the City of Philadelphia and to concentrate their efforts and funds in a first-class normal school with this aim: To give a course of instruction, both academic and industrial, that will prepare the young people for teachers of the various industrial subjects and graded school work.

This year it has again brought together from nearly every State of the East and South about 75 teachers, and through them it will influence during the next year the work of at least 3,500 pupils.

During the six years of the operation of the institution it has reached 408 teachers, who (counting all students taught since taking the Cheyney course) have influenced approximately 60,000 pupils.

The Institute for Colored Youth stands as a sole example of a Northern Teachers' Training School aiming to train colored men and women for work in Southern schools.

A new library was dedicated in 1910. New dormitory facilities are necessary, for more than 50 applications were refused last year. The principal is Hugh M. Browne, Cheyney, Pa.

II. Christiansburg Industrial Institute, Cambria, Va.

This school is modeled after the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute of Tuskegee, Alabama.

The object of the institution aside from literary training, is to give young men and women sufficient knowledge of some industry by which they will be able to earn a living and become intelligent, useful citizens. Graduates are fitted to teach in Virginia public schools.

The property of the school consists of a farm of 185 acres and 11 buildings, which, with the tools and equipment, is valued at $75,000.

In the industrial department, the school teaches agriculture, printing, blacksmithing, carpentry, shoe-mending, millinery, laundering, sewing, cooking and general housework. The school conducts academic and normal departments.

There are 269 students enrolled.

The principal is Edgar A. Long, Cambria, Va.

III. Southland College and Normal Institute, Helena, Ark.

This school was founded in 1864. Its aim has been to make its students useful and law-abiding citizens of the commonwealth, a blessing to their own race and a benefit to the State. Its success in this line has been of great service to that part of the country, and its influence has extended to adjacent States.

The thorough, practical training given its students has qualified them to succeed, especially in teaching, in which a large number (over 400) of them have been engaged.

The majority are perhaps rightly employed along agricultural lines. Some have chosen the practice of medicine, or that of law, while others are in the civil service as pension agents, mail clerks, etc. Many enter the Gospel ministry.

The school is located on a farm of over 300 acres. There are four school buildings. The school accommodates between 160 and 170 students. The president is Harry C. Wolford, Helena, Ark.

IV. High Point, North Carolina.

Handicapped by a disastrous fire which destroyed a valuable building, the friends of this school have rallied to its support and the new building erected to replace the loss has proved a great success. The following taken from a letter from one of the trustees describes the work of the institution.

"The school has filled an important part in the great demand of the colored girls and boys for education. Even with this addition to our accommodations we have not been able to care for all those who have requested admission. Three years ago we accommodated from 50 to 60 boarding pupils. This year we have 91 students who reside on the place and we care for over 200 day pupils from the city. All the boarding students are taught trades and it has been gratifying to hear from our former students where they have obtained situations in consequence of this education, and life to them has been a success. Nevertheless it has been a greater burden to the principal, A. J. Griffin and the teachers to care for so many."

HEREDITY

CAN BE OVERCOME IN CASES.

The influence of heredity cannot, of course, be successfully disputed, but it can be minimized or entirely overcome in some cases by correct food and drink. A Conn. lady says:

"For years while I was a coffee drinker I suffered from bilious attacks of great severity, from which I used to emerge as white as a ghost and very weak. Our family physician gave me various prescriptions for improving the digestion and stimulating the liver, which I tried faithfully but without perceptible result.

"He was acquainted with my family history for several generations back, and once when I visited him he said: 'If you have inherited one of those torpid livers you may always suffer more or less from its inaction. We can't dodge our inheritance, you know.'

"I was not so strong a believer in heredity as he was, however, and, beginning to think for myself, I concluded to stop drinking coffee, and see what effect that would have. I feared it would be a severe trial to give it up, but when I took Postum and had it well made, it completely filled my need for a hot beverage and I grew very fond of it.

"I have used Postum for three years, using no medicine. During all that time I have had absolutely none of the bilious attacks that I used to suffer from, and I have been entirely free from the pain and debilitating effects that used to result from them.

"The change is surely very great, and I am compelled to give Postum the exclusive credit for it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

A More Excellent Way Of Bible Study

I have very briefly pointed out the dangers and limitations of literalism and allegorizing as methods of biblical interpretation. There are, no doubt, many passages of Scripture which are to be taken literally and many other passages which are to be treated as allegory or taken spiritually, but whenever either of these methods is capriciously or sweepingly applied, the real meaning of this great Book of revelation is lost or distorted.

There remains another method of interpretation which has more promise of success, which is, in fact, the only sound method, for it gives both the former methods their true place. I mean, of course, the historical method of study and of interpretation. No great living creation can be cut up into pieces and bits, and these pieces used without any regard to their setting in the whole, and the Bible is no exception to the principle. A famous lawyer once said, in his argument: "We have it on the highest authority that 'all which a man hath will he give for his life.'" The opposition lawyer made very merry over the citation, and remarked that he was very glad to know what the learned counsel's highest authority was, as these words were actually spoken by Satan! (Job II: 4.) The first speaker had used his text without any reference to its place in the larger whole of a great Book, and had assumed that it had the weight of a divine authority behind it.

This tendency to cut a text apart from its context and to use it as though it had come down to us sealed in a separate package is a very common tendency and has led to much confusion. But it is just as serious to neglect the larger setting of the place where and the time when the words were uttered and the meaning they were meant to convey when they were written or spoken. Every one of the prophetic books of the Old Testament is dealing with a situation as real and urgent and concrete as our American struggle with slavery. In each one of the books the Hebrew people or the nation is confronted with definite issues and the great words are uttered primarily in direct reference to these issues. They can never be truly understood if the historical background is ignored. These men were so divinely favoured that they uttered many truths which are eternally true and can be applied to any nation or any age, but the primary meaning of any passage can be understood only when we see what they were dealing with.

It is perfectly obvious that St. Paul's epistles cannot be correctly interpreted until we come in touch with the situation that confronted him when he wrote his chapters. For example, the Church has for ages quoted his word that "women must keep silence in the churches and be in subjection" as the final authority that only men are to minister. A little historical insight would have given a vastly different conclusion. St. Paul lays down as his broad working principle that "in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female," i. e., in spiritual matters distinctions of sex are annulled. But in Corinth there were peculiar reasons why the women of the Church were to be kept in a modest and restrained position, and the wise apostle's cautious and practical regulation for a local situation has been exalted into an eternal law for all ages and places! There has recently been much discussion over Isaac and Rebekah, and we have heard the clang of controversy as to whether they were religious and moral or not. The whole matter has been confused by the failure to deal with the situation historically. Isaac was not an American citizen of the nineteenth century and he did not belong to a modern Christian Church. He was born and nurtured in a patriarchal civilization, where religion and moral ideals were vastly different from ours. Nobody then chose his wife according to the moving of his own heart; his wife was chosen for him, and it did not occur to anybody that a different way was conceivable. It was an age when child-sacrifice was common, and the wonder was not that Isaac was bound to an altar and doomed to sacrifice, but that a divine revelation burst in upon this child's father as he raised his knife—a clear insight that God did not want the child's life and did not call for it. This episode, therefore, marks one of the great revelation epochs in the life of the race—a watershed moment—when a higher conception of God dawned upon a father's soul.

To swing back again to the New Testament—there is no chance of understanding the passages which seem to refer to a second coming until they are read in the light of history. There grew up in Palestine during the two centuries or more of history before the birth of Christ a vast literature which formulated the glowing expectations of Israel. The Messianic age was the theme of all great writers of the period. The very air was loaded with dreams of the age to come shortly. The people's minds were saturated with the ideas and the words of this literature. Christ always found Himself confronted, in whatever group He might be, with these crude popular expectations. His three great temptations were temptations to accept and fulfil these expectations—to be the kind of Messiah the people expected. Throughout His ministry He was again and again met with questions which made it necessary for Him to deal with these expectations, and now no one can unravel the meaning of His words on these matters until he goes back and finds out what those expectations were and how the Saviour rose above them and transcended them, even while using the familiar words and phrases of that time. The Book of Revelation is another creation which cannot be cut into pieces and taken out of its setting. If it is to become to us a living message, we must ask first what it would mean to its first readers there in the Asian churches, as they faced their sufferings, their martyrdoms and their temptations. The imagery is the familiar imagery of the first century—the white stone, the rainbow, the name written in the book, the white robes, the palm branches, and the war of the Lamb against the beast.

This all means, of course, that we must gradually furnish our minds with fuller, wider, more adequate knowledge of the ancient world, its issues and its ideas, if we are to fully grasp this great volume of revelation, and that is coming step by step. Meantime we all know enough to comprehend the simple gospel of forgiving love, the true way of the Kingdom: "Love God with thy whole heart, and thy neighbor as thyself."

Friends Meetings in London

It is encouraging to find that Friends have made substantial progress in the largest city of the world. A study of London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting covering the decade between 1900 and 1910, together with maps showing the location of meetings at the beginning and the close of the period, has just been issued. From this we learn:

At the close of 1899 the quarterly meeting, comprising six monthly meetings, contained 31 meetings, with a membership of 2,677; at the present time there are 46 meetings and a membership at the end of 1909 of 3,038, which shows an addition of 17 new meetings (two were discontinued; a net gain of 15) and an increase in membership of 361, or 13.5 per cent., i. e., about $1\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. per annum. During the same period the number of associate members and registered attenders at our meetings has increased from 651 to 801.

This growth is 6.5 per cent. greater than the average increase in America for the same period. In other words, London Friends, with guarded methods of Church extension, have grown nearly twice as fast as Friends in this country. Like American Friends, their gains have come from without. The report continues:

Statistics show that this increase in membership is entirely due to the admission of new members by conviction. There is a loss by the excess of deaths over gains by birth of children registered as members, and there is also a loss on the balance of removals.

The number of meetings has increased so much faster than the membership that the average attendance at particular meetings has considerably diminished. This is partially explained by the movement of Friends to the suburbs. The report says:

It will be seen, on reference to the London map, that nearly all of the new meetings are at a distance of about seven miles from central London. At present most of the members of London Quarterly Meeting have made their homes at about six to eight miles from the center. The older meetings within this circle have all suffered depletion (except Bunhill), while the older meetings on the circle have maintained their position best of all.

It is not to be expected that the migration of Friends to the suburbs has stopped, and there is already the beginning of an outer ring of meetings at a distance of about twelve miles. The three meetings which have been recently started at about the twelve-mile radius are all in districts which enjoy a good railway service to the city. The presumption is that, as the traveling facilities improve, Friends will tend more and more to live further out, and so the districts on the twelve-mile circle will need to be provided with Friends meetings in the future.

It is noteworthy that more workers are found with a decreased attendance in a particular meeting.

Three Important Measures Before Congress

With only a few days left for business, three important measures are yet pending before Congress. One is the amendment providing for the popular election of Senators, which has passed the House and has been placed on the program of the Senate as irregular business.

The second is a bill providing for the appointment of a Tariff Board. The measure, as it passed the House, empowers the President to appoint a permanent board of five members who shall investigate the cost of production, tariff schedules and "all other facts which may be necessary or convenient in fixing import duties or in aiding the President and other officers of the Government in the administration of the custom laws." At the direction of the President, the board is to report on the effect of tariff or bounty laws in foreign countries. If this bill passes the Senate, which is now somewhat doubtful owing to the press of business, it will put tariff legislation on an entirely new basis. In place of the tremendous contest for special privileges among the varied industries and different sections of the country, it will provide a means for the scientific adjustment of trade and taxation.

The third measure is the Canadian Reciprocity Agreement. It is practically certain that the House will approve the measure this week; and, for political reasons, the Senate can ill afford to adjourn without like action. There are a few determined obstructionists—Senators Bailey, Borah and others—who may be able to prevent the vote. Should they succeed, the President is prepared to call an extra session, in which instance the new Tariff Board and the Reciprocity Agreement are both likely to become laws.

The reception of the Reciprocity Agreement in Canada is as favorable as could be expected. The Canadian House is considering the measure, and no less a personage than the Finance Minister, Fielding, has declared "that Parliament will put through the measure without delay with the provision that it should go into force as soon as the United States has taken favorable action."

Unseating Lorimer

Recent developments in the Lorimer contest give occasion for encouragement. The increasing sentiment against him is not alone due to a study of the evidence of bribery in the Illinois Legislature. The country at large has been aroused, and Senators are hearing from their constituents. In some instances the protest has been so emphatic that their honors are being forced from a state of apathy to one of active interest.

This unusual manifestation of a public conscience is no less significant than the ground of an appeal made by Senator Root last week. He declared that legal technicalities should in no wise hinder the Senate from rendering a judgment in accordance with moral intelligence. To quote his words:

"We are here not as a court. We are more than a court. There is no power short of a Constitutional amendment which limits or controls the evidence we shall take of the grounds upon which we shall act in deciding the qualifications of a member of this body. The sole limit to our power is our own sense of justice and right and the public weal. There are no statutes which bind us. We are not a board of canvassers to count votes. Congress itself cannot control us in the protection of the integrity of this body. We are charged with a duty to determine, on our own consciences, whether the election of William Lorimer was brought about by corruption. It is not a question of the mere counting of votes, but a question of substance."

The Recall of Mayor Gill

The power of recall was exercised for the first time in Washington State last week when Mayor Hiram C. Gill, Seattle, was voted out of office and George W. Dillingham, the candidate of the Public Welfare League, was voted in. It was also the first election in the State where women exercised the right of franchise.

Mayor Gill was elected last year on a wide-open ticket, and his troubles began with the appointment of a notorious character as chief-of-police. The two were charged with collecting a large private revenue from the keepers of dives and houses of ill-fame. Meanwhile the women of the State were given the right of suffrage, and of the 71,000 votes registered, 22,000 were women's. A year ago Mayor Gill received 18,000 out of 35,000 votes; last week he received 25,000 votes, an increase of 7,000 over his election poll, but his opponent received 31,000 votes. The downtown wards supported the Mayor, but the residential districts were strong against him. This indicates that the mothers and wives of the city were responsible for his recall; and the result of the vote seems to vindicate the contention that woman suffrage would insure higher standards in politics. It will also have its effect in Kansas, where woman suffrage will be an issue in the coming campaign.

Finding Atlantis

According to Plato, in the Timaeus, Atlantis was a continent lying over against the pillars of Hercules, which, as the result of a mighty earthquake, disappeared in the sea. This is practically all we know of the lost Atlantis. But Herr Frobenius, a German explorer, announces that he has found it not in the Atlantic to the westward of Gibraltar, but in the so-called Hinterland of Togo, in northwestern Africa. He has recently returned from an expedition in this region, and, in token of his claim, has brought back a bronze bust of Poseidon. His evidence is far from conclusive, because "one swallow does not make a summer," nor does one statue establish the fact of an archaic civilization. His courage and imagination, however, must be commended, since they betray the qualities that have blazed the way for discovery.

The Boyhood of John Henry Douglas

BY MABEL H. DOUGLAS.

II.

In a previous article we have had a glimpse of the life of John Henry Douglas from his own viewpoint. How often, when we see a fine, promising boy, we say, "What a strong man he will make." How seldom we project ourselves backward and try to imagine the boy that was "father to the man." In fact, we take things so for granted that we almost forget that the man was ever a child at all.

For the most of my readers (who know John Henry Douglas so well), it will take no very great flight of the imagination to picture the active, impulsive, dark-eyed little fellow, playing with his brother, Robert, around the old, red farmhouse "down in Maine." The house itself is of interest to us. It is no longer standing, but at the time of our hero's birth it was one hundred and fifty years old. His father had bought it from his father-in-law. His mother, Chloe Douglas, and his brother, Robert, and himself were all born in the same room. He had a little brother who died at the age of four, and three older half-sisters, Hannah Lane, Oskaloosa; Eunice Winslow, lately deceased, and Lydia Douglas, who died at the age of twenty-one.

We can almost see the family group as they clustered at evening around the fireplace of the old farmhouse—the father, David Douglas, a man of magnificent build, 6 feet 2 inches tall, noted for his great physical powers and endurance, but no less for his mental poise and strict moral and religious integrity. He was an inspiration to his sons, as noted in a previous paper. Then came the mother, tall, slender, with the dark, keen eyes inherited by both of her boys. She was a woman of remarkable executive ability. Her sons always speak of her not only with the utmost filial love and affection, but with the most intense admiration for her mental powers.

His playmate, schoolmate and life-long friend, his brother, Robert, is known so well to all of us that he needs no introduction.

Amid these happy surroundings the child spent the first eight years of his life. Here, at the age of four, he started to school, and one of his first recollections is of receiving a "reward of merit" card at this very "tender" age. He attended the Friends academies of the neighborhood, and at fourteen went to Providence Boarding School with his brother, Robert. At school and in the literary societies the boys were great debaters, usually taking opposite sides for the sake of the argument merely. The great political questions of the day were "thrashed out" by them, and it would indeed have been interesting to hear some of their first debates on the temperance reform in those early days in Maine. John Henry's eyes fairly kindle now at thought of those "winged words."

It is indeed remarkable how many things the boy learned to do before he reached young manhood. He became a competent clerk, a skilled shoemaker (hand-sewing on the uppers), a farmer with specialties, I think, in horses and trees. Only last First-day he was showing me how well his walnuts, trees of his own planting, had prospered. Even at the age of seventy-eight he is eager to take up "ranch" work, as we call farming in California. His shoemaking experience makes him a splendid judge of leather. He also acquired a knowledge of boats, and became a most untiring fisherman. It was all these varied elements and experiences that went far, in later years, to transform the conscientious, imaginative child into a great "fisher of men." They gave him, too, a wealth of experience which brought him close to men, so that he gained not only their confidence, but their love, in a most remarkable way. I meet so many today whose faces light with gladness at the mere mention of his name, "A heritage, it seems to me, well worth a life to hold in fee."

Immediately after his conversion, he describes his call to the ministry in the following words:

"My heart was at once enlarged in love to God and my fellow-men. I wanted to tell father, mother, brothers and sisters and even the whole world what the Lord had done for my soul. I spent several months with a cousin in Springfield, Ohio, and had the great privilege of sitting under the ministry of E. G. Pray.

"I found myself entering upon an entirely new field; the Bible was my constant companion. I soon read it through. It seemed more interesting than all other books. I felt sure that if my vows were performed, I must tell to others what great things the Lord had done for me. But I found myself tied hand and foot. No way was opened for me to tell how it was with me. We were advised not to talk on such subjects. I was alive, but in prison.

"After several months I returned to my home in Maine. My family and friends were glad to know that I had become a Christian. A little while after my return a traveling minister, Joanna Miller, came to my father's house, expecting him to take her to some meetings north of St. Albans. My father was sick in bed—the only time I can remember his being ill enough to be in bed, until his last sickness.

"The dear sister was greatly disappointed. As she and my mother were trying to plan some means by which she could go on, I felt impressed to offer my services. I thought I could drive for her, and get my sister and her husband to go with us as companions. I requested mother to step into the other room with me. There I told her how I felt. She seemed surprised, but consented. I asked her to lay the matter before the sister and tell her I would go, if she would take me as I was (I had not yet laid aside my fashionable dress). I charged her on no account to tell her of my experience.

"My mother laid the matter before her. She at once said, 'This is the Lord's doings.' In a few hours we were off on our journey. As we started, I determined that I would not talk on religious subjects. As we rode through that beautiful country, amid hills and sparkling lakes, we had plenty of subjects for conversation. In a short time, however, the conversation ceased, and for a long time not a word was uttered. Then Joanna Miller suddenly turned her face toward me and said: 'Thou art a Jonah, and unless thou art faithful to preach the Gospel, and that quickly, thy health and life will fail.'

"She then went over my life minutely, and closed with an earnest exhortation and words of encouragement. I knew it was the Lord's doings, and made no reply until we reached our journey's end.

"For some reason, the lady of the house where we stopped rode with me to the meeting-place. On the way she remarked: 'I believe you are a Jonah, and if you don't preach the Gospel, you will be lost.' I made no reply to her, but I did say to the Lord: 'This is enough. I will begin whenever thou shalt again call for it.' It was a solemn promise, but I meant every word of it. I cannot describe the peace that came into my troubled soul.

"The next afternoon a meeting was appointed in an old grist mill. Here the Holy Spirit came upon me with power and with words for me to utter in His Name. I delivered the message. My heart was greatly broken, the people were made tender, and all nature seemed to be filled with melody. The birds sang as I had never heard them before.

"Thus began my life's work. I think this was in my twentieth year.

"I have two reasons for thus writing at length of my experience; one is that the Church at the present time may note the marked change that has come over us. Now every encouragement is afforded to the young to make it easy to confess Christ. The second reason is that the work of the Spirit may be marked by a deep conviction for sin, repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, followed by a clear witness of the Spirit that we are born of God and our names written in Heaven."

The California Field

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

V. Work Among the Japanese.

The Friends of Pasadena, California, have an important part in the problem of Christian work among the Japanese, who come in large numbers to our Pacific shore. For two and one-half years they have conducted a night school in an upper room of their church building, under the superintendency of Mary A. White, with an attendance of about 15 students. Here six teachers, each with a little group in a booth, come in close contact with them in imparting a knowledge of English, attention being mainly directed to grammar, rhetoric, history and related subjects. Marked enthusiasm is manifested by both students and teachers, and it is with evident reluctance that work is relinquished as the hour for closing approaches. The students are young men, nearly all of whom have completed the high school course, or even more advanced studies, in their native land, and the aptness with which their disciplined minds take hold of the problems presented in the classes adds a delightful zest to the work of the teachers and maintains an emulation among students that precludes all weariness. Thus an earnestness and sustained interest marks every feature of the nightly sessions.

The classes come together in a closing exercise, which includes Gospel songs and the repeating of a Psalm or the Lord's Prayer, Bible knowledge and spiritual advancement being made the objective point throughout the evening's program. Twenty-five members of the meeting donate a portion of their time to this work by teaching in rotation. A monthly practice night is observed by the Japanese, with addresses in English, followed by refreshments, which is always a delightful social season to students and others.

Other features of the work are a Japanese Christian Endeavor and a Bible school, the former being wholly in the hands of the Japanese, with officers of their own countrymen; and the reverent spirit and thorough work which characterize the proceedings would do credit to any organization.

An important adjunct of the work is the Japanese Christian Home, two blocks away, where a house of eight rooms, nicely furnished, affords a home for ten Japanese young men, in which cooking and every detail of household work is wholly in their hands, under direction of one of their own countrymen as leader. On calling here with the superintendent, I was cordially greeted by Leader Kurosu, and conducted through the faultlessly clean rooms, every feature of which bespoke order and system, and every one of which was supplied with the Bible in both English and Japanese, with other good books and periodicals, while mottoes and Scripture texts upon the walls bespoke the tastes and wholesome life of the Christian home. On a card suspended above the dining table, embossed as if to emphasize the impressive thought, I read the words, "Christ is the Head of this House, the unseen Guest at every meal." Family worship is maintained, and courtesy, reverence and mutual goodwill are visible amenities, an early fruit of the Christian instruction imparted by the teachers above referred to. Significant of the hospitality of these young men, soon after our arrival, a small table, spread in white, was set before us, from which was served delicious tea and Japanese wafers.

I left the door of this Christian home feeling that the work which Pasadena meeting is doing for these alien young men, as they come and go and finally return to their native land, will prove a leavening force in Christianizing the Flowery Kingdom that can never be fully measured until "the mists have cleared away."

The financial management of the home is in the hands of a committee of the monthly meeting, with John Chawner as chairman. A small monthly payment by the occupants meets incidental expenses, and like expenses in the school are met by a small charge for tuition.

The importance of having as leader one of their own countrymen, who is familiar with their language, tastes and habits, and who can give direction and system to their business and religious interests in this land of their sojourn, is everywhere recognized by the Japanese. Leader Kurosu, above mentioned as occupying a responsible place in the home, performs like duties in the school as well, and has done so from nearly the beginning of the work.

The Japanese Home, in its moral and spiritual wellbeing, is included with the school in the superintendency of Mary A. White, and the signal ability

Isaac and Rebekah from Another Viewpoint

BY GEORGE N. HARTLEY.

In a recent number of THE AMERICAN FRIEND there appeared an article entitled "Isaac and Rebekah." It has seemed good to me to take a look at that noble pair from another standpoint.

The position we occupy may make a great difference in the appearance of things.

The writer once stood upon a mountain top and looked down upon the great rocks of the "Garden of the Gods," of which he had often heard. They and devotion with which she discharges the arduous duties assigned her, receive, as they deserve, the highest appreciation of all who know of her self-denying labors.

As the Japanese change residence frequently, in improving opportunities for employment, a large number of them, by a longer or shorter stay at the home or the school, will be benefited by the influences here brought to bear upon them. Ten of these young men have joined in membership with Friends as a result of this work.

appeared very insignificant and disappointing. On the following day he stood at the base of those majestic rocks, filled with awe and wonder. There were crevices, rough places and jagged edges, indicating what they had passed through during the ages.

So it is with many of the Bible characters. It is good to get down to where we can get a clearer vision of them and observe how the buffeting of Satan has made jagged edges in their lives, but nevertheless they endured and proved themselves worthy. Isaac was born after his father had become settled in southern Palestine. Abraham was at peace with all the tribes around him. He was recognized as a powerful prince, and very rich. When Isaac was old enough to be weaned, a great feast was prepared, and, doubtless, a special sacrifice was made to the God of Heaven as a thank offering. The joy of the occasion was marred by the mocking of Ishmael, who was then seventeen years of age. Sarah knew that the peace of the home could not be preserved so long as this Egyptian bond-woman and her son remained in it; she therefore besought her husband to send them away, which grieved him sore, but the Lord sustained her in the request. This was certainly not jealousy on the part of Sarah, but from necessity, as indicated by the Lord's approval. Time passed, peace reigned, Abraham prospered and, by digging wells, worked for the improvement of the country. Isaac was under the care of his worshipful father and mother, and doubtless was an obedient and devout son. When about twenty-five years of age, his father was sorely tried; his faith triumphed. On their arrival at the mount, where Isaac was to be offered up—I read between the lines—a conversation took place between father and son, and a full explanation made; and although he is still to be offered up, yet they believed that Isaac was to be the father of a great nation, according to the promise. The God that could give him life at the first could as well make him live again. Thus I see Isaac humbly submitting—a beautiful type of Christ—without any fear of the final outcome. God in this way proved Abraham's faith and satisfied Isaac of His mercy and love.

When he was about thirty-seven years of age, his mother died, and three years later, Abraham, feeling that the time of his departure might be near at hand, thought best to make arrangements for the marriage of his son.

Considering the great importance of the matter, we would naturally suppose that Abraham and his son would make their accustomed sacrificial offering, and that they would ask counsel of the Most High, that there might be no mistake made in choosing a wife for Isaac. Accordingly Abraham called his old, tried and devout servant, and, with proper instructions, sent him to his kindred, and asked that an angel go with him to guide him to the right place and make the right choice. When Eleazer arrived in Padan-Aram, according to the directions given him, he stopped by a well without the city, and there offered up a prayer and asked for a sign, which was immediately given. He was soon ushered into the home of Abraham's nephew, Bethuel, and before he would take any refreshments, he told the story of how the Lord had prospered his master, Abraham; of how he had been sent to them to secure a wife for his son and heir, and of the meeting of Rebekah at the well, in answer to his prayer. Bethuel and Laban immediately recognized that this thing was of the Lord, and in consultation with Rebekah, she expressed her willingness to go. No doubt Bethuel had heard before of the prosperity of his uncle, and that Rebekah was not altogether ignorant of the family of the great prince and his son. She must have thought herself highly favored, to be chosen of the Lord—as well as of her great uncle—to be the wife of his heir.

In due time they arrived at Hebron, the home of Isaac. He was walking in the field in deep meditation. We are not told what the trend of his thoughts were, but most likely upon the goodness and mercy of God in providing for his welfare and future happiness. His meditations were broken by the coming of the camel train which he well knew.

Rebekah, on being informed who the young man was, alighted from her camel—doubtless with her maids—and modestly drew her veil over her face. The account given of their marriage is very meager: Abraham does not appear at all. There is no mention that he ever saw Rebekah; but do we suppose that to be the case? May we not rather believe that there was a suitable reception given by this wealthy prince? Would it not be in accordance with the dignity of such a character, his prayers having been so signally answered, to prepare a great wedding feast for his son and heir, to which he should invite his friends, Abimelech, Phichol, Ephron, Aner, Esheol and Mamre, with their families? Would it not be perfectly natural for Isaac to conduct Rebekah and her maids to his mother's tent, where they should prepare for the wedding on the morrow? Is it not likely that Abraham, in the presence of the assembly, standing by the altar, laid his hands upon the heads of this young pair, and devoutly prayed that God's blessings should rest upon them and their posterity, and that the promises given to himself should be transferred to Isaac? If it is said that we have no right to conjecture, I ask why not? Abraham lived thirty-five years after this event, and we have no record that he ever blessed Isaac, or that he ever built an altar after the one on Mt. Moriah, or that he ever offered a sacrifice after that of Isaac, but are we to suppose that he never did, because it is not recorded? Certainly not.

The statement has been made that Isaac and Rebekah were "essentially irreligious," but the Scripture statements are certainly sufficient to clear away all doubts. They entreated God for children, and He answered their prayers. The Lord declared to Isaac: "I will be with thee and bless thee * * * and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Therefore Isaac "builded an altar there and called upon the name of the Lord." "And the man waxed great, and went forward, and grew until he became very great." His greatness was recognized by the princes of the surrounding tribes, who came to him saying, "We saw certainly that the Lord was with thee" * * * and, "Thou art now the blessed of the Lord." They recognized his power when they asked that he should make a covenant of peace with them, that he should do them no hurt. In his business relations with the people about him, difficulties sometimes arose, but he peaceably settled them, at a sacrifice to himself, and his non-resisting spirit was rather an element of strength in his character than of weakness. In his home relations he conformed to the Gospel standard in that he was the husband of but one wife, whom he loved.

He proved his social qualities by making a feast and entertaining his friends, and thus we see that the few defects in his character are greatly overbalanced by his many virtues.

The Greatest Christmas Gift

We print the following interesting extract from a personal letter recently received from Dr. William W. Cadbury, telling of the conversion of some students in the Canton Christian College, Canton, China:

"The week before this present one was a most eventful one from one point of view. Some of our older boys who are Christians, including two of those who joined the Church last year, have been working very hard during the past few weeks to stir up more interest among the non-Christian boys in Christianity. You may understand that we have been helping in this work in every way that we could. Finally they decided to hold three meetings last week and ask the boys to come to a definite decision as to what stand they would take, either for Christ or against him. Mr. Leiser, of the Y. M. C. A., spoke on Third-day; Mr. Chambers, of the Baptist mission, on Fourth-day, and a Chinese pastor in the city, belonging to the English Congregational Church, spoke on Sixth-day. The most impressive meeting was the one held on Fourth-day afternoon. Almost the entire school was present. Mr. Chambers spoke of the need of making a definite decision, and then asked if any present were ready at that time to make a public confession of their faith. It was not an emotional address, but a plain, straightforward appeal. Twelve of the boys raised their hands. Yue Chung Kei, one of the boys who became a Christian last year, has been working especially hard with his fellow students, and when he saw twelve of them raise their hands, he broke down completely and sobbed for two or three minutes. You may imagine that all were much moved by this. The best part of the whole thing is that these boys have all been seriously thinking the matter over and most of them had made their decision a few days before. They are some of the finest students and strongest men in the college. I have had six students in my Bible class this past term; two were Christians, and the other four were among the twelve. I feel sure that they are all genuine in the stand that they have taken and will stick to their confession.

"Last First-day all these boys went up to the London mission church in Canton (this is the church that they are all going to join), and each one stood up before the entire congregation and openly declared what had led him to become a Christian. Next First-day the Chinese pastor will come to the college and the boys will be baptized before the school, and in the evening they will have a Y. M. C. A. meeting of the students at which these boys will again tell their fellow-students why they have joined a Christian Church. The whole affair has made a profound impression on the other boys, and I think it will prepare the way for more to follow in the steps of their elders. Our medical students are now all Christians also.

"I feel that I have had the greatest gift this Christmas that I could have hoped for in the change in the lives of the young men about us at the school. It is indeed wonderful to watch how they develop, especially those who have come out definitely as Christians. One of the men has been especially earnest in telling others of the new joy that has come into his life. The remarkable thing about it all is that it is really the students themselves who are the initiators of the work. We teachers try to project, as it were, what we believe, and then the students do the work. I think it is especially essential, therefore, that our lives here should be most consistent. For if they are not, surely the force of our words, as well as what the Christian students say of Christianity, will be greatly impaired."

Some Notes on Present Day Topics

The Relation of the Pastor to the Church*

BY O. N. HUFF, M.D.

To receive the divine commission to preach the Gospel is the most sacred and responsible obligation that can come in the life of any man or woman.

The physician deals with the physical, the mortal part of man; the minister with the soul, the immortal, and the results of his work must last throughout eternity. Who can estimate the value of a human soul? "What profiteth it a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul."

The pastor of a Church stands in the relation of a teacher and guide, counselor and judge, a pleader, a comforter and sympathizing friend, an arbitrator and a reprover of sin, a watchman on the watch tower, who must sometimes "cry aloud and spare not." And, not the least of important qualifications, he should be a leader and an organizer to rightly divide and apportion the work.

Rarely are all of these combined in the same individual; neither are they given with the divine call, but they all need the purifying, qualifying and guiding influence of the Holy Spirit.

I think sometimes that ministers of the Society of Friends have a greater responsibility than those of any other denomination. Why? Because they lay greater claim to being guided by the "inner light." Being thus guided is one of the cardinal principles of the Quaker faith. If this be true, why doesn't the Quaker ministry have greater power and success in winning souls?

Some time ago I heard a minister say, in speaking of the guidance of the Holy Spirit, that we might know of being thus guided, first, when it is according to Bible teaching; second, when it is in harmony with common sense; third, by the results. These are causes for deep reflection, especially the last one.

The adoption of the pastoral system is the most radical change that has come in the operations of the Quaker Church. It was so radical that neither the Church nor the ministry were prepared for it. Such changes require years for proper development. Many of us accepted it with great reluctance and not without some sadness. It was such a severe innovation and break of long established views held so dear that many have not yet accepted it and are out of unity and working harmony with the system. Such divisions weaken the strength of any Church, and are to be deplored. To me personally the pastoral system in the Friends Church was a sad blow to the beautiful ideal of a free gospel and ministry guided by the divine hand. But carefully studying the situation, I became convinced that the change must come, and the more heartily we all entered into it the better it would be for the Church. I have said that neither the membership nor the ministry were ready or qualified for such a change. There was very little in the experience or training of the former Quaker preacher that specially prepared him to fill the position of a pastor for today. The pastor of the present time is to preach the Gospel, but, more than that, he has the general oversight of the spiritual welfare of a definite number of people. Not only must many sermons be preached each year, but these sermons must be more than simple exhortations. Not only must they call sinners to repentance, but they must teach something to give growth and development to the Christian character; to stimulate the membership, if possible, to greater activity in all kinds of Church work; to organize the forces in such way to get the greatest good. Personal service of the membership should be one of the chief aims of the pastor. It is necessary that he study the individual capabilities of his people, that he may be able to choose the proper persons to do special service. Every congregation has a variety of talents that needs stimulation and encouragement to make it bear fruit. These are a very few of the qualifications needed by a successful pastor that were rarely considered in the Quaker preacher of earlier days. Someone has said, "We cherished the ideals of a deep religious life, but we lacked the training necessary to make them appeal to others. We sadly needed a teaching ministry."

A teaching ministry must have men and women of broad and deep culture and learning, together with the divine inspiration. This gives a reserve power necessary to an enduring success.

It is a great thing to be pastor of a Church. The responsibilities are heavy and important. Numerous and delicate duties are to be performed that often times require special tact and judgment. The duties outside the pulpit not infrequently are the most difficult to perform; and here is where many a pastor fails to satisfy his charge. It is not always the greatest sermonizers who have the strongest and most successful churches.

But I would not by any means place all the responsibility upon the pastor. The membership is equally responsible, and no pastor can succeed without the hearty co-operation of his congregation. When we choose a pastor, it is our duty and obligation to stand by and support him in every way possible—not to watch him, with critical eyes and ears, for what may seem human defects of manner or action, but work together with him in sympathetic harmony in any way that will promote righteousness and the interest of the cause.

But, as I hinted a while ago, we are so critical that if the sermons are not altogether pleasing—possibly his orthodoxy may not be up to our standard; or he is not as cordial in personal greetings as we think he ought to be; something faulty in dress or address; perhaps we may not like some member of his family; we imagine he gives greater attention to certain members of the congregation, thereby causing jealousy; and in many ways we may and do find fault. In this frame of mind we become indifferent and lag in interest. We leave the Sabbath school, and do not remain for the hour of worship, or we may not attend either service.

Individual criticism prevails more in the Quaker Church, I believe, than in any with which I am acquainted. This is partly the fault of our education. We must get out of it if we ever expect to prosper and grow as a religious people.

But the signs are improving and there is a bright ray of hope for the future. The ministers are steadily making greater preparations for their work. The membership is becoming more reconciled to this radical change and is showing a more willing spirit to support it, both by personal effort and sympathy and with their money.

Then my plea would be to study organization and withhold unnecessary criticism. Let the interest of the Church be uppermost, and have a willingness to work for it. The lack of effective organization, to my mind, is one of the greatest weaknesses of our beloved Society. This includes both the ministry and the lay membership, and affords a topic for much discussion. The Quaker faith has always encouraged individual dependence upon the Holy Spirit for guidance in all religious matters. This teaching has educated us into such independence of personal action that makes it more difficult to perfect an organization that will be united, harmonious and effective. We are so determined and conscientious in our personal beliefs and conduct that it seems impossible to unite all the forces. These conditions lead to divisions. There are those called "progressives" (who would like to move forward), "conservatives" (who are determined to hold back), others are unsound in theology, higher critics, orthodox, unorthodox, "old line" Friends, and a host of other terms to describe the various divisions.

The same spirit permeates the business affairs of the Church. Some will refuse to give financial support because everything is not done according to their individual judgments. How can success come out of such antagonistic actions and opinions? It is impossible for the Holy Spirit to be the guide of such diversified beliefs. I am firmly convinced that the greatest hindrance to the growth, expansion and influence of the Society of Friends, both now and in the past, is and has been within its own borders. With all the grand doctrines and ideals of our faith, and which have largely been accepted by other religious denominations, we have failed, largely through our own faults, to occupy the place in the sisterhood of churches which is justly due us.

The greatest field of service for us seems to be in the smaller towns and rural districts, at least until there is greater growth in the pastoral system. Comparatively few of our ministers are qualified to cope with the great preachers of the larger cities. So it behooves us to give special attention in these fields of labor.

Here lies, however, the greatest strength of the nation, and we should endeavor, in every way possible consistent with New Testament teaching, to make the churches of the smaller cities and towns larger winners of souls. That marvelous man of action, Theodore Roosevelt, a few months ago, when speaking to immense audiences of farmers, said, "The country Church should be made a true social center, alive to every need of the community, standing for a broad individual outlook and development, taking the lead in work and recreation, caring more for conduct than dogma, more for ethical, spiritual, practical betterment than for merely formal piety."

The present is a time of great religious awakening. The lay membership is aroused to some lines of work as never before. The progress in civic righteousness is remarkable, and still advancing. The development and extension of missions is rapid. There has been great expansion in public charities and reforms not directly connected with the Church. So let us be aroused to the opportunities that are all about us; organize our forces so as to get the highest results. Be less strenuous for technicalities and non-essentials, and with hearts full of charity and enthusiasm, work for the glorious day when righteousness shall prevail in the whole earth.

Emma Coffin, Oskaloosa, was expected to begin meetings at Bear Creek, Iowa, the 12th inst.

* * *

Ralph Clem has accepted a call to act as pastor in Pleasant Ridge Church, Scranton Quarterly Meeting, Iowa. His address is Coon Rapids.

* * *

Aaron Napier is aggressive in the work of the church at Ames, Iowa. Recently some of the students from the Agriculture College went to his home for spiritual counsel and were converted.

* * *

William Jasper Hadley, Evangelistic Superintendent of Iowa Yearly Meeting, since attending Springdale Quarterly Meeting at West Branch, the 5th inst., has been confined to his home on account of la grippe which is very prevalent this winter.

* * *

Frank E. Jones, Maine, who has been doing pastoral work in Prairie Center Meeting, Kans., for the past six weeks, is now visiting his brother, Prof. Arthur Jones, of Friends University. He has a prospect of returning to Prairie Center for the summer.

A series of meetings was held at Walnut Creek, Kans., closing on the 31st ult. They were conducted by John C. Griffin, North Branch and the pastor, Alvin Barrett. The Gospel was preached with power and the meeting was very much strengthened.

After nearly three years of useful ministry, Arthur Jones, pastor at Winthrop Center, Maine, has tendered his resignation to take effect Fourth month 16th. He will do pastoral work in Kansas City, Mo. His loss will be felt not only by the local meeting, the Junior Endeavor, the monthly and quarterly meetings, but by the whole community as well.

Our friend, David Tatum, who is now in his eighty-eighth year, sends us greetings from Joplin, Mo. He has been confined to his home for several years, and of late has been a great sufferer; yet he writes: "I esteem it a favor to be able to write you a little message," and with Job he says: "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

Prof. I. W. Kelsey, of Penn College, attended Springdale Quarterly Meeting at West Branch, Iowa, on the 5th inst.

The quarterly meeting petitioned Congress to neutralize the canal zone and not to fortify same. They also asked the State legislature to pass the five mile law, which prohibits saloons within five miles of any State institutions.

Susan B. Sisson is engaged in a very promising work in the Black Hills of South Dakota. Men accustomed to frontier life and steeped in sin have found peace. A temporary organization has been founded with 28 charter members and several more are expected to join later. The outlook is good for a strong work at this point and three other places are full of promise.

* * *

Arthur and Eliza Dann, England, held a series of meetings at the First Friends Church, Long Beach, Cal., from the 8th to the 15th ult. Their teaching was strong and practical, resulting in some conversions and much good to the church. Arthur Dann became ill while there and they were compelled to cancel some of their engagements. They went to Mt. Washington Hotel, Los Angeles, to get some much needed rest.

We wish to rectify a few errors that have recently appeared in our columns. On page 24, the title under the second illustration should read "Charles Hiatt, pastor at Long Beach, Cal., late of Marion, Ind., not "Muncie" as given. In the first sentence following this illustration the word "Long Branch" should be "Long Beach" and on page 25, the sentence beginning "In the period following, etc.," the name of "John Wilson" should be "Jehu Wilson." In the last two paragraphs on page 55, John T. Hadley is spoken of as John F. Hadley.

According to an item published in The Friend, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has still more ministers than we have yet reported. The item says: "An interested Friend, an elder, has for some time been engaged in preparing an accurate list of the ministers and elders in our yearly meeting. From this it appears that on the first of Twelfth month last, there were in our membership 40 Friends recorded as ministers and 140 in the station of elder. Of the 40 ministers, 22 were men and eighteen women. Fifty-five of the elders were men and 85 women."

Fairfield Quarterly Meeting was held at Winthrop Center, Maine, on the 3d, 4th, and 5th inst. A goodly number were in attendance. After thirty years of efficient service as clerk, J. Warren Hawkes resigned, and was succeeded by his son, Alfred W. Hawkes. A committee was appointed to prepare a minute of appreciation of his faithful services.

On First-day morning the pastor at Winthrop Center preached an instructive and helpful sermon from the text, "A man in whom the Spirit of God is." Perry Leach, from China, Alexis Burnham, Sidney, and Marquis Thomas, Benton, were in attendance.

The regular monthly meeting at Mt. Airy, N. C., was held on the evening of the 16th ult. Two members were received, one by letter and another by request. Vincent D. Nicholson, Washington, D. C., was very acceptably present at some of the services recently. Within the past month, Leanah Hobson gave a lecture to a very large and attentive congregation on the subject, "Shall Women Preach." On account of a mass meeting at the Methodist Church the 29th ult., Friends had no services. Leanah Hobson was on the program. At the C. E. meeting the 31st ult., Mary Holmes, one of the teachers in the graded school read a very interesting paper on "missions," that being the subject for discussion for the evening.

On the 13th ult., Martha Woody's English class gathered with their friends at the mission home, Madruga, Cuba, for a little entertainment, which consisted of select readings, recitations and songs in English.

Anna E. Williams, Louisville, N. C.; Carolena M. Wood, Mt. Kisco, N. Y., and Arthur E. L. Pain, Santa Cruz del Norte, Cuba, were present and helped to make the evening pass pleasantly. The principal object of the gathering was the awarding of a prize which had been offered a month before for the best English composition descriptive of Madruga.

The prize, a copy of Longfellow's poems, was awarded to Mercedes Rivera, a public school teacher of the town. Three other compositions received honorable mention.

Ada Janeway, Ramona, Cal., writes: Ramona is an isolated mountain town, about 35 miles from San Diego. The trip may be made from there by train to Foster station, and the rest of the way by stage. We have a well established little Friends meeting. The appearance of the valley has been greatly improved of late by the addition of many new residences. We are blessed in the fact that the saloon has been rooted out of our midst. Ida Curtis, former pastor at Ramona, has retired from pastoral work for a time, but owing to her grandmother's health, will remain in the valley. Since the last Tenth month the position has been filled by George Taylor, who with the aid of his wife is doing much good work. The meetings of Y. P. S. C. E., recently organized, are good and well attended. A Junior C. E. is also held with the pastor's wife as superintendent. We had expected to have Arthur Dann and wife, of England, with us for a few meetings, but were disappointed owing to the sickness of the former.

The offer made by the British government to the F. A. I. M. is one of unusual interest. In writing concerning the matter Chas. F. Spann says:

"We have received word from the British government, stating that they were making arrangements to educate the chief's sons and the sons of the head men. Not only are they to be taught in the common branches of school but in methods of administration and in technical work such as building, masonry, cabinet work, sanitation for villages, farming, etc. Our station has been chosen for this work among a number of tribes and unless it be taken up at once it will be turned over to the Catholics, who are eager to get a chance like this. It would give them a prestige that we should never be able to overcome. We must act, therefore, and act at once. This is not a matter that can be taken up at any time, nor can it be taken up in a year or two as well as now. It must be now or never. It will, therefore, be necessary for me to take charge of the chief's sons and the sons of the head men. If I do this it will require nearly all of my time and it will be impossible for me to do the building that must be done very soon. Arthur's house is still incomplete, the mill must have a new building and machinery installed, the chapel must be enlarged and a new school house built, beside the other missionary houses. We must also have lumber for Dr. Blackburn's hospital, beside the dormitory and manual training shop as required by the government. We not only have these houses to put up, but must get out the lumber, brick, and other material for them. We need help. In fact we must have it or lose out with the natives and with the government.

"I personally know of a Christian young man and his wife who are called to Africa and they would be well adapted to our present need, he being a good mechanic. I have carefully looked into the work here and can see no reason why we will not be able to make this a self-supporting mission as soon as we can get our machinery and a man for the agricultural department, and a good mechanic to help on the mill and other buildings."

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

In justice to the church which has for seven years honored us by making us her missionaries in Mexico, to the mission board which has so nobly stood behind that work, to God who called us and to ourselves, we feel that there are a few things which we should make clear.

First, foreign mission work to be successful and economically carried forward must be made a life work. Heretofore American Friends have as a rule sent out their missionaries for a few years only. The principal reason for this has not been lack of consecration on the part of the missionaries, but lack of support on the part of the church. Ill health or the care of children has compelled a number of our missionaries to return home who with adequate means would have conserved their own health and cared for their children while continuing to live and work in the foreign field.

These facts are recognized today by our mission board and steps are being taken to remedy them, but the board is only the agent of the church and can only advance so far and so fast as the church provides.

Through the efforts of Chas. E. Tebbetts, a manual or working constitution has been adopted which defines and locates the responsibility for the work both at home and abroad. The salaries of missionaries are being equalized and increased. All this is good, very good and encouraging, and it becomes increasingly the duty and the privilege of every Friend to stand by our organized mission work and to help to make it the effective, permanent, world-wide work which it is rapidly becoming.

However, our old limitations have not all passed away. We are still too much inclined to scatter our resources; as a church we do not yet rally to the support of our organized work as we should and as we must. The board does not yet have the necessary funds to make the work, already established, as substantial and effective as it ought to be. From China, from India, from Palestine, from Africa, from Mexico, from Guatemala, from Japan, from Jamaica, from Cuba, and from Alaska come urgent appeals—appeals which ought to be met and met at once. Much foundation work has been done and well done; now the opportunity is before us to go forward and build the superstructure, but funds are lacking and in many cases costly foundations are allowed to crumble. The Board does not yet have the necessary funds to give our missionaries sufficient support to enable them to conserve their own efficiency and discharge their duties to their children, while making missionary work their life calling.

In view of these conditions and after earnest prayer, my wife and I have felt clear in severing our relations, for the present at least, with the foreign mission board.

The deceased was a sister of Abel Carter whose obituary is given above. They lived together in New Sharon, Iowa, and both were members of New Sharon Monthly Meeting.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

What is your life? The infant sleeps
And wakes without a care;
Yet but to answer life's great end
Makes every breath a prayer.

What is your life? The questioning child
Needs something more than food;
The mind seeks knowledge, and the soul
Wakes at the touch of God.

Give to the child its daily bread,
Its food for mind and soul;
Let it develop with the years
In all its beauteous whole.

What is your life? A beckoning call
To deeds high as the skies:
Youth's airy castles rise and fall,
Fall but to higher rise.

The sunshine from the heaven above
Lights up their gilded domes,
Till hearts grown radiant with love
Reflect these castle-homes.

What is your life? The fields are white,
The harvest is in view,
The time for reaping is at hand,
The reapers still are few.

Thrust in your sickle with your might;
Think not of rest or gain;
The harvest field is all the world,
And human souls the grain.

What is your life? Some day we'll lay
Our heads beneath the sod;
Then rising to a clearer day,
We'll answer it with God.

EDWARD WING.

There are loyal hearts and spirits brave,
There are souls that are pure and true;
Then give to the world the best you have,
And the best shall come back to you.
Give love and love to your heart will flow—
A strength in your utmost need;
Have faith, and a score of hearts will show
Their faith in your word and deed.

The International Bible School Lesson

FIRST QUARTER, LESSON IX.

SECOND MONTH 26, 1911.

ELIJAH MEETS AHAB IN NABOTH'S VINEYARD.

I KINGS 21.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Take heed and beware of covetousness.
Luke 12:15.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Second month 20. Coveting of Ahab. I Kings 21:1-16.

Third-day. The king arraigned. I Kings 21:17-29.

Fourth-day. Prophecy fulfilled. II Kings 9:21-37.

Fifth-day. Coveting of Achan. Josh. 7:10-26.

Sixth-day. Coveting of Eli's sons. I Sam. 2:11-25.

Seventh-day. Coveting of Gehazi. II Kings 5:1-27.

First-day. Covetousness. I Tim. 6:1-9.

Time.—863 or 906 B. C. About five years after the last lesson.

Place.—The house or palace of Ahab in Samaria, and Naboth's vineyard in Jezreel about 20 miles north of Samaria, and the summer residence of the king.

Kings.—Ahab and Jezebel in Israel; Jehoshaphat in Judah.

Parallel passages.—None.

The time intervening between the last lesson and the present, about five years, seems to have been spent by Elijah in quiet, possibly in companionship with Elisha, and also with those associations of men of prophetic gifts known as "sons of the prophets" (II Kings 2:15), or wrongly "schools of the prophets." Persecution had apparently ceased or there would hardly have been these associations of prophets. The incidents related in chapter 20 imply open profession and worship of Jehovah. The earlier verses of the chapter give a clear account of the incidents on which the lesson rests. Ahab had built a splendid palace. He wished to have gardens next to his palace, but the lot he wished was a vineyard owned by a man, Naboth, who had inherited it from his father—it was an old family possession and as such highly valued by its owner. The story gives in detail Ahab's offers, which in themselves were liberal, but Naboth was clearly within his rights in declining to sell. But Ahab was sullen, "heavy and displeased." The story is told with great clearness how Jezebel brought about the death of Naboth.

11. "The men of his city, even the elders and nobles." They slavishly obeyed the orders of the queen, doubtless through fear of her ill will.

12. "Proclaimed a fast," as they had a right to do. "Set Naboth on high." Probably in the place of an accused person. Compare Gen. 40:20.

13. "The two men:" see verse 10. "Sons of Belial." An expression meaning worthless fellows—men who could say or do anything for pay. Two witnesses were required. Deut. 17:9. "Naboth did curse God." R. V. This was a charge almost impossible to disprove. The punishment was stoning to death. Exod. 22:28; Lev. 24:10-23; Acts 6:11. All was done as planned and we learn from II Kings 9:26 that his sons perished with him for such was the cruel law of the day. Compare Josh. 7:24, 25. It was felt that a man's guilt was shared by his children. Compare Exod. 20:5, 15. "Arise and take possession of the vineyard." As Naboth and his children were dead the estate would go to the crown and there would be none to say Ahab nay.

17. Note that Elijah is still called "The Tishbite" and not the prophet.

18. The idea seems to be that, though Ahab's domicile was in Samaria he was so covetous as to seize Naboth's vineyard in Jezreel, but the verse is not very clear.

19. Elijah now received a message and a mission. He comes as suddenly into view as at his first appearance. "Hast thou killed?" He was really the murderer, though the act was carried out by others he was responsible. "Taken possession." Literally, "Made thyself heir." But this was not all; there was not simply reproach and charging with sin; there was to be a foretelling of a terrible fate. "In the place where the dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thine, even thine." This prophecy was not literally fulfilled for Ahab himself as is shown by verse 29, but the doom was transferred to his son, Joram. II Kings 9:25, 26.

20. "Hast thou found me O mine enemy?" Compare chap 18:17. Then Elijah was the "troubler of Israel," now he was Ahab's personal enemy. It is rather implied that Elijah came unexpectedly into the presence of the king. Elijah was bold enough now, and answered without hesitation, I came "because thou hast sold thyself to do that which is evil." He had sold his soul for a vineyard.

21-26. Then follows a terrible catalog of the evils which were to come upon him and his house. Compare II Kings 9:36, 37.

27-29. These verses give a modification of the doom originally pronounced on Ahab as a result of Ahab's penitence. "Went softly." Probably, without pomp, or possibly on foot.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. The story of Ahab and Naboth has been ever since an illustration of the sin of covetousness.

2. Covetousness is not the desire for more than a man has—that in proper limits is most praiseworthy; but covetousness is the desire to gain something at the expense of others and at the expense of higher things—it is an inordinate desire uncontrolled by principles of justice, fellow feeling and love. "Covetousness regards possession as more than character, having as more than being." Colos. 3:5.

Bishop O. W. Whitaker of the Protestant Episcopal Church, diocese of Pennsylvania, passed away the 9th inst., in the eighty-first year of his age. He was born and raised on a New England farm and taught school for a number of years before he studied theology. He began his ministerial work in Nevada, and came to Pennsylvania in 1886. He was always greatly beloved by the common people.

The Portuguese government has decided to pay a monthly pension of $3,300 to its deposed King, Manuel. Manuel II, the exiled King of Portugal, is now living with the Queen's mother Amelie, at Wood Norton, Eversham, England, where he was obliged to accept the hospitality of the Duke of Orleans. He reached there last October from Gibraltar, where he sought British protection after being driven out of Portugal. His debts in Portugal are estimated at more than $300,000. The importunities of creditors have been strong, and it was understood at one time that the new Government of Portugal had determined to liquidate those of the obligations legally incurred.

Concerning the property in Portugal owned personally by Manuel and others of the royal family, a decree issued a few months ago, promised that a settlement would be made as soon as possible and that the legal rights of the exiles of the royal family would be respected.

Name other lessons from Moses' life.

How has Moses' life helped you?

What are some of his trying experiences?

Three titles may legitimately attach themselves to the name of Moses: the Hebrew Peasant Prince, the Sinaitic Shepherd, the Prophet Statesman. These titles belong respectively to the three forty-year periods of his life. He spent his life in the following ways. 1st. In the home, and in the Egyptian Court studying the condition of his people. (Ex. 2: 2, 9; 2: 10; 2: 11.) 2d. In the desert studying himself and God. (Ex. 2: 15; 3: 4.) 3d. In the midst of the Hebrew people building a nation. (See Ex., Lev., Num., Deut.)

Born a Hebrew, educated as an Egyptian, and trained by Jehovah, he was therefore eminently fitted to break the Egyptian yoke from the Hebrew slaves and lead them to a divinely appointed national consciousness.

Life's school teachers are human relations and divine leadership. These two train life to find and fulfil its mission in the world.

"The back of the wilderness" and that the desert near the mount of God is a great place to find life's mission, and make the great life forming resolves. (Ex. 3: 1.) God's method of fitting a soul for its mission in life is to reveal the work to be done, then to secrete the soul where it may mature quietly under divine sunshine, then, thus equipped, to thrust it out to grapple with world problems and lift the race nearer God. Moses saw his life work, then spent forty years in the wilderness with God getting ready for it. (Ex. 2: 11; Acts 7: 30.) Jesus perceived His great work at twelve years of age, then spent eighteen years in seclusion at Nazareth gathering divine maturity for the three years ministry and the cross. (Luke 2: 41-52.) Paul on the Damascus road received his call to be a Christian and a foreign missionary, then spent three years in Arabia thinking through the great soul problems and was thus divinely fitted to crystallize Christian thought for the Gentile world. (Acts 9: 15; Gal. 1: 17, 18.)

* * *

Moses attempted his great work in his own strength and in his own way and miserably failed, becoming a fugitive from justice. (Ex. 2: 11-15.) He attempted it in God's strength and in God's way, and an Egyptian throne was shaken, a hostile army was destroyed, the slave shackles were broken from off Hebrew wrists.

Our work in our way, or God's work in our way, is not the Christian's rule of life. God's work in God's way breaks up the fallow ground of human hearts and prepares the soil for seed that brings forth an eternal harvest. We have all slain our Egyptian and then shaken with fear at the consequences of our well meant action. Have we faced a Pharaoh on his throne, seen him tremble at our word, and witnessed his yielding to the divine demands of righteousness and truth?

Moses was loath to take up the actual work for which eighty years had fitted him. (Ex. 4: 13.) His excuses are almost universally applicable to him who hesitates between duty and action. Note them with open Bible. Lack of fitness, Ex. 3: 11. Lack of authority, Ex. 4: 1. Lack of powers of speech, Ex. 4: 10. Lack of success at first attempt, Ex. 5: 23. Lack of acceptance by Israelites, Ex. 6: 12.

It is easy to tell what ought to be done. There are too many who preach duty, but do not do duty. It is easy to see visions and dream dreams about life's work and possibilities; it is another thing to put those visions and dreams into action. The stimulus to duty is prone to pass out of the brain through the nerves that create emotions and thoughts. He, who has learned to let the stimulus to duty pass from the brain through the nerves that create muscular action in the hands and feet, has learned much of life's true meaning, and knows the joy of duty performed.

* * *

Moses accomplished God's work in the face of great odds. He was obliged to conquer his own sense of inefficiency. (Ex. 3: 11.) He contended with a hard-hearted (Ex. 7: 22) and unwilling (Ex. 7: 4) Egyptian ruler. He was the leader of a fearful and unwilling horde of slaves before an impassable sea, and with their rear threatened by the Egyptians. (Ex. 14: 9-14.) He was compelled to deal with the grumbling of a dissatisfied and hungry people. (Ex. 16: 2, 3.) He was on the point of breaking down under the load of governing the incipient nation. (Ex. 18: 13-18.) He rose above all these things to a point of spiritual efficiency, where he could commune with God and receive at His hand the laws and religious ordinances for the Hebrew people. (Ex. 19.) He faced the crushing disappointment of seeing the people dancing in worship around a golden calf while he held in his hand the tables of stone the first and second commands of which denounced the homage to other gods than Jehovah or the making of any image as an object of worship. (Ex. 32: 15-20.)

Find in these trying experiences of Moses the common battlefields of all true followers of Christ. Self's inefficiency, the indifference and enmity of humanity, insurmountable difficulties, ingratitude, the limits of physical endurance, struggles to attain a true spiritual life, disappointment at the evidences of failure in our most cherished work, these are the things that try the soul. Personal victory can be ours only through close fellowship with the Christ.

IT'S FOOD.

THAT RESTORES AND MAKES HEALTH POSSIBLE.

There are stomach specialists as well as eye and ear and other specialists.

One of these told a young lady, of New Brunswick, N. J., to quit medicines and eat Grape-Nuts. She says:

"For about 12 months I suffered severely with gastritis. I was unable to retain much of anything on my stomach, and consequently was compelled to give up my occupation.

"I took quantities of medicine, and had an idea I was dieting, but I continued to suffer, and soon lost 15 pounds in weight. I was depressed in spirit and lost interest in everything generally. My mind was so affected that it was impossible to become interested in even the lightest reading matter.

"After suffering for months I decided to go to a stomach specialist. He put me on Grape-Nuts and my health began to improve immediately. It was the keynote of a new life.

"I found that I had been eating too much starchy food which I did not digest, and that cereals which I had tried had been too heavy. I soon proved that it is not the quantity of food that one eats, but the quality.

In a few weeks I was able to go back to my old business of doing clerical work. I have continued to eat Grape-Nuts for both the morning and evening meal. I wake in the morning with a clear mind and feel rested. I regained my lost weight in a short time. I am well and happy again and owe it to Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There are 628,955 more Christians in the United States now than there were one year ago. The gains of the year are not quite up to the corresponding gains of 1909, but it is an impressive fact that this vast number of persons has been added in twelve months to the organized churches of our country. When we focus upon our own local situation and see how little we are doing in our neighborhoods to extend the visible Church of Christ, it is very easy to take on a discouraged and pessimistic attitude and to conclude that the world is growing worse and that the churches are losing their converting power.

I do not think so, and I have been showing, year after year for many years, the steady onward march of the great Christian body in America. A backward look of twenty years supplies much ground for thanking God and taking courage. Twenty years ago there were 20,618,307 members in the Christian churches of the United States; now there are 35,332,776. Then there were 165,297 local churches; now there are 218,147. Then there were 111,036 ministers; now there are 170,153. This is not only a very large flat increase, but it is, furthermore, a good increase of ratio to the population of the country. In 1890 there was 1 Christian member to every 3 inhabitants; in 1910 there was 1 Christian to every 2.6 inhabitants. It is, no doubt, a sad fact that in a land which is nominally Christian there is such a large proportion out of the fold, but it is some satisfaction that the gains in the churches are more than keeping pace with the gains in population.

The Methodists are far and away ahead of other Protestant bodies in the net increase of their membership for the year. They have added, in all the branches of this composite denomination, 108,776 to their membership, which now totals over 6,500,000. The Baptists come next in their gains, having added 85,828 to a total membership of 5,774,066; and the Lutherans are third, with a gain of 70,439 in a membership of 2,243,486.

Not only are the membership figures impressive, but the financial figures are still more impressive and show that Christians are learning how to be stewards of wealth. For example, the Northern Presbyterian Church, in which there are 1,328,714 members, raised last year for religious purposes $24,598,968, an average of $18.37 for each member; and the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which there are 3,186,862 members, raised $43,107,651, which is an average of $12.37.

Some person has wittily said that the most popular book today is "the book of numbers." We like to spread out our vast figures and add up our huge columns—and no doubt in this way we can make a striking impression. I know how deceptive numbers are, and that it is still true that a little Gideon band, every man of whom is consecrated to the Lord and His tasks, is better than a large, sprawling army, disorganized, disloyal and disobedient. But I believe that there has never been a period in Christian history when so large a proportion of this great Christian army of ours was loyal and devoted. We have many nominal Christians, it is true, but so have there always been. We now have, in this army of over 35,000,000 persons, a very large number who know why they are Christians, who are warm in faith and love and who are pledged to the forward work of God's Kingdom. It seems to me encouraging.

Reminiscences of Rhoda M. Coffin

We have recently received a copy of an attractive volume of reminiscences of our late friend, Rhoda M. Coffin, containing also 14 papers and addresses prepared by her. The book is edited by Mary Coffin Johnson, and is published for private distribution. It is a worthy memorial and will be very much appreciated by all who knew her.

It is a very valuable contribution to the interesting story of the great transforming revival movement of the last generation. Here is a sample passage: "At the beginning of the [Indiana] yearly meeting of 1860 a company met at our house to consult as to what should be done, or, rather, what could be done. Father and Mother Coffin, Harriet Steer, John Henry Douglas and ourselves met in our library. We were joined by Murray Shipley and Dr. David Judkins, and after a season of prayer and consultation, we decided to send a written request to the yearly meeting for the privilege of holding an evening meeting for sacred worship in the 'old' Whitewater meeting-house for those in the younger walks of life. This proposal met with much opposition, but was finally granted. It was the understanding that the recommended ministers should refrain from preaching.

* * * We went early, after a season of prayer, and found that the meeting-house was filled with the exception of a few empty seats in the gallery. [There were nearly 2,000 present.] The solemnity of the meeting could only be felt; it could not be written. There was no form, no leader. The young people were told the purpose of the meeting and that it was theirs. Murray Shipley, Dr. David Judkins, Charles [Coffin] and myself spoke for the first time, publicly avowing our allegiance to Christ. * * * Hundreds gave their first testimony for Christ or offered their first public prayer. There was no confusion, no haste, no urging or calling on anyone to speak. The Lord was working with great power, and when the meeting closed, we were astonished to find that it was 1.30 o'clock in the morning."

Every such narrative adds to our definite stock of knowledge of the stages by which our Church came to itself and awoke to its present-day mission in the world; and this book will have a permanent value for the light it throws upon an epoch-making period in our history. There are here and there many attractive descriptions of home life and domestic activities when the country was younger and life was simpler, and there are interesting accounts of travel and of religious and philanthropic work. Some of the papers here preserved are important, especially perhaps the one on "The Origin and Rise of Foreign Missions Among Friends." We are thankful that her family has prepared this memorial of her life and work and has thus preserved so much material for the history of her period. R. M. J.

Committee Pastoral Work

The meeting at Coldwater, Okla., is prospering under a plan of pastoral work which appeals to us as eminently practical. It is thoroughly consistent with the spirit of the Uniform Discipline, and affords an opportunity for using a diversity of talents not always present in meetings under a single pastor. Then, too, a greater number are made to feel the responsibility of the work. A recent communication from a member of the monthly meeting says:

"We have no pastor, but we have a live Pastoral Committee looking after the needs of our members. Our aim is an Evangelistic and Pastoral Committee up to the standard proposed by our yearly meeting superintendent of evangelistic and pastoral work, and recommended by our conference at Cherokee. One is appointed to have charge in turn of all our meetings for one month at a time. There are several young in life who take a subject, talk upon it from fifteen to thirty minutes to the edification of the church, then others follow, giving thoughts on the same line. We have blessed meetings, and rejoice to see our membership growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. A committee is preparing a special letter of love, sympathy and encouragement from the church to all our isolated members."

Recently a series of evangelistic meetings were held, and A. J. Bales, Ringwood, Okla., was invited to help. As a result of these efforts, several were persuaded to become Christians. The Bible school has taken on new life, and the Christian Endeavor is doing good work. At the last monthly meeting, six applied for membership with Friends.

The Opium Issue

When China inaugurated her crusade against opium, she agreed with the British Government to reduce the domestic production one-tenth per annum for ten years, while Britain on her part was to curtail the shipment from India, the principal source from which the drug is imported, in like proportions, so that at the end of ten years, opium would be banished from the empire.

When the compact was made, the Western nations felt that China would not live up to the agreement, but she has proven herself even better than her word, and is now asking that the importation of opium be curtailed as rapidly as its domestic production. Even so-called Christian nations, however, are slow to act against their financial interests, notwithstanding the demands of morality and religion. In this situation, as in the crusade against slave-produced cocoa, English Friends are awake and aggressive. A recent editorial in The Friend (London) says:

The reduction of the export of opium from India, so far from resulting in loss to the finances, has at present proved a source of profit. With the enormous reduction in the native growth, the price of the drug has risen till, as Leonard Wingham pointed out, it now stands at a figure five times that of two or three years ago. * * * Thus far the Indian Government has made a gain of some £5,000,000 as a result of the reduced sales, and its aim is therefore to spread over as long a period as possible this high earning power. What we, in common with all thinking Christians who have studied the subject, desire to see is the raising of principle above financial policy. Through its rapid reduction of the native growth, the Chinese Government is losing revenue, but it has shown no signs of shrinking from the effort to free itself finally, absolutely, and at all cost, from the fatal influence of the drug. In a striking speech at the Friends meeting-house, Manchester, T. C. Taylor, M.P., urged the moral duty of our government to follow the suit of the Chinese Government by hastening the operation of the agreement for the cessation of the Indian export. In three years we have reduced that export by about three-tenths (less, rather than more), while the Chinese reduction of native growth (alongside of which our reduction was supposed to be running, according to the first agreement) has been some seven or eight-tenths. Surely the latter are morally in a position to point out to us our duty. The subject is one that should be urgently brought to the notice of Parliament at the earliest opportunity, while Christians must continue instant in prayer and practical in effort for the ending of our national wrongdoing in this matter.

An Unreasonable Pension Bill

Some weeks since the House passed a bill extending pension to all veterans over a certain age, regardless of service, physical condition or financial need. Should the bill become a law, it would increase the pension budget $50,000,000. We believe pensions should be extended to superannuated government employes and to those who become disabled in government service; but, as far as we are aware, there is no rational justification of a general pension bill of this kind. We therefore have considerable sympathy with a correspondent from Dayton, Ohio, who says:

"My second cousin says that in 1864 she was taken on a visit to a prison where she saw a great number of Confederate prisoners of war, and she can prove it.

"I have two friends who, while on a tour of the South, saw a parade of Confederate soldiers who were attending a reunion.

"Thirty-two years ago my brother visited the battlefield at Gettysburg and saw the monuments and everything of interest.

"I am informed that we cannot get a pension under the old law, but can get it by special bill through my Senator, who has a good pull with Sulloway."

It was supposed by many that the Senate Committee would "trim" the bill, but they have reported it practically as it came from the House. This may prove a blessing in disguise, since it calls more loudly for the President's veto—providing it passes the Senate.

Funeral Services

Two eminent Church officials have passed away, Bishop Whitaker, of the Protestant Episcopal Communion, and Archbishop Ryan, of the Roman Catholic Church. Both were widely known and dearly beloved by hundreds of friends and followers. Their funeral services, which took place last week, present a contrast which should be a lesson to all sane people. Bishop Whitaker's wish that his funeral be simple was respected, and the remains were reverently laid to rest with little demonstration. On the other hand, Archbishop Ryan's body was made an object of display, and remained on exhibition three days. Fifty thousand people passed the bier. On the evening prior to the interment, the press was so terrific that a number were injured and taken to a nearby hospital. After all this display, on the day of the funeral the remains were taken from the cathedral, driven in an open hearse about the adjacent square, and returned to the cathedral for interment.

Such ostentation is morbid to say the least. The strict simplicity of our older disciplines forbidding even the wearing of a badge of mourning or the unnecessary manifestation of sorrow is wholesome indeed by way of contrast.

Limiting Sky Scrapers

With the multiplication of high buildings in large cities it is becoming increasingly difficult to convey people to and from their business. Chicago, therefore, has made a wise move in limiting her sky scrapers. After Ninth month 1st, 200 feet will be the maximum height. The cause of this action is to be found in the declaration of an alderman from an outlying ward to the effect that restricting the building height was the only means of compelling the growing business of the city to go outside the "loop" district. Paris has for some time imposed like restrictions for considerations of beauty.

Recent Victories in Medicine

So striking have been the benefits realized in the army through the adoption of anti-typhoid vaccination that the practice is likely to become very general. Those in charge of the work believe they can make the army immune to typhoid in three years.

Phenomenal success has also attended the use of anti-meningitis serum at the Rockefeller Institute. Mortality from this dread disease has been reduced to less than one-third of what it was before the serum was used. The institute is also much encouraged in its investigation of venereal disease, and is patiently working with cancer—the most baffling of all common diseases.

The English Bible

BY W. O. TRUEBLOOD.

The Authorized Version.

Three hundred years ago the English Bible, which was gradually to acquire the title of "Authorized," because of its intrinsic merits, and not by virtue of any ecclesiastical or legislative action, was given to the public. That it was printed late in 1610 seems quite certain, but it was not given to the public until early in 1611. The exact date of its issue has not been ascertained. For two hundred and seventy years this "authorized" version held the field and remained unchallenged by any rival, until the year 1881, when the "Revised New Testament" was issued.

A long story of struggle and devotion and persecution, yes, and even bloodshed precedes the issuing of our noble version. It seems perfectly proper, in this the tercentenary of the publication of the authorized version of our English Bible, that we should all gather for a while around the Bible itself, to think over its history and the blessings this Book has brought, and express to God our deep sense of gratitude.

We recognize in this version a great English classic and a translation of the Scriptures that stands amongst the greatest ever made. The remarkable influence it has exerted on the English language and on English literature cannot be estimated. It has proven a bond of perpetual peace in uniting English-speaking people in all quarters of the earth. But, most of all, we cherish it because for centuries it has been the Bible of our fathers, to whom through it God revealed Himself and because in it we have found the Source of light and consolation. It has become "a lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path."

"How did we get our Bible?" is a question frequently heard. "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" is an answer that must not be overlooked in answering the question. That it is a divinely-given Book must be granted, but with it we must remember that God gave it as we have it today, through human channels, and for that reason it has a history quite closely linked with the history of men. Because it is a divine-human Book, it lives. We know it is an inspired Book because it inspires to nobler and holier living wherever it is given a place. We know it is a human Book because it so accurately portrays the characters of men.

Since the Bible comes to us through human channels, we must study carefully its history to more fully appreciate and know the Father who by His Spirit inspired the Book we all love.

Sources.

If we go backward eighteen hundred years in history, we shall not be able to find the book we call the Bible in its present form. It is in existence, but widely scattered. In the possession of some early Church, such as Ephesus, Jerusalem or Rome, might have been found (1) some manuscripts of the Hebrew

Old Testament books; (2) a good many more of the Old Testament books translated into Greek for general use in the churches; (3) a few rolls of the Apocryphal books written by holy men in the Church and valued for the practical teaching they contained; (4) either the originals or direct copies of the Gospels and the Acts, the epistles of Paul and Peter and John, and the Book of Revelation. It is not likely that any Church would have all of these documents, but every Church would have some of them.

No attempt was made to collect them into one book until many hundred years after the last writer was dead. It was no small task to gather this "Christian Library" together. There were four lives of Christ. One was in Rome; one was in southern Italy; one was in Palestine; and the last one in Asia Minor. There were 21 letters. Five were in Greece and Macedonia; five in Asia; one in Rome. The rest were in the possession of private individuals. All these copies were written by hand. Many men who were interested made copies of the different documents to study for themselves or to read to their own churches. It being a time of persecution, the Gospels and the letters and epistles that have so much of comfort and encouragement in them were extensively copied and widely distributed. They were cherished alone for their spiritual value. In the third century the New Testament included the epistles of Barnabas and Hermas, but later they ceased to be regarded as upon the same spiritual level as the others, and were discarded.

In the fourth century the canon was closed. A list was made up of the books that were to be regarded canonical. There was never any formal closing of the canon, but bishops and scholars and Church councils by common consent agreed upon the authenticity of the different documents, and there came to be a general consensus of the Church on the matter.

The documents were not stitched together and made up into one book until many hundreds of years yet after the closing of the canon.

First English Translations.

It must be remembered that all these documents were originally written in Hebrew or Greek, and consequently were sealed to all who could not read these languages. The first notable translation of these early documents was the Vulgate, by Jerome, a noted Latin scholar who lived the latter part of the fourth century. This Latin translation was freely used in all subsequent translations.

Some attempts at translation were made by early Anglo-Saxon scholars, but we should find as much difficulty in reading these translations as the early Hebrew and Greek. Through the period of political change in England, these early Anglo-Saxon translations were flung contemptuously aside as relics of a rude barbarism, and for centuries the Scriptures remained in England a "spring shut up, a fountain sealed." But during these centuries the languages of the contending classes were being fused, until there emerged the language of united England.

Early in the fourteenth century John Wycliffe, "the morning star of the Reformation," appeared. He was a friend of the common people, a profound scholar and a devout student of the Scriptures, studying them, of course, in the originals. The ignorance and superstition of the common people moved him deeply. The arrogance and selfishness and ignorance of the clergy and the ruling classes exasperated him. He determined to offer to all the open Bible as the best exposure of the selfish rulers, and at the same time exhibiting to the people the beautiful self-forgetting life of Jesus Christ as recorded in the Gospels. "The sacred Scriptures," he said, "are the property of the people, and one which no one should be allowed to wrest from them. * * * Christ and His apostles converted the world by making known the Scriptures to men in a form familiar to them, * * * and I pray with all my heart that through doing the things contained in this book we may all together come to the everlasting life."

Wycliffe set himself the task of translating into English the Scriptures and giving them to the masses. At the same time he openly denounced the greed and corruption of the Church and its priests. However, the denunciations of the Church and her iniquitous practices were of little moment in comparison to his "crime" of giving the Scriptures to the common people in their own tongue. In the year 1378, when he was on trial before the Church authorities, one chronicler angrily complains that Wycliffe, beside denouncing pardons, indulgences and the mass as a system of gigantic fraud, "had filled up his cup of iniquity by translating the Scriptures into the English tongue, making it common and more open to laymen and women than it was wont to be to the clerks, well learned and of good understanding, so that the pearl of the Gospel is trodden under foot of swine." But the strong courage of the great Wycliffe was not to be daunted. He labored on amid difficulties and persecution until the whole Bible was translated into the "modir tonge" and England received for the first time in her history a complete version of the Scriptures in the language of the people, 1378.

The cost of such a book in manuscript—for the printing-press had not yet come into existence—was so great that only the rich could buy the whole volume. Many would give a load of hay for the privilege of reading a small portion each day. The "poor priests," who were in sympathy with Wycliffe, went about reading the Scriptures to the people. Ere long the enemies of Wycliffe complained "that common men and women who could read were better acquainted with the Scriptures than the most learned and intelligent clergy."

Naturally the first great English translation was the focus of the hatred of all enemies of the Light, and just when they were ready to put to death "that pestilent wretch, John Wycliffe, the son of the old Serpent, the forerunner of anti-Christ, who had completed his iniquity by inventing a new translation of the Scriptures," he was seized with the palsy while kneeling before the altar, "and was not, for the Lord took him." Forty years later, by the decree of the Council of Constance, his bones were ordered dug up and burned and the ashes thrown to the little River Swift, which empties into the Avon.

"The Avon to the Severn runs,
The Severn to the sea;
And Wycliffe's dust shall spread abroad,
Wide as the waters be."

The Education of a Prophet

BY G. A. JOHNSTON ROSS.

The power of this story lies in part in its vivid faithfulness to psychological truth. Elijah was a man subject to like passions as we are. "We never see Elijah," says Dr. Whyte, "that he is not subject to some passion or other—a passion of scorn and contempt; a passion of anger and revenge; a passion of sadness and despair; a passion of preaching; a passion of prayer. He was a Mt. Sinai of a man—a man with a heart like a thunderstorm."

Now, to such a man there must have come a terrible reaction after the strain of that long day of solitary defiance on Carmel and the ghastly eventide of bloody carnage. While the Baal priests had yelled and danced and gashed themselves, Elijah had been calm, cool and scornful. But when these same men lay stark and still in death, the tension of the day's terrific work began to tell. It seemed as if the frenzy had passed over from the false prophets to the true, and the passion of slaughter could not abate it. The shrieking of the Baal priests had been silenced in death; but the silence was more insupportable to Elijah than the pagan cries had been; and there was already the element of flight in that mad race before the chariot of Ahab to Jezreel. Nor was there rest there for the panting prophet. Around him no soul spoke in sympathy. On the slopes of Carmel and in the passion of the slaughter, Jehovah seemed triumphing and Baal himself in the throes of death; but here in Jezreel is only a "sound of thin silence," the cold look of a dazed and unfriendly populace and the menace of death. The Lord had been sensibly present in the turmoil and the storm and the fire of Carmel; He was horribly absent from this dread stillness. Oh, to escape to God, to get nearer His heart, to see the God of Israel, of Moses, of the righteous law! So the weary limbs were goaded for the long journey to Horeb—Sinai—the mount of God.

Happily the overstrained mind and body were refreshed on the way by sleep and by nourishment providentially afforded, else the tired and despairing servant of God had possibly never reached the heaven-kissing mountain whence had issued the stream of his people's religion. As it was, the recovery of some equilibrium of mind is marked by the self-inquiry (behind which the prophet recognizes the remonstrance of God), "What am I doing here?"

The vexed spirit would fain justify itself, and goes monotonously over its refrain of petulant complaint. Suddenly a tempest breaks on Sinai, and the mountain seems to shiver, and the lightnings flash. The storm reflects the prophet's mood, laden with tempestuous memories, and reflecting relieves it; such is the subtle sympathy between nature and man. But after the storm, a holy stillness falls—"the sound of a gentle silence" (Delitzsch has the beautiful suggestion that it was the breath of the fragrance of the wind-swept flowers); and the quieted soul of the prophet found God in that holy peace.

And now, as he meditated with covered head in reverent quietude, Elijah began to think out again the meaning of these late excitements and this his so fruitful retreat. He tested the old formula of petulance, but it would not answer. He could not now unsee, what he had come to see, that God works out His will not only, nor so much, in tempestuous crises of conflict as through the still, slow-moving, persuasive movement of His ubiquitous spirit. God had been, after all, in that dread stillness in Jezreel that followed the tempest of Carmel. There was all the time, though the prophet in his passion had overlooked it, a genuine if as yet non-vocal spiritual response in the land. There were thousands, he began to see, still faithful to Jehovah. Elijah had so permitted the pollutions of Samaria and the royal court to fill the field of his mind that he had forgotten (much as we do when we hastily judge France by giddy Paris) the body of unsullied piety in the rural districts. He began to feel that he needed to lean on this rural piety, and he resolved to search for a young countryman to be his friend and colleague. And as for the corrupt dynasty, the God, whose processes of working he now saw were slow and sure, would use an alien hand for His punitive work.

So the chastened and reinspired prophet emerges from this amazing discipline, purer, loftier, more patient. We shall see that he has lost nothing of his capacity for righteous indignation; and to the end he remains essentially the ecstatic hero; but he has become the kindly, companionable man of God and friend of the people, though always a little sadly apart and preoccupied, as the pioneers in religion are apt to be.

He had begun by testing God in the field of nature; he found Him, most impressively, in the realm of spirit. He began by associating Him with the unusual, the catastrophic; he found Him later in the ordinary, the unobtrusive. He began, in his heat for Jehovah, in a passion of haste; he learned to control that fire and wait for the patient working out of God's holy plans. From the natural to the spiritual, from the outward to the inward, from storm to calm, it is a recapitulation of the story of religion, of our own individual and collective progress in the knowledge of God and of His ways. The hot idealism of youth gives way to the calmer view of the broad work of God appropriate to the experience of maturer years. The tempests of triumph and despair, the alternations of fierce strength and exhausted faith, give place to the more even flow of steady confidence in the fulfilment of God's holy plans. But let us not forget, however, that it is only those who, like Elijah, stand always before God whom His taming gentleness makes truly great.—The Sunday School Times.

VI. East Whittier Meeting. A Church Embowered in Orange and Lemon Groves.

What is known as the East Whittier and La Habra section, stretches ten miles eastward from the city of Whittier, along the southern slope of the Puente Hills, an undulating elevation of several hundred feet running parallel with the mountains 20 miles northward and forming a picturesque background to the landscape.

Central in this district is located East Whittier Monthly Meeting, four miles from Whittier, amid surroundings that present semi-tropic features of peculiar interest. This southern exposure of land, embracing some 12 square miles, protected from north winds by its bulwark of hills, and fanned by the soft sea breezes, is widely known for its marvelous production of lemons and oranges. From the door of the church building you may look out upon the Leffingwell lemon orchard of 500 acres, with the perennial green of other orchards in the vista beyond. The acreage here given to lemons is being rapidly enlarged, even fine English walnut orchards being supplanted by them as being more profitable. But oranges here hold equal claim with lemons to consideration. You may traverse miles of groves laden with the yellow spheres ready for the hands of the pickers, and often studded with props to sustain them under the increasing weight, a picture of beauty and fruitfulness scarcely to be found on the continent outside of the orange-growing districts of California.

Remembering the icy grasp of winter as experienced in the East at a corresponding date, I could scarcely realize that it was on the 13th of First month that, basking in the sunshine on the wall of a reservoir, I viewed hundreds of acres of ripening oranges, with pickers busy here and there, while on the higher slopes of the hills, plowmen were turning furrows in the teeming soil for the sowing of grain.

East Whittier meeting here began as an outpost work, under direction of a committee of Whittier Monthly Meeting, appointed Tenth month 4, 1905, including Dr. C. J. Cook, I. H. Johnson, Eva Cook, W. K. Green, O. L. Baldwin, P. C. Hadley, Lydia J. Jackson and Clara E. Johnson.

Seeing an opening for work at East Whittier, a building belonging to the yearly meeting was moved to the present site from New River, where an outpost work had not been sustained, and was later enlarged to its present commodious dimensions. I. H. Johnson took a leading part in soliciting funds and directing the removal of the building. A meeting for worship was opened Seventh month 29, 1906, Charles E. Tebbetts serving as pastor in addition to his duties as president of Whittier College. A Bible school was immediately organized, with I. H.

W. MAHLON PERRY, PASTOR EAST WHITTIER CHURCH AND PRESIDENT OF CALIFORNIA YEARLY MEETING EVANGELISTIC BOARD.

Johnson as superintendent and O. L. Baldwin as assistant, about 65 persons being present. The church building was formally dedicated First month 6, 1907, Andrew F. Mitchell preaching the sermon and Thomas Armstrong participating in the services. There were many present from Whittier to share in the glad occasion.

With the signature of 33 members and candidates for membership, request was now made for a monthly meeting, action on which was deferred for a time, and in the meantime very successful revival meetings were conducted by Edward Smith, bringing additional requests for membership. The monthly meeting was organized Sixth month 14, 1907, W. Mahlon Perry, Thomas Armstrong and Nannie M. Arnold representing Whittier Quarterly Meeting in the proceedings.

Dr. C. J. Cook was appointed presiding clerk, and Clara E. Johnson reading clerk. Nineteen requests for membership were made at the first session. Many of the charter members came from Whittier meeting, and some of these resided nearer to Whittier than to the new meeting, but felt it to be a call of duty to assist in extending the work into this rural district; and the success of the effort should not be without significance to meetings where there is a crowding together of a large membership, on which the sense of personal responsibility may tend to rest too lightly.

Amos Cook next served as pastor, and he has been followed by Lewis I. Hadley and W. Mahlon Perry, now serving. The present pastor's previous work was at Danville and Westfield, Ind., the latter his old home; Damascus, Ohio; Central City, Neb., and Whittier and San Diego, Cal. W. Mahlon Perry was not originally a Friend, but became a member by conviction, and, as seems not unusual in such cases, seems more attached to the views and methods of our Church than do some of our birthright members.

This meeting, in a notably large attendance in proportion to its membership, in a Bible school maintaining marked interest and up-to-date methods and in a liberal participation of its members in the vocal exercises of public worship, gives evidence of vigor and spiritual life, and is certainly impressing itself on the community in which it is located. The membership now exceeds 100, showing a gratifying increase above its charter membership of 33.

Resident ministers here besides the pastor are Amos Cook and Elizabeth Milhous. Amos Cook recently served Long Beach meeting most acceptably for a time, pending the arrival of the new pastor at that place. He is also gratefully remembered as one of two whose liberal and unexpected contributions, made at a critical moment, turned to success the ebbing tide of subscriptions to the $100,000 college endowment fund in the yearly meeting a few years ago.

Elizabeth Milhous, daughter of Esther Griffith, who was widely known among able women preachers of the past generation, exercised her gift to the edification of the Church in the years of her strength, being for quite a period the only minister at Grove meeting, Butlerville, Ind., her former home. She maintains an active interest in all the work of the Church in her advanced years.

Heads of departments in this meeting are: Bible school superintendent, Ashton M. Otis; president of Christian Endeavor, Roy Ware; superintendent of Intermediate Christian Endeavor, Adelaide Abel; president of Missionary Society, Martha Ware.

The devotion to the interests of this meeting, in its establishment and maintenance, of Dr. C. J. Cook, who passed to his reward less than two years ago, is tenderly remembered by all its members.

Here, in the home of Lindley Abel, I found an interesting heirloom, which showed the high appreciation in which the solid members of our Church in the preceding century held the Friends Review, predecessor of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, in a bound volume of the periodical covering a part of the years 1859-60. This was handed down from Lindley Abel's grandfather, Lyman Abel, Leeds County, Canada, who left one of these bound volumes of the Friends Review to each of his several sons and daughters, and these, like the one whose leaves I turned, are, doubtless, prized as keepsakes in the several branches of the family after the lapse of half a century, and have continued to shed a wholesome influence long after the hands that penned their pages were stilled.

Answering the query probably in the mind of the reader as to the price of one of those orange or lemon groves, I will say that it runs from $1,000 to $3,000 per acre. Unimproved lands with water supply may be bought at from $500 to $1,000 per acre.

But it should be remembered that one wishing to establish a home in this citrus belt may well do with five acres, or even half of that, this being the size of many of the orchards. With lemons requiring to be picked monthly, and to be irrigated and cultivated with like frequency in the dry season, a very little patch of ground devoted to this fruit will keep the head of a household employed, and will give his family a good support.

The Jubilee in Philadelphia

BY ELLEN C. WOOD.

The twenty-fourth city to celebrate the jubilee of the Women's Foreign Missionary Societies was Philadelphia. The four days of meetings are over and a backward view is possible. That the interest exceeded the greatest expectations of the Committee on Preparation is unquestioned. From the opening meeting, Dr. Vinton's illustrated lecture on "Mission Lands," at Witherspoon Hall, when an overflow meeting of hundreds had to be held in another hall, the committee was forced to plan simultaneous meetings for every session.

Children's meetings were the feature of First-day, Second month 12th, though ministers all over the city spoke on missions.

Susan C. Lodge opened the missionary conference on Second-day by pointing out many definite leadings of the Holy Spirit during the period of preparation. A symposium, "Our Responsibility at Home and Abroad," was lead by missionaries from Japan, India, Turkey and China and representatives of the Denominational Boards.

The young women's supper was attended by 1,500 young women. Stirring addresses were made by Dr. Mary Noble, vice-principal of the North India School of Medicine, and Lucy W. Peabody, Boston, chairman of the Central Committee on United Mission Study. All adjourned to a large hall to hear Helen Barrett Montgomery and student volunteers. Simultaneously 1,000 more young women were listening to the same speakers in reverse order at Calvary Church.

On Third-day morning ten drawing-room meetings and a conference on literature were attended by 1,500 women. The prayer service has been a source of strength in every city where a jubilee has been held. On Third-day morning one was held in which five periods of silent and vocal prayer were led by women of five Christian bodies, and those present realized that the spirit of God indeed broods over those who seek His presence.

Twenty-five hundred women attended the luncheon and then adjourned to the Academy of Music for the toasts and addresses. During the afternoon 12 denominations held meetings, with about 5,000 present. The Program Committee, by means of a dozen automobiles, spirited the 15 members of the traveling group from meeting to meeting, thus insuring the presence of three or four speakers at each "rally."

The culmination was the meeting in the Academy of Music on Third-day evening, with two simultaneous meetings in large churches near by. The audience was chiefly women. A chorus of 500 voices led the singing; and a pageant added interest to the evening's exercises. Two processions of "Pilgrims of the Night" crept with bowed heads to the center of the platform. India, Burmah and Turkey, typified by young girls in costumes brought from those countries, met others representing China, Japan, Korea and the island world, and the trains wound back and forth, pausing as a group of pearl-robed angels with trumpets swept forward. The chorus movingly sang "Hark, Hark My Soul, Angelic Songs Are Swelling," and the audience was very still as the veiled pilgrims and footsore Orientals stood with heads lifted high to hear the glad tidings.

Short addresses by Etta D. Marden, Turkey; Jennie V. Hughes, China, and Dr. Mary Noble, India, told the need of heathen women for the consolation of Christ. Lucy W. Peabody showed that women are widening their sympathies and are more than ever called upon to carry Christ's message to women beyond the seas and to bear with Christ the burden of the sin of the world.

Perhaps to most of those present Helen Barrett Montgomery's closing address carried the profoundest conviction. She said that the most important point in the world is where a mother stands with her babe in her arms, and that the supreme force shaping her life is always religion. Of the five great religions thus shaping women's lives the world over, Christ's is the only one which gives woman a place. Then she forced home the thought: Are we to deny to other women the joy, the comfort, the salvation of Christ? She closed with the paraphrase of Livingstone's famous saying, "The end of the exploration is the beginning of the undertaking," given at the Edinburgh Convention, "The end of the convention is the beginning of the campaign," and insisted that the jubilee is only a stepping-stone to persistent, joyous effort for missions.

"There is no better capital for a poor man than civility."

Grew Old Together

BY DAVID W. DENNIS.

Walter T. Carpenter.

Walter T. Carpenter, a beloved elder of Indiana Yearly Meeting for more than fifty years, and from 1858 until 1893 connected with Earlham College either in the capacity of superintendent or as a member of the Board of Trustees, passed from among us Eighth month 31, 1910, in the one hundredth year of his age.

For many years previous to his death his home was in front of the campus of the college where his life had been so useful for so long.

He saw and helped the college grow to five times the dimensions it had when he superintended it. What may fairly be called his retirement lasted for a quarter of a century, although he rendered important services during a large part of this time. He helped the endowment of the college from nothing at all to $350,000. He saw trees he had planted on the campus grow to the dimensions of native forest trees. He conversed daily with his friends about the prospects of the college and the Church, looking forward to and planning for the future with more enthusiasm and spirit than he ever showed in recalling and recounting the past, although his recollections ran back to within a very few years of a century.

The Church during these years had no more faithful attendant, and as he grew in age he contributed with increasing frequency and acceptance to the devotional services. The superintendent of Earlham College is the father of the college family; in the days when Walter Carpenter was superintendent, he was also treasurer and the chief disciplinarian. In the discharge of the delicate, difficult and many-sided duties pertaining to his office he influenced for good the lives of hundreds of young men and women who are now bearing in their turn the burdens of the Church and citizenship in their several communities. If his best friends had the shaping of his record in their hands today it is difficult to see how it could be bettered. "Well done" is also the judgment here.

Susan M. Carpenter.

It is enough to say for Susan M. Carpenter that she was a helpmeet for her husband in every way. She was our mother, gentle, refined, competent, untiring, our queen mother, just what we needed, a model of courtesy and kindness. Her regal bearing would have been enough; but her sacrifice for our comfort so endeared her to us that her example did for us what it should have done. She left us Ninth month 30, 1908. So she and her husband grew old together under the happy surroundings above described. The old National Road in front of Earlham was for them the "village" that never was "deserted." It was a great pleasure to us all to see them here

Husband out life's taper at its close,

And keep the flame from wasting by repose.

In this home, until death intervened, the table was spread every Sabbath evening for all the children and grandchildren who could avail themselves of its hospitality.

In this home, at the age of ninety-seven for both father and mother, visitors saw a husband as gallant and a wife as gracious as it is possible to see in a new home at twenty. Such a home in any community is the very salt of the earth in that community.

If every "deacon was the husband of one wife" in such a home, what a Church we should have! If one by one in every family in all our free land the boys and girls grew to manhood and womanhood in honor, trained for life's duties, in the practice of life's amenities, we should at once become a nation without ills.

When it can be truthfully said that a father and mother have been competent; sane, successful in the nurture of their children, the best thing has been said that can be said. When it is possible to add, as in this case, that the same parental influence has gone out to many hundreds of their neighbors' children, there is no desirable thing to add.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

Emma Coffin, Oskaloosa, Iowa, began evangelistic efforts at Bear Creek, Iowa, the 12th inst.

* * *

A public welcome was given recently to 18 new members in East Whittier Meeting, California.

* * *

Morton C. Pearson, addressed a mass meeting of 400 men at Brazil, Ind., First-day afternoon, Second month, 12th.

* * *

The new academy building at North Branch, Kans., was dedicated the 5th inst. President E. Stanley delivered the address.

* * *

Addison and Rebecca Nayler, Berkeley, Cal., stopped at Haverford on their way to visit in the Orient. They sailed from New York on the 18th inst.

* * *

Steps are being taken for the erection of a new meeting-house in Sherwood, Oregon, where the meeting-house was destroyed by fire a few years ago.

* * *

Robert E. Pretlow visited the meeting at Upperville, N. Y., the 7th and 8th inst. He also addressed a no license mass-meeting in Smyrna the evening of the 9th.

* * *

William J. Sayers, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., has recently organized a Bible school, at Fairview, N. Y., a suburb of Poughkeepsie. This is a rapidly growing place, there are at present four classes, with an increasing attendance.

* * *

Friends in New England are planning to celebrate the 250th anniversary of their yearly meeting, Sixth month 24th, of this year at Providence, R. I. Invitations have been sent to Friends in other yearly meetings to attend and take part.

* * *

David and Margaretta Alsop, Haverford, Pa., and Edward and Margaret Wistar, Germantown, are sailing on the Manchuria, for Japan, on the 28th inst. They are going out to visit the Tokio mission and will be absent about three months.

* * *

Butternuts Quarterly Meeting was held at Upperville, N. Y., the 13th to 15th ult., and was a time of great blessing to all. Three of the home ministers were in attendance, also Albert G. Shepard, pastor at Clinton Corners. A number who are not members were much impressed with his ministry.

Indianapolis Friends are securing through the Legislature, now in session, a law to prevent the use of the term "Quaker or Friend" on bottles or any receptacles in which articles are sold. At the time of this writing, the bill has passed the House without a dissenting vote. It is very probable the Senate will vote in a similar manner.

Alice Whittier Jones, Amesbury, Mass., who is home on a furlough from Ramallah, Palestine, was in Philadelphia last week. She addressed a missionary meeting at Twelfth Street Meeting-house and also addressed companies of Friends at Haddonfield and Lansdowne.

* * *

A number of our Friends in California and Oregon are interested in the new "Pacific Coast Evangelistic Federation," an interdenominational movement carrying out the federation idea that has become so prevalent in recent years. Tilman Hobson, Pasadena, has been selected as general secretary of the organization.

* * *

The current number of The Pacific Friend devotes considerable space to Bible schools in California Yearly Meeting. It is very encouraging to find a number of schools using the International Graded Lessons in their Primary, and some in their Intermediate work. Also that a number of the schools have organized classes which are alive and aggressive in extending their influence for good.

* * *

The meeting-house at Arthursburg, N. Y., has been reopened for services after being closed several months. William J. Sayers, pastor at Poughkeepsie and Elmer D. Gildersleeve, are interested in starting a meeting there and will attend once a month during the winter and spring. They hope later that a permanent meeting can be established. On a recent First-day ninety people were in attendance.

* * *

Grand River Quarterly Meeting was held at Miami, Okla., the 3d to 5th inst. There was a very small attendance on account of much sickness—an epidemic of la grippe and pneumonia prevailing all over the country. Only home ministers were present.

Angeline Latz has been very low with pneumonia, but is better and thinks she will recover. She is in her eighty-second year.

Ferrisburg Quarterly Meeting was held at Monkton Ridge, Vt., the 11th and 12th inst. Edward Ransom and his wife Marion Hallock Ransom were acceptably in attendance. On First-day there was a good attendance. Edward Ransom preached and nearly 40 testified. Mention was made of the long and faithful labors of Hannah B. Goddard, East Farnham, P. Q., who died in her ninety-third year and whose funeral was being held at the same time.

The Second Friends Church, Marion, Ind., has just closed a very successful series of meetings. They were conducted by the pastor's sister, Ada E. Lee, assisted by Virgil Brock and Samuel Pack of Fairmount Academy. About 50 were converted or renewed or decided definitely for Christ. Thirty-two were received into membership and were given a public welcome on First-day morning the 12th. Several more intend joining Friends soon.

Richard R. Newby, Evangelistic Superintendent of New York Yearly Meeting, began a series of evangelistic meetings at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., the 9th inst.

On Third and Fourth days preceding, Nine Partners Quarterly Meeting was held at the same place. The special feature of the occasion was the presentation of a number of practical subjects, R. R. Newby discussed "Gifts" and "Lost Things," while Mary Doan Hole, Richmond, Ind., spoke on "Practical Mystics."

Springdale Quarterly Meeting was held at West Branch, Iowa, from the 2d to the 4th inst. Ministers from the three monthly meetings, Yearly Meeting Superintendent W. Jasper Hadley and Pro. W. Iring Kelsey, of Penn College, were present. The latter spoke in the interests of the college and a committee was appointed to assist in raising the endowment. The meeting sent letters to their Senators and Congressmen urging in the interests of peace the neutralization by international agreement of the Panama Canal Zone.

* * *

The Chicago Quarterly Meeting was held at Watseka, Ill., on the 3d and 4th inst. Charlotte E. Vickers from Chicago, bore the chief service of all the meetings. The committee appointed to prepare a protest against the verdict of the Supreme Court of the State, debarring the reading of the Scriptures in the public schools, reported that they had drawn up and sent a copy of the protest to each of the seven judges of the Supreme Court.

Carrie R. Samms, a returned missionary from Alaska, gave an account of her experiences in that country on First-day morning.

* * *

Friendsville Quarterly Meeting was held at Knoxville, Tenn., 27th, 28th and 29th ult. Fanny E. Benedict preached on Seventh-day and Maude Hoskins on First-day. The quarterly meeting was a time of refreshing and blessing.

Maude Hoskins conducted a series of meetings in the Knoxville Friends Meeting First month 15th to 31st, in which there were ten professions of conversions and renewals. These meetings were also a great blessing to the church, greatly deepening the members in spiritual life and bringing the new meeting into much better condition, than it has ever been, for religious work in the city.

* * *

A revival meeting of two and one-half weeks closed the 12th inst., at Dublin, Ind. It was conducted by the pastor Dalton H. Lewis, a student in Earlham College. The church and town have not experienced such an awakening in years. The revival began at a prayer meeting a short time before. The special services began when a young married man was converted. The most remarkable feature was the conversion of several young men in the high school. One young man, converted in the meetings, feels definitely called to the ministry. About 55 have decided to live a better life. The church is very much strengthened and feels a spiritual uplift.

The situation relative to the fortification of the Panama Canal is nowhere better summarized than in a resolution passed by the American Peace Society, which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the American Peace Society regards the fortification of the Panama Canal as unnecessary, in view of the Hague convention forbidding the bombardment of unfortified coast places, as involving a vast outlay of money needed for the material and moral uplift of our citizens, and as committing the United States to a program of increased military expenditure at a time when we ought to be leading the world in the effort to settle all international disputes by arbitration. We believe that neutralization by international agreement, as in the case of the unfortified Suez Canal, will give us ample guarantee of security, will be an important step towards the neutralization of all international waterways, and will give the United States a moral leadership in the world-wide movement towards the removal of national misunderstandings and the fostering of international goodwill."

The Friends Missionary Society, Knightstown and Raysville, Ind., met the 8th inst., at the home of Jennie H. Pray. There were 25 women present, 18 of whom were members. The quotation for the day was "We become happier than others not by having more goods, but by doing more good." The circle is studying Western Women in Eastern Lands. Anna Binford read an account of Dr. Eleanor Chestnut and Alice Elliott an interesting paper on hospitals in the Orient. Those present were deeply stirred as she vividly set forth the conditions existing there, showing the great need for Christian methods for caring for the sick. The contrast was the more impressive as most, if not all, of them had the night before heard Dr. Buchtel's lecture on "The Pleasantness of American Life." And many expressed their gratitude for the blessings that Christian women enjoy. The music and social hour were delightful and refreshments added to the pleasure of all.

Plainfield Quarterly Meeting, held at Plainfield, Ind., Second month 4th, was a time of unusual blessing. Prof. Elbert Russell was present and preached a most acceptable and illuminating sermon on "The Good Man of the House." On First-day morning, Prof. Russell preached at The First Friends Meeting, Indianapolis, and in the evening opened the Quaker Round Table series with an address on "The Social, Political and Religious Conditions out of which Quakerism Sprang." On Second-day morning, the Ministerial Association of Indianapolis, comprising 264 pastors and ministers, listened to a masterful address by Prof. Russell on "The Passing of Augustine." The true doctrines of Quakerism were never more profoundly set forth to Indianapolis audiences than on these occasions. Our correspondent adds, "we wish to register our high appreciation of Elbert Russell's worth and work among the Friends of the Middle West."

* * *

Vermilion Quarterly Meeting was held from the 10th to the 12th inst., at Vermilion Grove, Ill. Chas. Axton and wife, Watseka, Ill., and Dr. D. W. Edwards, President of Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa, were present. The latter preached powerful sermons both on Seventh-day and on First-day. A new building and an endowment for Vermilion Academy were considered. A nominating committee was appointed to propose Friends to constitute a permanent Foreign Mission Board. Nearly all the monthly meetings in this quarterly meeting have recently held special evangelistic services which have resulted in reclaiming backsliders, converting sinners and building up the church. Nathan T. and Esther G. Frame concluded a twenty-five days' service at Vermilion Grove, First-day evening the 29th ult.

* * *

At Newberg Quarterly Meeting held at Newberg, Oregon, the 10th, 11th and 12th inst., Friends were especially favored with the company of Harry Hayes, Blanche Ford and Mead A. Kelsey, whose messages were full of Gospel truth and power.

During the business session a request came for the establishment of a quarterly meeting to be opened in Portland, Oregon, in Ninth month, 1911.

A very interesting letter was read from Quilcene Monthly Meeting, Washington, where Samuel B. Taylor and wife are doing efficient work.

Prof. W. J. Reagan, acting president for Pacific College, was recorded a minister of the Gospel.

Interesting reports were read from A. C. and Frankie L. Martin from Kake, Alaska.

The meeting directed a letter of loving greeting sent to Louisa P. Round located at Jefferson, Oregon, she being detained at home on account of sickness.

John Frederick Hanson, our veteran peace worker, conducted a peace meeting the evening of the 10th, and Virgil Hinshaw delivered an excellent temperance address the evening of the 11th.

* * *

Puget Sound Quarterly Meeting met in Seattle, Wash., the 4th and 5th inst., under a deep sense of the love and preservation of the Lord. The attendance was not so large as usual, but the sense of the obligation of the Kingdom of God was never more present.

Levi D. Barr from California, who is now working with the Volunteers of America, spoke Seventh-day morning to the satisfaction of many. Also Harry Hayes, Iowa, was present in the last sessions.

A request from Everett Monthly Meeting for the establishment of a monthly meeting at Peshastin, for the Friends beyond the mountains, was granted and a committee appointed to set it up on the last Second-day in this month. The meeting is to be known as Peshastin Monthly Meeting.

This is the second monthly meeting in the famous Wenatchee Valley, and the prospects are good for a further growth in this promising field.

On Sixth-day evening a very interesting meeting was held and a very general discussion was conducted on the subject of the "Equipment for Workers," opened by J. Edgar Williams, Seattle, with a paper on the subject and followed by Claude Barker, Peshastin, which was very helpful to all present.

Chas. Replogle was appointed to prepare a memorial of the life of our late beloved friend, Jonathan Votaw.

The quarterly meeting adjourned to meet at the State Street Meeting-house in Tacoma, on the first Seventh-day in next Fifth month.

Everett Monthly Meeting, Wash., reports very encouraging prospects, even though it is losing 44 members in the setting up the new monthly meeting at Peshastin this month. Eight new members were received into membership this month and others are expecting to join soon. A minute signed by Belfast Monthly Meeting, Ireland, for Matilda Crouch, was read in the monthly meeting and she gave a very helpful talk which was greatly appreciated by all.

A letter by John B. Garrett, recently published in The Friend, calls attention to an interesting situation in the meetings of Philadelphia and vicinity. It says:

"A condition has arisen in Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting to which I ask attention as meriting the thoughtful and prayerful consideration of many of its members.

"It is composed of eleven local meetings, of which four are in the city of Philadelphia—at Fourth and Arch Streets, Sixth and Noble Streets, Twelfth Street south of Market, and Forty-second Street and Powelton Avenue. One is suburban, at Haverford, nine miles from the heart of the city. Three are in northern Pennsylvania, in the adjoining counties of Columbia, Lycoming and Sullivan. The remaining three are small and somewhat irregularly held, in the valley of the Schuylkill, forty to sixty miles from Philadelphia.

"The membership of the quarterly meeting, if I mistake not, is rather over than under one-third that of the whole yearly meeting. With the exception of the two meetings at Germantown and Moorestown, the average attendance of two of the first five named is probably larger than of any other of the meetings in any part of the yearly meeting.

"One year ago six men were numbered among the recorded ministers of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting. Two have since been removed by death at an average age of about sixty-eight years. Another is about transferring his membership to another quarter, within which he has long resided, to which no exception can be taken as it is strictly in accord with the letter and the spirit of the Discipline. Until a comparatively recent date, this Friend was engaged in business in the city, which made the regular attendance of week-day meetings there, both for worship and discipline, more feasible. This condition has ceased, and there is no longer valid reason for continuing city membership.

"The number of men among the recorded ministers belonging to the quarterly meeting is thus about to be reduced to three. Of these only one resides within its borders, the homes of the other two being about thirteen and twenty miles out of the city, and within an adjoining quarterly meeting, though attendance of the meeting of their membership on the part of one or both is frequent, perhaps general.

"Is this remarkable condition of Divine ordering, or is it due to any fault of our own? Are the men who reside in or about the city so absorbed with the things of this life that the spiritual life fails to receive its due share of attention? Do we fail to recognize and to exercise the gifts which our Father is so ready to bestow? Do our Elders who are appointed, inter alia, to discern and to cherish the gifts which are bestowed, fall short in the performance of this vital service? These are the questions which I feel drawn, in the love of the Gospel, to ask my fellow members to weigh and determine, and in which I would myself continue to be exercised.

"The Apostle's words are pertinent, 'Follow after love, yet desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy.' (I Cor. xiv: 1.) R. V."

THIRD MONTH 5, 1911.

ELIJAH GOES UP BY A WHIRLWIND TO HEAVEN.

II KINGS 2: 1-18.

(For Special Study, verses 1-11.)

GOLDEN TEXT.—Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him. Gen. 5: 24.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Second month 27th. Ahaziah and the prophet. II Kings 1: 1-18.

Third-day. Elijah's translation. II Kings 2: 1-12.

Fourth-day. Search for Elijah's body. II Kings 2: 13-18.

Fifth-day. Enoch. Gen. 5: 21-24; Heb. 11: 1-6.

Sixth-day. Redeemed from death. Psalms 49: 1-15.

Seventh-day. I will fear no evil. Psalm 23: 1-6.

First-day. A building of God. II Cor. 5: 1-10.

Time.—Probably about B. C. 857 (or 900), five or six years after the incident of Naboth's vineyard.

Place.—Near, and then east of the Jordan.

Rulers.—Joram, son of Ahab, in Israel; Jehoshaphat in Judah.

Parallel Passage.—None.

To preserve the continuity of the narrative I Kings 22, and II Kings 1, should be read. We now come to the closing scene of Elijah's mission and the opening of that of Elisha. The former's public life covered about twenty years, while that of Elisha covered about sixty years. The contrast between the two men and their work is great. The one a "wild man," an ideal Hebrew prophet with a burning, and often terrible message; the other, a quiet, civilized man, whose delight seemed rather to comfort, to help, to do deeds of mercy. See II Kings 4: 9. The great exception in the life of the second is the incident in chapter 2: 23-25.

The account of the translation of Elijah ranks with those of other incidents in his life, as one of the most striking of the narratives of the Old Testament. In simplicity and effectiveness it could hardly be surpassed. Elijah, alone with Enoch, of all men, shares the experience of translation. Compare Heb. 11: 5.

1. "And it came to pass." No definite time is named. "Elijah went with Elisha." They had apparently been living together. "Gilgal." Site not certainly known. The word is analogous to Stonehenge—a circle of stones. There must have been many in Palestine.

2. The narrative intimates that Elisha and his companions understood that they were to lose Elijah. "As far as Bethel." R. V. "I will not leave thee." He was determined to cleave to his master as long as possible.

3. There was evidently a community of prophetic persons at Bethel. Bethel was twelve miles north of Jerusalem. Elisha, very naturally declined to discuss his impending loss.

4. And "Elisha said," etc. Why did Elijah ask Elisha to leave him? Possibly it was because he knew that he was approaching a great crisis in his life, and felt as if he must be alone. But Elisha had a strong will and was determined to see the end. Jericho was about 14 or 15 miles to the south, longer by the road.

5. There was another community of the "sons of the prophets" at Jericho. Here the same question was put as that at Gilgal, and Elisha made the same answer.

6. Again Elijah asks Elisha to leave him. "To Jordan." This rather implies that Elijah expected to receive further directions when he reached that stream. "They two." None were to accompany them.

7. "Fifty." This is an indication of the number of the "sons of the prophets."

8. Elijah now knows what to do, and by a miracle makes a way for them through the Jordan. "Mantle." The hairy robe of the prophet—an insignia of his office. It was doubtless a sheepskin.

9. "Ask." Elijah wished to do something for his disciple and friend. "A double portion." Not twice what Elijah had, but the portion of an eldest son, which by custom was double that of the younger sons (Deut. 21: 17). He desired to be Elijah's successor.

10. "Thou hast asked a hard thing." To inherit spiritual power and strength is indeed a hard thing. Compare Matt. 20: 20-23. Spiritual power is an endowment which comes only with individual faithfulness and individual character. It comes to those who are willing and obedient and to none else. "Nevertheless." Elijah doubtless saw that Elisha had the needed qualifications and so gave him a sign by which he could recognize the fact. It has often been asked, Was Elisha's prayer really answered? There can be no doubt that in spirit it was, though the current and the character of their lives were so different. Each fulfilled faithfully his mission and was a great influence upon his countrymen. Elijah naturally made more obvious an impression than Elisha, though no one can tell how wide or lasting was the quieter work of Elisha.

"Elijah it was, who was wrapped in a tempest:

And Elisha was filled with his spirit; And in all his days he was not moved by the fear of any ruler.

And no one brought him into subjection.

Nothing was too high for him;

And when he was laid on sleep his body prophesied.

As in his life he did wonders,

So in death were his works marvellous." Ecclus. 48: 12-14.

11. Note that it is not said that Elijah went up in the chariots as is often said, but "by a whirlwind into heaven." It is idle to comment how this could be done. It is selected as a miracle and as a miracle it must be taken. Compare II Kings 6: 17; Hab. 3: 8; Psalm 78: 17.

12. "And Elisha saw it." The token of his inheritance, but everything was for the moment swallowed up in the sense of his loss. The chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof. "The protection and the defense of Israel by thy prayers." Compare II Kings 13: 14.

13. Elisha holds up the mantle in token of his desire that Elijah's prayer for him might be fulfilled. "He offers to God before he takes it as the badge of his new office as successor of Elijah. "Took up" means "lifted on high."

14. He follows the example of Elijah, and when he smote the waters of Jordan they divided at his bidding.

15-18. The sons of the prophets who had not seen the ascension of Elijah, when they saw Elisha, said, "The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha." They do not seem to have been convinced, however, until after a fruitless search for Elijah.

by the House, does not designate the lands to be acquired for forest reserves, but refers that question to a commission to be composed of the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of Agriculture, two Senators, and two Representatives. The actual purchases are to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture, but they are to include only lands whose purchase has been approved by the Commission, and has also received the consent of the State in which the lands are situated. A report by the United States Geological Survey declaring the preservation of the forests in question to be necessary for the protection of water-courses is also an essential prerequisite. The bill will doubtless be approved by the President. Those who have witnessed the havoc made in the White Mountain forests in recent years must keenly regret the long delay that has attended the adoption of some measure for their protection.

First Spring Display of Women's Suits

Not the formal opening—still weeks ahead—but a gathering and marshaling of over a hundred approved advance models for spring—for the many women who like to choose a practical spring Suit early. The wisdom of an early choice was never more clearly proved—every Suit in the display is sparkling with newness and that leisurely first-of-the-season perfection of finish impossible to the makers after rush-orders begin. Fabrics include the finest of spring-weight serges, worsteds and mannish suitings. Prices $12.50 to $50.00. Fully twenty excellent styles at $25.00 alone; in many cases representing special values. Models for every figure.

New Friends Meeting

Where Oranges, Olives, Alfalfa, Grapes, Peaches, and all deciduous fruits grow luxuriantly

Lindsay, California, a rapidly growing town of 2,000 people, from which saloons were banished by a vote of 6 to 1, is midway between Los Angeles and San Francisco, and is the center of the largest orange growing district in the state, eleven large packing houses being employed in handling the product of the thousands of acres of bearing orange orchards. All the other products above named, are raised most profitably. Olive growing, especially, promises to become here a business of immense proportions.

A Friends meeting of about 40 members has just been established here, which Charles White, well known by his efficient work in the East, is serving as pastor.

To Friends desiring a home in California, this section, by its splendid schools, its church-going people, its abundant water and cheap lands, and its newly established and promising Friends meeting, holds special attractions. Those desiring further information should address Robert Meredith, Lindsay, Tulare County, California.

He Leads Us On

[The following lines have been attributed to Zinzendorf, but recently were discovered to be the work of Hiram O. Wiley (1831-1873), a Massachusetts lawyer. They appeared first in the South Danvers Wizard in 1865.—Ed.]

He leads us on by paths we did not know;
Upward he leads us, though our steps be slow;
Though oft we faint and falter on the way,
Though storms and darkness oft obscure the day,
Yet when the clouds are gone,
We know He leads us on.

He leads us on through all the unquiet years;
Past all our dreamland hopes, and doubts, and fears
He guides our steps; through all the tangled maze
Of losses, sorrows, and o'erclouded days
We know his will is done,
And still He leads us on.

And He, at last—after the weary strife,
After the restless fever we call life,
After the dreariness, the aching pain,
The wayward struggles which have proved in vain,
After our toils are past—
Will give us rest at last.

FIRST AID FOR THE TEMPTED.

Seventh-day. Aid by watchfulness. I Cor. 10: 9-13.

How has aid come to you?

How do Scripture texts help you in temptation?

How do you meet temptation?

The dentist in his work of filling and extracting teeth has before him within immediate reach numerous instruments, each one adapted to a particular kind of work, or a particular portion of the filling process. His efficiency as a dentist is tested by his skill in the use of these different instruments. The surgeon in that critical moment when the patient's life is in the balance uses a variety of instruments during the process of the operation. Without these tools his efforts to relieve suffering or save life are futile. Temptation is like decay that attacks the teeth, or disease that assails the body. The Christian reveals his efficiency as a disciple of Christ, by his skillful use of the instruments within reach, which are to him in withstanding temptation like the dentist's and the surgeon's instruments. In this array of instruments he finds the Bible, prayer, the Church, Christ as daily strength and companion, public testimony, human sympathy and faith.

Jesus was tempted and His first aid in the temptation was an appropriate use of the Holy Scriptures. (Matt. 4: 4, 7, 10). This was more than a mere quotation, it revealed the fundamental principles that governed His life. It was a revelation to the tempter of His purpose in life. Purposeless lives are fertile fields where temptations sow the weeds of sin. Purposeful lives afford little opportunity for temptation to get sinful crops started. These lives choke the weeds by flourishing crops of good wheat.

* * *

"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Overcoming temptation is prevention, salvation from sin is cure. Pulling a man away from the edge of the precipice is prevention, picking a body up from the rocks and sending it to the hospital to have the broken bones set is cure. It is more necessary for a Christian to learn how to keep from falling, than how to get up when he is down, for here he applies the principle that prevents, and therefore does not need the principle that cures.

To be efficient, aid in temptation must be immediate. Classes in "first aid" are held to teach men what to do in case of accident before a physician can be reached. All aid in temptation must be "first aid." There is no waiting for an opportune moment in which to be tempted. Temptations in their very nature come at inopportune moments and assail the weakest point in the character. The Christian must go armed all the time. The carrying of physical weapons secreted upon the person is forbidden by law. In the Kingdom of Heaven the first concern of the recruit is to secrete upon his person all the spiritual weapons he can carry. "Put on the whole armor of God," is the command. The list of weapons is cataloged in Eph. 6: 13-18. Read it, and strive to become skillful in the appropriation and use of this armor.

In history we read of men who wore continually a steel waistcoat beneath their outer garments. They did this to protect themselves from sudden, cowardly, and unlooked for attacks upon their lives. The Christian must be clothed in the spirit and mind of Jesus Christ. This is the armor of light to his spirit. This is the Christian's coat of mail. This is better than a wall of fire, better than the mountain around Jerusalem. It is closer, more personal, more intimate. Friendship is a great protector; divine friendship is the soul's great fortress.

* * *

Aid in temptation is found not by running away, but by facing and fighting the insidious inducements to sin. Strength comes through struggle. He is far from being at his best when no temptations assail him.

"No, when the fight begins within himself,

A man's worth something. God stoops o'er his head.

Satan looks up between his feet,—both tug—

He's left, himself, i' the middle; the soul awakes

And grows. Prolong that battle through life!

Never leave growing till the life to come."

President Taft presented the pen to one of the members of the party and it will be placed on exhibition at the exposition.

The nation-wide fight against tuberculosis involved the expenditure of nearly $15,000,000 last year, as against $8,000,000 in 1909. The largest item, $11,376,500 for treatment in sanatoriums and hospitals, is almost double that of the year before. Anti-tuberculosis associations spent $760,500, tuberculosis dispensaries $889,000, and special State and municipal outlays totaled $1,750,000. The American people were slow in awakening to the need for this fight against tuberculosis and the hopeful feature of it lies in the comprehensiveness of the movement.

A recent dispatch from Topeka, Kans., tells how the State Senate was induced to study the Lord's Prayer. It says: "At a recent session, the chaplain requested the Senators to repeat with him the Lord's Prayer. Only eight were able to join him. Since that he has distributed copies of the Book of Common Prayer among the members. At the opening of yesterday's session the chaplain again requested the Senators to say this prayer. Fully half were then able to repeat it."

Women have long held the record for being better Church-goers than men. They now seem to lead in theatre-going also. At the request of the department of dramatics at Harvard University, a prominent New York theatrical manager had accurate account kept at the door of five large playhouses last week. The general proportion of women at the nightly performances was between 68 and 69 per cent. Every type of attraction save musical comedy was included

Living

We need, each and all, to be needed,
To feel we have something to give Toward soothing the moan of earth's hunger;
And we know that then only we live
When we feed one another, as we have been fed,
From the Hand that gives body and spirit their bread.

Our lives they are well worth the living
When we lose our small selves in the whole,
And feel the strong surges of being
Throb through us, one heart and one soul.
Eternity bears up each honest endeavor;
The life lost for love is life saved and forever.

A Great Coming Anniversary

On the 24th of Sixth month, New England Yearly Meeting will commemorate the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its beginning. In this new world an institution which has existed for a quarter of a millennium is somewhat of a wonder. There is only one college in America that is older than this yearly meeting, and only three or four religious bodies have a prior claim to antiquity in the Western world. The commemoration will be held in Providence at the time of the annual gathering, and the program promises to be full of interest. It will be printed in these columns when it is completed.

The first meeting for all Friends in New England occurred in Newport, Rhode Island, in what was then called "Fourth month," corresponding in the modern calendar to our June, in the year 1661—four years after the first proclamation of the Quaker message on these shores! Events moved rapidly in those young days. This first meeting was called together by a very interesting visiting Friend, George Rofe, who had come from England to spread the "seed of God" through the colonies. For four years the magistrates of Massachusetts had been doing everything in their power to wipe this new form of Christianity out of existence and to make it too dangerous for any person to dare to join the movement, but the more they imprisoned, tortured and hung the Quaker apostles, the more the people believed in their message, and by 1661 whole districts of Massachusetts were adopting the new faith. When the call went out for a general meeting on the island of Rhode Island, the people flocked in great numbers to the meeting. George Rofe, writing to one of his friends, says: "It was a very great and very precious meeting, and continued four days." In fact, it was so great that the Boston officials "raised an alarm that the Quakers were gathering to kill the people and fire the town of Boston!" Officials who persecuted were apparently somewhat hysterical in those days.

It is not to be supposed, of course, that these general meetings in the middle of the seventeenth century were exactly like a modern American yearly meeting any more than Harvard College of that period was like the university of today. But this "precious meeting" of 1661 was, nevertheless, the actual beginning of the yearly meeting which exists today, and there is every indication that the succession of annual meetings has been unbroken from that day to this. It is thus a shining date and every way worthy to be celebrated.

The Friends who have charge of the commemoration wish to extend a cordial invitation to all Friends everywhere to participate in the event, and they will welcome those who feel like coming from other yearly meetings. In those early days, what was for the interest of one group of Friends interested all. The cords of love and fellowship were very strong. George Fox has left a beautiful account of the fellowship spirit at the Newport yearly meeting of 1672: "When the meeting was ended, it was somewhat hard for Friends to part, for the glorious power of the Lord which was over all, and His blessed truth and life flowing amongst them, had so knit and united them together that they spent two days in taking leave of one another; and then, being mightily filled with the presence and power of the Lord, they went away with joyful hearts to their various habitations."

We could not do better in commemorating the momentous beginning of this first American yearly meeting than have a return of this high tide of love and life and power; and if once more we could all be "knit and united together," great things would happen again!

Missions in 1910

The Friends Missionary Advocate for Second month contains the 16th annual report of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions. It covers the year 1910, and the World's Conference at Edinburgh stands out as the significant event. Nothing in the history of the world has so emphatically demonstrated the growth of brotherhood. It seems strange that the followers of Jesus Christ have been all these centuries actualizing this aspect of His teaching, yet it is a fact, as one of the conference speakers put it, "that all previous Church councils had been called together over some point of controversy, and generally met in the heat of passion. Now, practically for the first time, a Church council had assembled without any point of controversy, but with the one purpose of co-ordination in the great work for which the Church was established—the conquest of the world for Christ."

The old complaint that our statistics are very incomplete is reiterated, and on good grounds. For instance, "in no yearly meeting does the Bible school report show what becomes of the mission funds collected," and, the secretary adds, "It is probable that for much of it no account could be given." There is certainly no good reason why Friends should not mend in this respect. The statistics which do appear, however, give some idea of the general situation.

Most Friends contribute to missions through the regularly appointed officers of the meeting, though the collections made by the Women's Foreign Missionary Association, the Christian Endeavor and the Bible school are considerable. Where the women are organized, their societies usually report the largest contributions, although in North Carolina, Indiana, Western and Nebraska Yearly Meetings the Bible schools show the largest footing.

The total contribution for the year is $82,492.47, which is $4,313.65 less than the previous year. A falling off appears in New York, Philadelphia, Ohio and Oregon Yearly Meetings. The other yearly meetings report an increase, Kansas Yearly Meeting more than doubling its contributions of the previous year. The average per member is greatest in Philadelphia, where it is $3.05; California is second, with an average of $2.80; and Baltimore, third, with $2.08. North Carolina Yearly Meeting, although it increased its contributions more than 64 per cent. over the previous year, still has the minimum average per member—28 cents. The average for American Friends is 82 cents. In 1909 it was 87.

The Men and Religion Forward Movement

In response to invitations sent out by a department of the International Committee of the Y. M.

C. A., representatives from 12 denominational brotherhoods, together with the International Sunday School Association and the Y. M. C. A., have appointed a "Committee of Ninety-seven" to promote a continent-wide campaign for "men and religion." In the language of John R. Mott, the primary object of the movement is "to present the living Christ with such fullness and attractiveness that He will do what He has always done when thus presented, appeal to living men so that they will feel the touch of His power." Emphasis will be placed on eight lines of endeavor: The organization of Christian brotherhoods among men and boys; literature on religious work; evangelism; Bible study; missionary activities; personal religious service; civic betterment; and public worship.

Bands of specialists will hold eight-day conferences in 90 cities throughout the United States and Canada between Ninth month, 1911, and Fifth month, 1912. At these conferences, or centers of training, other bands will be organized to visit the principal cities within a given radius, so that within the time specified, practically every city in the United States will be reached.

Nothing so ambitious in the way of evangelism has ever taken place in the Christian Church. The vigor, the enthusiasm and the wisdom thus far manifest are indeed promising features, and the hand of God seems unmistakably pointing the way to forward movement.

Sane Methods of Religious Work

The work as it has been outlined in the several departments of "The Men and Religion Forward Movement," cannot fail to inspire confidence. There is a disposition to profit by past experience and by the results of the scientific investigations which shed light upon mental and spiritual development. Take, for instance, the evangelistic work: Boys and men are to be appealed to in separate meetings and by methods adapted to their respective ages. In speaking of the work for "the adolescent boy," Charles W. Gilkey, in the handbook of the movement, says:

First and foremost, if we are to build solidly and for the future, we must include and capture the adolescent boy in our campaign. * * * Second, here is the field that will yield us the largest immediate results. * * * Third, our responsibilities begin with adolescence, and we are not called to undertake a campaign for children. The cultivation of the religious life of childhood belongs to the home and to the church, and not to a movement like this. It will be easy for us to crowd our meetings with boys under fourteen and to swell our statistics with "conversions" among them; but it will be a temptation to which we shall yield at our peril—and theirs. * * * Finally, we must not apply to adolescent boys the methods of religious work which are necessary and right in dealing with mature men. If we shall go astray in trying to work for children who have not yet entered on the period of adolescence, we shall go equally astray if we try to apply to boys in the plastic process of transition the pressure which is necessary to change the lives of mature men whose habits are set and whose character is formed. Our business is to reach the adolescent boy in the way that will reach him best.

Following this is an outline of work which should appeal to young men as a high and holy calling. To win boys and conserve their religious life is no easy task of a few days or weeks; it is a work of years.

Railway Rate Decision

It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of the decision rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission last week denying to the railroads the advance in rates for which they had arranged. Through a "community of interests," the railroads north of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers, and from the Mississippi to the coast, succeeded in agreeing upon a general advance in freight rates. The action against them is generally known as the "Eastern" rate case. The roads between the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers made a like move, and the action against them is known as the "Western" rate case. The "Southwestern" case had to do with schedules on roads running from St. Louis to Texas and the gulf coast. About the time these rate increases were proposed last spring, Congress passed an act conferring on the Interstate Commerce Commission the power of reviewing and vetoing rate schedules. In lieu of the withdrawal of the anti-trust prosecution which the United States had entered against the railroads, they promised to submit their new schedules to the commission for its decision before putting them into effect.

In presenting their claims, the railroads contended that increased wages and operating expenses made it necessary to increase freight charges; but in the course of the investigation, it became apparent that the volume of business and the methods of administration were essential factors to be considered, and the railroads, with the burden of proof resting upon them, failed to show that these conditions warranted higher freight tariffs. Accordingly the commission denied the right of increase in the "Eastern" and "Western" cases, and allowed only a partial increase in the "Southwestern" case.

The commission held that, in addition to the facts presented by the railroad companies, it would be necessary for them to prove that they had administered their affairs with "proper economy" before an advance in rate charges could be allowed. This is another promise that a better day is coming in public service work, since it is asking that corporate servants of the people render an account of their stewardship to those whom they serve, as well as to the stockholders who are financially interested.

The Veto Bill

The bill curtailing the veto power of the House of Lords has passed its first reading in Commons by a large majority, the vote being 351 to 227. This was the principal issue before the British people during the recent campaign, and the Government has lost no time in redeeming its promises. We are now to see what disposition the Lords will make of the matter. It is not unlikely that, with a compromise in view, they will propose reforms which will remove some of the objectionable features of the present system and yet leave them in full possession of their present power. When this matter is disposed of, Commons will proceed with the consideration of a bill giving Ireland a Parliament of its own with power to deal with all purely Irish affairs.

A New Treaty with Japan

A new treaty with Japan was ratified last week. It covers practically the same items as the former treaty, with the exception of the section on immigration. We are now without treaty right to restrict immigration from Japan, but the new treaty was signed with the understanding that "the Imperial Japanese Government is fully prepared to maintain with equal effectiveness the limitation and control which it has for the last three years exercised in regulating the immigration of laborers to the United States." Thus the national honor of Japan, and not our use of force, protects us against the importation of cheap coolie labor.

Creating a New World

The powerful reflection mirror of the Mount Wilson 60-inch telescope has found and photographed a swirling mass of gases 500,000,000,000 miles in diameter in the act of throwing off a new world. Using the most conservative figures, it is calculated to be 5,865,696,000,000 miles away from the earth. Professor Chamberlain, of Chicago University, and his colleagues recently evolved the theory that planets are formed from a spiral nebula whipping from its gaseous masses matter to become its satellites. These, cooling, become planets, and may become inhabitable like the earth. This photograph seems to confirm the theory.

Queue Cutting

How or when a man cuts his hair is usually a matter of indifference, but not so in China at the present. Recently a public queue-cutting was held in Shanghai, where not less than 10,000 were present. Wu Ting Fang, former minister to the United States, expected to be present, but was unable to attend. However, he submitted to the operation in his own home.

A Visit to the Grave of Wm. Penn

BY MARY LYON SACKETT.

To a Quaker on a trip through England there are few more sacred spots than the "Jordans"—the old meeting-house and burial ground of Wm. Penn.

Although it is only about 25 miles from London and but two miles distant from Beaconsfield, it stands alone in the shadow of a forest, aloof from the noisy, bustling world outside. It retains that peaceful atmosphere of seclusion which must have pervaded it a hundred or two years ago. No jarring noise of industry penetrates its restfulness, and only the sound of the birds is heard as they perch in the stately lime trees that shaded the place when Penn was living and still tower above the little meeting-house in majestic grace.

Our approach, being by automobile from Oxford way, was in the opposite direction from that of most tourists, and served to emphasize the antiquity and loneliness of the place.

From Stoke Pogis—the ivy-covered church and graveyard where Gray wrote his beautiful and famous "Elegy"—we cut across the country by a circuitous route, almost a path in its narrowness, lined on either side by veritable walls of hedge rows, so characteristic of rural England. As in the case of many English byways, the road curves almost constantly, and by reason of the height of the hedges, it is impossible to obtain any adequate view of coming vehicles. Therefore, as we sped cautiously along the winding path, with an increasing uncertainty of the result of meeting another machine where it was too narrow to attempt a passing, and figuring all the while upon the distance to the last cross-road, to which a backing-up would be necessary, we found ourselves in an anxious state of excitement and curiosity as we suddenly appeared upon the spot which was the object of our interesting though somewhat hazardous ride. However, this feeling soon changed into one of respect and reverence as we stopped in front of the door of the little meeting-house, where so long ago Wm. Penn had worshiped, and where for one hundred years no service had been held until Easter of 1910.

The building is a plain, neat, brick structure, in good preservation and repair, built in 1688. Here

Friends held meeting until 1801, when it was abandoned and has stood idle a whole century. The meeting-room proper contains the original raised seats in front and the rude wooden benches of Penn's time. There is no division on the ground floor, as in the case of many early meeting-houses, but at the rear of the meeting-room there is a wall with moving shutters in the upper portion, so as to make an opening from the auditorium into an upper room for the use of the women of the congregation. At this time it and the one below are used as living-rooms for the caretaker of the house and his family.

Last spring a monthly meeting of London Friends undertook the establishment of a meeting in this place. They sent one of their number, a young and enthusiastic Friend, to take charge, act as organizer, preacher, superintendent of the place and attend to visitors. Already there is a growing meeting and Bible school which bids fair to become permanent.

On the right of the house under the beautiful, old forest trees are the graves of Wm. Penn, his wife and five children. That of Elwood, the secretary of the poet, Milton, is also to be found here.

Interesting old books and records are shown, and one is permitted to sign one's name, along with scores of other Americans who have journeyed to this out-of-the-way and lonely place to do homage to a renowned and beloved man. We were told that scarcely a day passes without visitors from America. But the majority of these are merely loyal residents of the State he founded, and not members of the Society of Friends.

On the grave of Penn there waved a flag, placed but the day previous by an ardent admirer and a native of Pennsylvania.

As we sat in the old room and listened to the interesting historical anecdotes connected with the place, told by a "real-for-sure" Quaker of the present day, we were imbued with an unspeakable reverence for the quiet dignity and solitary peacefulness not to be forgotten. Truly it was almost irreverent to crank the machine or sound the horn within hearing of this venerable spot.

God's Presence.*

BY FLORENCE E. G. SIMMS.

Let us play suppose. We will suppose you went home from school yesterday and saw in your yard, on the long stretch of clothesline, a great many of your own clothes, as well as those belonging to other members of your family. They were not soiled as they were when you took them off, but looked white and clean. Your mother was not there in the yard, but you knew as well as though she was that it was she who had washed and hung those clothes there to dry, for you remembered that she was washing them when you left that morning.

You wanted to see your mother and ask her something, so you hurried a little and went in at the kitchen door. I said you hurried, but you did not make much noise, but closed the door softly, because you had been taught by mother to enter all houses quietly. As you entered the kitchen and looked around for your mother, we will suppose that you did not see her, but you did see there upon a table the things which she always used when she was making biscuits or cookies or pies, and so you knew she was not far off, but had probably been called into another part of the house before she had finished here. Now we will suppose, in your search for your mother, that you go on into your sitting-room.

When you had left that room in the morning, it was all in disorder, because you yourself had, in attempting to reach something that was on a shelf in the closet, pushed your mother's work-basket off and down upon the floor, scattering the spools and buttons, the thimble and scissors, tapes and needles all around you. You had been dismayed at the time because you knew it was quite time for you to be on your way to school, and yet you also knew mother would not want her room looking like that, and you were so relieved when she herself called from the kitchen that she would gather them up and you might go on to school. And now, sure enough, there they all were in nice order in her basket again. There, also, was a garment she was making for you, lying upon the sewing-machine. So mother had been here also at work in this room, but she herself could not be seen. Then we will suppose you heard a slight noise upstairs and you stepped to the foot of the stairway and looked up. You could not see mother even then, but you saw on the wall above you a shadow of a woman bending over a crib, and you knew as well as though she had spoken to you that your mother was putting your little baby brother in his bed for a little nap before she finished that other work of hers downstairs, and that she would now come down to you and you could ask your question.

But just then some of your playmates came along and called you, and you ran out hastily and joined them, and so you had not really seen your mother at all, nor asked her the question, but yet it was not her fault; you simply did not wait long enough. She would have been glad to answer you, but you wanted something else worse after all, and so ran away.

And now let us suppose again.

You start to school some morning and it is raining. You cannot see God, your Heavenly Father, but you know it's His washing-day. He is washing the dresses of the trees, bushes, ground and birds, yes, and He is washing the very air you breathe.

Then we will suppose, as you go home from school you find the wind blowing so hard you can scarcely keep on your feet. You know God is at work again drying His clothes, just as He dries yours when mother hangs them on the line.

It is God at work for His world and us, only we call it the rain and the wind. Then we will suppose you go out in the hot sun some day in summer. You find the heat so great you wish it were cooler, but you will remember it is only God's baking or ironing day for His world. He is at work, though you cannot see Him, welding together by this fierce heat the water and other things with which He makes the strawberries and other sweet, juicy fruits and nuts we all love so well. He is cooking the sugar into the water of the maple tree from which we get our maple syrup, and preparing the vegetables for our tables, ready for the further cooking we can give them in our homes. You cannot see God, just as you could not see your mother, but you know He is not far off, just as you knew she was nearby somewhere when you saw her sewing in the sitting-room and her preparations for baking in the kitchen.

So, if someone says to you some time, "The weather is very bad," you will know they do not mean just what they say, but that God's work is interfering with their play or pleasure for the moment, just as mother's putting the baby to sleep kept you from asking her what you wanted to ask her just at that time. And, of course, it was not bad for mother to put the baby to sleep, even though it did bother you a little. And if someone tells you they cannot find God, even though they see His work all around them, you will remember how you ran away just as mother was coming downstairs, and think perhaps that is the way they do with God.

Let us suppose again, this time that you are going to church or Bible school, and, entering the room quietly, you find all the people there with their heads bowed and some one person talking to God. You also bow your head and listen to the words of the one who is speaking. Suppose it reminds you of the way you use the telephone to talk with people that are far away from you, and you wonder how God speaks from His end of the telephone. And then when the singing and praying and talking and silence are all over and you leave the place, suppose you find some angry thought gone from your mind, or some new thoughts there that were not there before, and you think to yourself, "God has been at His work again, though I did not see Him."

When you go home today, or while you are still here at school, God will be talking to you many times, and you will wonder, perhaps, where the thoughts, as you call them, come from; but if you talk back to God in what we call prayer, which is really God's telephone, you will soon come to know His voice, just as you know your mother's. Tennyson puts it this way:

Speak to Him, thou, for He hears, and Spirit with Spirit can meet—
Closer is He than breathing, nearer Than hands or feet.

Quakerism Beyond the Mississippi

BY RAYNER W. KELSEY.

The Labors of Robert and Sarah Lindsey in Oregon and Washington.

As a supplement to the articles on the beginnings of Quakerism in Oregon, published in THE AMERICAN FRIEND a few months ago, it seems worth while to print the following story of the labors of Robert and Sarah Lindsey in the far Northwest in the years 1859-1860. These Friends, with minutes from London Yearly Meeting, traveled extensively during the years 1857-1861, visiting most of the yearly meetings in the Eastern part of the United States and also laboring among Friends in Iowa and Kansas. In Sixth month, 1859, they sailed from New York to the Isthmus of Panama, which they crossed by train, and then took ship for San Francisco. After laboring in California, Oregon, British Columbia and Washington, they visited the Sandwich Islands, Australia and Tasmania, and returned to England via Cape Horn.

Fortunately Sarah Lindsey preserved quite complete records of their journey, and later prepared the journal, extracts from which are here given.*

As far as the writer has been able to discover, the labors of Robert and Sarah Lindsey were the first of the kind by Friends on our Pacific coast. They found a few scattered Friends living in that far country, and among these and others they distributed tracts and spread the Quaker message. They held the first meetings after the manner of Friends in the land where two large yearly meetings now flourish. They carried to our farther shore the message that came to New England almost exactly two centuries earlier, for, according to George Fox, "In 1656 truth brake forth in America."

The labors of Robert and Sarah Lindsey in California will be omitted at this time, and we shall begin our journey with them as they leave San Francisco for Portland, Oregon, in Eleventh month, 1859:

"Seventh-day, 19th. Embarked on board 'The Panama,' with from 40 to 50 saloon passengers and about 250 soldiers, mostly young, undisciplined recruits, sent direct from New York to Fort Vancouver, to be in readiness should any disruption arise respecting the island of San Juan, which is claimed both by the English and Americans. Before night some of us were affected with sea-sickness and glad to retire to our berths.

* * * * *

"Fifth-day, 24th. At Portland, where we are staying over today, but have concluded to proceed pretty directly southwards, while the weather is fine and traveling moderate. A young man of the name of Field, whose name had been given us, has been useful in finding out others of the same class. Took a walk round the town, which is built along the bank of the Willamette River and is surrounded by forests of pine. There are good wholesale and retail stores, well supplied with the necessities and comforts of life. The population is said to be about 2,500. As we passed along, a stranger came out of a store and saluted us as persons whom an individual named Stroud, who boarded at his house was expecting and wishing to see, whom upon inquiry we found to be Mary Stroud, the young woman who came in the vessel with us from New York to San Francisco on her way to Salem. In the evening she made us a visit, which was mutually pleasant. She informed us that, not being able to meet with a situation to her mind near Salem, she had accepted the office of teacher in a college here belonging to the Methodists. She has a salary of $600 a year, and boards herself, but board and lodgings are high, and the charge for washing is $3.00 per dozen. Several other persons called upon us, one of whom was a Methodist minister, who asked many questions respecting our prospects. We understood afterward that he was the editor of a newspaper, so I suppose he was in search of news to fill a corner.

"Sixth-day, 25th. * * * Morning clear and frosty. At 2 P. M. went on board a small steamboat, and after some detention, sailed to Oregon City, where we arrived about 6 P. M. and found lodging at a rough hotel kept by a German.

"Oregon City, Seventh-day, 26th. We are in company with a man who was one of the early settlers in this State, at which time he, in common with others, obtained a grant of 640 acres of land from the Government. He is now on his return from the mother States, accompanied by a new wife and her two sons by a previous marriage. Another of our company, going south, is Samuel Simmons, an old settler who has been to San Francisco to find a market for his apples, which are a source of wealth to the farmers on the Oregon plains. This person had a birthright in our Society, and was a native of North Carolina. By making inquiries, we fall in with some and hear of others who have a claim upon us, as we pass along, but we are desirous of pressing southward, and hope to make calls upon our friends in returning."

* * * * *

The journey of our friends from Portland to Eugene, a direct distance of about 120 miles, lay southward up the valley of the Willamette River, still the most thickly populated portion of Oregon. In this valley live practically all of the 1,700 Friends in Oregon today.

The private meeting held by Robert and Sarah Lindsey at Salem, Eleventh month 27, 1859, and the meetings at Eugene, Twelfth month 3d and 4th, were apparently the first meetings held after the manner of Friends in Oregon. The last named meeting, being public, is especially interesting.

"Salem, First-day, 27th. After waiting until 5 o'clock last evening, we received orders to go on board a steamboat by which we came upwards of 60 miles to this place, which is the capital of the State. It is a pretty little town, having one business street, and houses scattered around upon the grassy plain. There are no well-furnished hotels. Not liking the one we were recommended to on landing this morning, we have removed to another which promises more comfort. Limestone not having been found in Oregon, the inside and, in some cases, the outside back walls of the houses are composed of a rough framework of wood, upon which thin cloth is nailed, and afterwards covered with wall-paper, consequently they are not very warm. * * * Spent the evening at George Stroud's, who, with his valuable wife, were born and educated amongst Friends, but have now joined the Methodists. Some other persons gave us their company, and before coming away we had reading and a favored opportunity with the man and his wife.

"Second-day, 28th. At Salem. * * * We had a call from Hannah Stanton, who left Indiana seven years ago, accompanied by her husband and six children, intending to cross the plains to Oregon. They much enjoyed the first few days' journey, remarking it seemed like a pleasure trip; but the cholera breaking out amongst the company, her husband fell a victim to it, and was buried on the road. After a distressing journey of six months, during which many lost their lives, the bereaved widow and her family reached their place of destination. A man, known by the name of 'Empire Jack,' whose real name is John Huntly, formerly of Leeds, in Yorkshire, is a wharfinger here, and made himself known to father. He is a nephew of the late William Huntley, and is living a bachelor life on the bank of the Willamette. He informed us that he had not heard from his relatives in Yorkshire for twenty-four years.

"Third-day, 29th. Having breakfasted, we were glad to hear the whistle of the steamboat, which summoned us on board, where we remained until 10 P. M. * * * Our captain, thinking it uncertain whether he could sail up to Eugene City, the head of the Willamette navigation, we concluded to land at Corvallis, a small town upon the plain, where we lodged at a hotel.

"Fourth-day, 30th. Accompanied by the young woman who came with us from Salem yesterday, we took our seats in the stage wagon which carries the mail once a week to Eugene City. The day was cloudy and cold, and the roads in many places very muddy. Crossed several creeks and water-courses which were thickly bordered with timber. The land is mostly enclosed, with farmhouses here and there, and fields of wheat, with its green blades, give a richness to the landscape. * * * We reached Eugene City, a small town of 600 inhabitants, about 8 P. M., thankful for the Lord's preserving care, and glad to find a comfortable bed at a hotel whereon to rest our weary limbs, after a jolting ride of 40 miles.

"Eugene City, Fifth-day, Twelfth month 1st. This place is only about four years old. It is located upon the plain and encircled by a coast range of mountains. There are several families connected with Friends in the city, and others living some miles distant, to whom messages have been sent, with whom it is proposed to hold a meeting on Seventh-day morning, and a public meeting is advertised to be held in the courthouse on First-day evening.

* * * * *

"Seventh-day, 3d. Rain fell in the night and this morning, which, I suppose, prevented several from being at the meeting this morning. Eleven persons were present, and the Lord was mercifully pleased to draw very near to us. * * * Spent the evening with Johnston and Martha A. McConnac.

* * * * *

"First-day, 4th. Sat down in our own room to hold our little meeting. * * * On entering the courthouse in the evening, we were surprised to find it crowded with people. Others came in who stood all the time, and some not being able to find seats, went away. I thought it a very interesting meeting wherein there seemed much openness to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ. After the close, tracts were distributed, which were eagerly received, and some persons came round for more, whilst the children pressed for little books. Our hearts are often humbled under a sense of the Lord's goodness, who mercifully opens the way before us and proves Himself to be a very present Helper in the time of need.

"Second-day, 5th. The night has been bitterly cold, with a northeast wind and strong frost. Thermometer only 5° above zero. Called upon some families in the course of the day. In one house we found four generations, with whom we left books, which were gratefully received.

"Third-day, 6th. Left Eugene City by stage at 9 A. M. on our return to Corvallis. * * * Reached our place of destination about 6 P. M."

The Ministry of Intercession

BY J. LINDLEY SPICER.

Have an appointed time for private prayer; let no other obligation interfere with this appointment with the "Lord of all the earth."

Come not lightly or frivolously into this audience.

Consider it is Jehovah whom you approach. Prepare your mind and heart for the interview.

Change hours of wakefulness at night into joyous hours of communion. Seek God, and He will so sweeten those hours into a blessed "hush" with Him that you will look with joy for their recurrence.

Many well-known forms passed by in review.
Do you know, dear friend, I prayed for you
To the bountiful Father of all?

Move out into the wider fields of intercession. "First of all: supplications, prayers, intercessions and giving of thanks be made—for all in authority." The Rev. J. H. Jowett was led to see that he had never definitely prayed for policemen. Have you? They are in "authority."

Have at least an intercessory share in the winning of the 1,000,000 souls to Christ in Korea. Seek out new peoples or places for which to pray. Our sympathy goes with our prayers. Lengthen your prayer reach.

Why not have better preaching in your church? Why not have souls born again in your own congregation? Answer this by a new consecration of your own prayer gifts. Pray statedly and get another to unite with you—for your minister, for a revival, for a new sense of the Holy Spirit.

Massacre at El-Kerak.

BY A. ROSENBERGER.

Much misunderstanding exists in foreign lands about the recent disturbances which took place in the regions beyond the Jordan, and a word of explanation to the Friends in America may not be amiss. Rough and somewhat lawless conditions are apt to prevail on the frontiers of all countries, and perhaps more so among the semi-civilized tribes of the Ottoman Empire. One need go back in the history of our own country only a few years to find the reign of the "cowboy" on the Western plains and the rough miners in the mountains a law unto themselves.

For administrative purposes, Syria is divided into the following political divisions: (1) The vilayet or province of Aleppo; (2) the independent liwa of Zor; (3) the vilayet of Beirut; (4) Lebanon; (5) the vilayet of Suriya, divided into the liwas of Hama, Damascus, Hauran and Kerak, with Damascus as the capital; and (6) the independent province of El-Kuds or Jerusalem. Each vilayet is presided over by a vali or governor-general, whose province is divided into liwas, over each of which is a mutessarif. Each liwa is in turn divided and every division placed under a kaimmakam. The kaimmakamluk is subdivided into districts under mudirs. Thus there are vilayet, liwa, kaimmakamluk and mudiriyyeh, presided over by vali, mutessarif, kaimmakam and mudir.

The liwa of Kerak, with El-Kerak as its capital, lies east of the Dead Sea, in the ancient land of Moab, and forms a kind of doorway to Arabia. It is thus much exposed to the wild and hitherto unconquered tribes of the deserts. It is a fertile country, and the inhabitants are mostly engaged in agriculture and cattle raising. The trade with El-Kerak is almost wholly in the hands of the merchants and traders of Hebron. Both the inhabitants and merchants are in bad repute, owing to their cupidity, which is closely allied to the spirit of a more open robbery.

El-Kerak occupies the site of the ancient Kir of Moab, Kir Hareseth, Kir Hares and Kir Heres of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Kings. With the warlike inhabitants the kings of Israel often waged fierce war, though the Moabites were closely related to the Israelites, King David's great-grandmother being a Moabitess. The Moabite stone was found near here which mentions the wars between Omri and Ahab on one side and Mesha, king of Moab, on the other. El-Kerak commands the caravan route both to Egypt and Arabia, and for this reason was long the fruitful cause of discord between those countries. It led the crusaders for like reason to seize and fortify it strongly and to hold it until finally overpowered by the valient Saladin in about 1188.

Modern El-Kerak, the capital of the liwa of Kerak, has about 20,000 inhabitants, as follows: 25 Protestants, 200 Latins, 2,500 Greeks, and the rest Moslems. A garrison of more than 1,000 soldiers are kept there for the preservation of the public peace and to prevent the robber tribes from interfering with the general commercial interests of the country and especially with the caravan trade. Here is a large castle and other fortifications designed to make the government secure in the administration of public affairs.

It is necessary to keep in mind that the desert regions of southern Syria and all Arabia are occupied by warlike tribes that have never yielded allegiance to any government, but have maintained their tribal relations and rights to the present hour, as the American Indians did in the United States until recent years. Unconquered have they dwelt in the presence of their brethren, with every man's hand against them and their hand against every man. Not far from Hebron is a monument erected to their great patriarch or sheik, Esau, the Son of Promise. They claim that Esau inherited the blessing, and not Jacob. His is the favorite name for their children.

Some months ago the government made war upon the Druses, occupying the Druse Mountains, to the north, who were likewise dwelling in a state of more than semi-independence of the government, for they claimed exemption from enumeration, military service (but not for conscience sake), taxation and government supervision. A large body of soldiers were rushed to their mountains under the able General Pasha Said, and soon they were compelled to yield to the demands of the government to submit to enumeration, military service and taxation. It was a matter of quick work and with comparatively little loss of life.

A movement was set on foot to reduce the hitherto unconquered tribes of the desert to a similar obedience to the authority of the government, and of them it was demanded that they also should submit to the taking of a census, to taxation and to military service. While appearing to have no hostile intentions, the Arabs were preparing to destroy the whole garrison at one foul blow, and suddenly gave the stroke at an unexpected moment. It was in no sense a religious disturbance, but wholly of a political character, Moslems and soldiers alone being sought for destruction. It was said, and perhaps with a large grain of truth, that they were urged to the rebellion by the still angered Druses, and were supplied with arms by one of the great Christian nations of Europe.

It is claimed that, before beginning the attack, orders were given by the sheiks to the tribes to spare the Christian quarters of the city, which in the main were obeyed faithfully. Reports were brought to Jerusalem to the effect that four French nuns had been captured and torn into fragments, but instead of the rumor proving true, the nuns were brought in safety to Jerusalem by an escort of tribesmen, and turned over to the French authorities. The incipient rebellion was soon quelled with the loss of only a few hundred lives and with some destruction of property, and the Arab tribes for the first time in their history were compelled to yield to the demands of the government. In all probability the final result will be the subjugation of all the hitherto unconquered tribes of Arabia, which so long have lived under tribal governments much like the American Indians.

A party of eight Americans will have occasion to remember the attack on El-Kerak. They had spent two quiet days in the city, and early in the morning were just ready to start on the journey to Petra when the uproar of the attack burst in upon them like a cyclone. For a time they became prisoners, until an escort could be provided to conduct them to a friendly tribe where they would be safe. The Arab sheiks gave them letters to the other tribe in addition to the escort. On the journey a bold robber tribe pounced down upon them, took them from the escort, and deprived them of most of their belongings. After a week of great anxiety they reached Jerusalem sound "in life and limb," but somewhat worsted in their "filthy lucre" account.

It is always true that "war is hell," even at its best estate, and usually it takes on added violence when carried on by ignorant fanatics; but in this case, care seemed to be taken to avoid giving any kind of religious coloring to it, and the brutality was not of an unusually barbarous character.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

William Pearson, formerly of Maysville, Mo., has removed to Clarksdale in the same State.

* * *

William P. Harvey, formerly of Columbus, Ohio, has removed to Clarksville, Ohio.

* * *

J. Arthur Wollam spent the first two weeks of the year at Argonia, Kan., conducting evangelistic meetings. Sixty-five were led to seek a better religious experience.

* * *

James R. Jones, while visiting his daughter in Gold Hill, N. C., preached an excellent sermon to an appreciative audience in the Methodist Church, on First-day, Second month 19th.

* * *

T. Leo Tierney, a member of the Society of Friends, has been appointed executive secretary of the Boy Scout movement in Philadelphia, and will have a great deal to do with carrying out its policies.

* * *

Florence Smith, Hutchinson, Kan., spent three weeks in a revival meeting during First month at Antioch Meeting, about ten miles south of Stafford, Kan. A number were moved to take a definite religious step.

* * *

Bertha Stubbs, pastor at Argonia, Kan., recently closed a two weeks meeting at a country school house about four and a half miles from town. A few professed conversion, and a Bible school has been organized.

* * *

A report from Seymour, Ind., says: Samuel S. Moore came to New Driftwood Friends Church and held a two weeks meeting with Melven Russell as singer and worker. Results, seven saved and one sanctified..

* * *

A revival effort of four weeks closed the 19th inst., at Hopewell, near Quaker, Vermillion Co., Ind., conducted by the pastor, Frank V. Stafford. Sixty-eight "definite blessings" are reported. Seven persons applied for membership with Friends.

* * *

A revival effort was held at Stafford, Kan., between the 8th and 25th of First month. Homer L. Cox and wife and Carl Byrd, Haviland, assisted the local pastor, Albert J. Bond. Upwards of 60 confessed to having received a definite blessing, and 20 united with Friends.

* * *

Haviland Quarterly Meeting was held at Stafford, Kan., the 10th and 11th ult. It was well attended, and was a time of good-fellowship and enthusiasm.

A Christian Endeavor of about forty members is a great help to the meeting at this place.

C. M. Wanzer, Urbana, Ohio, is much concerned over the terrible possibilities of the use of airships as instruments of war. He believes that an international agreement is imminently needed to safeguard the future, and wishes to correspond with all who feel interested in the subject.

* * *

THE AMERICAN FRIEND PUBLISHING COMPANY, Philadelphia, Pa., has in the minds of some Friends been confused with the "Publishing Association of Friends," Plainfield, Ind.

They are two independent concerns. The latter failed last Eighth month, and has since been in the hands of a receiver, Charles M. Havens.

Elam Henderson writes from West Falmouth, Mass., stating that we were a little previous in saying that he was doing pastoral work at Oak Grove, the effects of his recent operation having prevented. He is now sufficiently improved so that he expects to begin his duties at Oak Grove Seminary this week.

Three-fourths of a mile from Hartford, Wash., Friends have started a meeting and built a little meeting-house. It is known as Lake Stevens Meeting. At present there are 18 members and Benjamin Mills is serving as pastor. They hope to build a home for him but are not able. Help from outside would be greatly appreciated.

* * *

Richard Newby, Evangelistic Superintendent of New York Yearly Meeting has just completed a two weeks series of meetings in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. The meetings were increasingly well attended, and their results seem to well justify the value of such efforts. On First-day, the 19th ult., Richard Newby addressed an afternoon meeting at the Y. M. C. A.

The arrangement for a series of meetings to be conducted by Arthur and Eliza Dann at Whittier, Cal., commencing Second month 12th, had to be cancelled on account of Arthur Dann's illness. He is being cared for at the home of Dr. J. J. Mills, in Whittier, and according to the advice of the attending physician must abstain from further service for an indefinite time.

The Representative Meeting of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is sending to the editors of the country an address which was presented in person to the President of the United States and mailed to all members of Congress. It deplores the idea of fortifying the Panama Canal and favors "concluding a treaty with Great Britain to submit to arbitration all causes of dispute."

* * *

Mount Ayr Quarterly Meeting was held at Mount Ayr, Kan., the 18th ult. L. Clarkson Hinshaw, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, was present, and his preaching was edifying to the meeting.

The meeting-house at this place has been repaired by the local monthly meeting at a cost of $175, which adds greatly to the comfort and appearance of the place. During quarterly meeting time the weather was unfavorable, but a large number attended the session which resulted in a real spiritual uplift.

Anstice M. Harvey, pastor in Friends Chapel, Liberty Chapel, Friend Home Meetings, Mercer Co., Ohio, has been ably assisted in evangelistic efforts by the following persons: At Friend Home Meeting by Parvin W. Bond, Van Wert, Ohio, much good was done, some being renewed and others converted and the church greatly strengthened; Liberty Chapel, by Oscar H. Trader, Rockford, Ohio, a revival spirit prevailed throughout the meeting, and at Friends Chapel, by Laura Bogue, Fairmount, Ind., a gospel singer. Nine were definitely blessed.

Edward Woodard, Superintendent of Evangelistic Work in Western Yearly Meeting, began a series of meetings at New London, Ind., First month 29th, but on account of sickness was called away for two weeks, during which time Jehu Reagan, a former pastor, and John L. Kittrel, each for one week, rendered efficient service and the work moved forward. Edward Woodard returned before the meetings closed.

Over 80 were "definitely blessed." Thirty-six united with the church, and 20 new names were added to the active list of the Christian Endeavor Society.

Bloomington Quarterly Meeting was held at Bloomington, Ind., the 18th and 19th ult. Simon Hester, from Ridgefarm, Ill., was especially favored in preaching. He spoke at length in the morning and evening meeting on First-day. A spirit of harmony and goodwill prevails in the quarterly meeting.

The local meeting at Bloomington has a membership of 453 among whom is one woman over ninety-six years of age, and two women and three men who are over eighty. There are several members between seventy and eighty.

* * *

In the death of Joshua M. Perisho, Western Yearly Meeting has lost a valuable member. When a child he moved with his parents to Indiana. In 1854 he was united in marriage with Lydia Anna Chappell, Carmel, Ind. For twenty years he was a prominent member of Greenwood, (Mo.) Meeting of Friends, where he was clerk, elder and head of the meeting for many years. In 1874 the family moved to Carmel, Ind., where they have since resided.

He was always a staunch Friend, sincerely believing in the mission and work of the church. For fifty years he attended the sessions of Western Yearly Meeting. He passed away as he had lived, trusting devoutly in the love and power of his Saviour.

* * *

Charles E. Tebbetts, secretary of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions, accompanied by his wife, has been laboring in the interest of mission work in California Yearly Meeting. He was present at Whittier Quarterly Meeting, the 18th ult., and took a leading part in the morning meeting for worship. In the evening he gave a graphic and instructive review of the progress of missions during the past one hundred years. He had previously spoken on missions at Long Beach, and arrangements were made for him to address the Men's League, at Whittier, the following Sixth-day evening on "The World-Wide Work of Men for Men." He will visit other meetings during his stay on the Pacific Coast. His able presentation of missionary interests is highly appreciated, and will doubtless result in stimulating efforts on this line, and in securing more accurate and satisfactory reports from the several meetings.

Whittier Quarterly Meeting held at Whittier Cal., the 18th ult., was a most interesting occasion in a social way on account of the presence of many eastern Friends who are making a winter sojourn in Whittier, among whom were Laura Townsend and Benjamin Hiatt and wife, Iowa; Mahlon Day and wife, Indiana, and Josiah Binford and wife, Kansas. About 250 persons sat down to lunch in the social rooms at the noon hour. Dr. J. J. Mills, Quarterly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, and Benjamin Hiatt preached morning and evening on First-day, respectively, both sermons being greatly to the edification of the hearers. An interesting feature of the business session was the presentation of a valuable paper on the topic, "A Study in the Prayer Life of Moses," by Will Blount, a student of Whittier College, showing that spiritual endowment, far above all circumstances of birth or environment, or attainments of culture, is the vital element in all Christian work. The paper was highly appreciated, not only as an able production, but as showing the religious spirit of Whittier College, and the lines of thought it pursues in biblical investigation.

On the evening of Second month 10th, a reception was given by the Women's Auxiliary at Whittier College, Whittier, Cal., to husbands and friends of the members of the organization, which in its spirit, its enjoyable features, and the large number present, will be remembered as notable among the many pleasant entertainments provided by the auxiliary.

With artistic decorations of flowers and greenery brightening the scene on every hand, about 250 persons mingled for half an hour in social converse in assembly hall, and then repairing to the auditorium enjoyed an interesting program, following a welcome and graceful greeting by President Nan-nie Wing Owens.

The program consisted mainly of presentations in pantomime, under a magic-lantern light, focused upon the stage, Maud Muller, and several historic Quaker characters being among the numbers given. Rhoda M. Hare very strikingly personated Elizabeth Fry, and President Thomas Newlin, in khaki hunting suit, represented Theodore Roosevelt in his "temporary absence from the White House." A mandolin quartet rendered artistic music between the scenes, and the College Girls' Glee Club, including 20 voices, gave two numbers. President Newlin made a brief address, commending the auxiliary for its splendid support of the college, and for its work of inaugurating extensive improvements upon the campus.

The company next returned to assembly hall at the invitation of the Entertainment Committee, where they were regaled with bountiful refreshments, following which a humorous reading by Ella Andrews closed an evening's exercises, which, throughout, afforded unalloyed pleasure to all who were present.

Southland College, Southland, Ark., is rejoicing over a thirty-room annex to its girls' dormitory completed in Twelfth month. Both the girls' and boys' dormitories are full this year and more boys applied than could be accommodated. The enrollment is about 400 students, coming from all the adjacent States. The prospects and results are both very satisfactory.

Southland College is one of the three schools for the Negro, under the Board of the Five Years Meeting having in charge the condition and welfare of the Negro. This school was started in a small way, about the close of the Civil War. For many years it was under the care of Calvin and Alida Clark, who were appointed to that service by Indiana Yearly Meeting. Little by little it grew in influence and numbers, so that when Stanley Pumphey visited the school, he said of it: "Southland is the most promising field of labor occupied by Indiana Yearly Meeting and ought to be well sustained." Friends have been generous in their aid to this institution, and yet as the numbers increase the need also is enlarged—for many worthy pupils are taken into the home who cannot pay anything like a full compensation for what is given. The present resident student body numbers about 160—the other pupils are day scholars, some coming quite a distance.

As stated above, a thirty-room annex to the girls' dormitory was completed in last Twelfth month. The boys' dormitory needs a like addition. The girls' have good training in household duties, as well as in the literary work. Effort is being made for more industrial work for the boys. Friends have good reason for encouragement over their mission school in the Southland for the education and training of the Afro-American, who is a citizen of the United States. The results of the work already done are satisfactory, and the prospects for the future are encouraging. The 30 new rooms in the girls' dormitory were furnished simply, but comfortably, at a cost of about $500—the money for the same being raised by donation mostly from Indiana Friends.

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

My attention has been called to an error in my article some time since on "Isaac and Rebekah." My reference to the father of Robert G. Ingersoll as a strict Calvinist whose view of the sternness of God helped alienate the son from Christianity, was based on statements I had frequently heard and which I had never heard questioned. On investigation, however, it appears that Ingersoll's father was rather liberal in his views and one authority makes the assertion that it was the petty persecution which he received on account of his liberalism from some of the orthodox of his congregation that in part embittered the son against Christianity and the Church. I am glad to correct the mistake, into which I was led in this instance, as in others, by neglecting to subject such traditions to the tests of historic criticism before accepting them as true. Some other criticisms on my article have been made but none of them seems on investigation to be well-founded.

FIRST QUARTER, LESSON XI.

THIRD MONTH 12, 1911

ELISHA RESTORES A CHILD TO LIFE.

II KINGS 4:8-37.

(For Special Study, Verses 25-37.)

GOLDEN TEXT.—The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. Rom. 6:23.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Third month 6th. Sense of obligation. II Kings 4:8-16.

Third-day. Child restored. II Kings 4:17-37.

Fourth-day. Healing the waters. II Kings 2:19-22.

Fifth-day. Defeat of the Moabites. II Kings 3:1-27.

Sixth-day. Aiding a widow. II Kings 4:1-7.

Seventh-day. A multitude fed. II Kings 4:38-44.

First-day. Restoring a maid. Mark 5:21-24, 35-43.

Time.—No exact date can be given. The beginning of Elisha's mission was about 857 (or 900 B. C.), but at what times during his career the incidents described took place it is not possible to say.

Places.—Mt. Carmel, Bethel, Jericho, the Jordan.

Rulers.—During Elisha's career of about fifty years in Israel: Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, Jehoash. In Judah: Jehoram, Ahaziah, Queen Athaliah, Joash.

The home of Elisha seems to have been somewhere in Samaria. Unlike Elijah, Elisha, as was said in the notes on the previous lesson, was a civilized man, living a civilized life, and it is not likely that he wore, at least usually, the traditional prophet's garb of sheepskin. All that we know of him goes to show that he was of a kindly, merciful disposition. He undoubtedly had the spirit of Elijah, but it was manifested in a very different way. It is somewhat remarkable that though Elijah is mentioned and referred to a number of times in the New Testament, Elisha (Eliseus) is only mentioned once. (Luke 4:27). The whole of chapter 2 should be read so as to get the complete account of the "Elisha incidents." There is no special connection between the different stories told of Elisha and the chapters containing them are in the nature of a collection rather than of continuous narrative. Note the story of the bitter fountain made sweet, verses 19-22; the irreverent boys, verses 23, 24; the jar that gave forth oil till all the vessels were full—all preceding the present lesson. All of them except the first, showing the kindness of Elisha.

Verses 8-37 tell one of the most attractive stories in the Old Testament. There was a wealthy woman who lived at Shunem, about three miles north of Jezreel. It happened that Elisha often passed that way and by invitation of this woman "as oft as he passed by he turned in" to get a meal. The woman recognized him to be "an holy man of God"—that is a prophet and she got her husband to build a substantial little room for him and furnish it. The story goes on that Elisha wished to do something for her. It was a son she longed for, and Elisha told her she should have one. The story tells in wonderfully simple, yet graphic fashion, how this son came and grew, and while in the harvest field had a sunstroke and died. In her great grief her one hope lay in the prophet and she made haste to go the 15 or 20 miles which lay between her home and his. Here the lesson begins.

25. "Afar off." Doubtless he was on much higher ground and recognized her on the plain.

26. Elisha saw that something must be the matter and sent his servant to inquire. "It is well?" Literally, "Is it peace?" The mother, whose message was to Elisha, could not tell the servant and only answered "It is well," which, as used, was equivalent to our "yes."

27. When she reached Elisha, she prostrated herself clinging to his feet in true oriental fashion. Gehazi, the servant, thinking this derogatory to his master would have thrust her away, but Elisha forbid. "Her soul is vexed." Deeply troubled. He did not know the cause.

28. The mother's reply revealed the fact, though she could not bring herself to tell directly the sorrowful fact.

29. The directions are such as to ensure haste. The ordinary salutations take up a great deal of time. The staff was the symbol of his authority and ensured absence of meddling. There is nothing to show that Elisha expected any miraculous results were to follow. Some students think that Elisha thought that the child might not be dead and that the staff would keep the life in him, but this seems doubtful.

30. Whatever the staff might signify the mother had small faith in it as compared with the living prophet, and so she remained with him.

31. Gehazi, it would appear, thought that the staff would restore the child.

32, 33. Finding the child really dead. Elisha resorts to prayer. As someone says, "He shut out weeping and shut in prayer." Compare the action of Elijah at Zarephath (I Kings 17:21).

34. Elisha followed the example of Elijah. The idea was, doubtless, to bring warmth to the body.

35. "Walked in the house once to and fro." R. V. Then he repeated the action of warming the body. The word also expresses the idea of supplication. It is that which is used in the expression "Bowed himself in prayer." The whole attitude of the prophet in soul and body was that of earnest supplication. This time, signs of life manifested themselves—sneezing, opening the eyes. "Seven times." The number seven was a favorable one—a golden number, a sacred number. There are numerous instances of this, such as the seven-branched candlestick.

36. "Take up thy son." He was now alive.

37. Before she clasped her child, she fell down in thankfulness at the feet of the prophet. The septuagint omits the words "and the child sneezed" and reads, "stretched himself upon him seven times, and the child opened his eyes." It is an interesting variant.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

1. The Shunamite built the "prophet's room" not for the sake of reward, but from love.

2. The Lord honors those who honor Him.

3. The Shunamite lost her son, but she did not lose her faith.

4. God does not always give back physical life but He will always give spiritual life to those who maintain a close communion with Him.

MOTHER'S APRON-STRINGS.

When I was but a careless youth,
I thought the truly great
Were those who had attained, in truth,
To man's mature estate.
And none my soul so sadly tried
Or spoke such bitter things
As he who said that I was tied
To mother's apron-strings.

I loved my mother, yet it seemed
That I must break away
And find the broader world I dreamed
Beyond her presence lay.
But I have sighed and I have cried
O'er all the cruel stings
I would have missed had I been tied
To mother's apron-strings.

O, happy, trustful girls and boys!
The mother's way is best.
She leads you 'mid the fairest joys,
Through paths of peace and rest.
If you would have the safest guide,
And drink from sweetest springs,
O, keep your hearts forever tied
To mother's apron-strings.

Senator Lorimer's plea for vindication in the contest over his right in the Senate was a remarkable effort. He spoke for four hours to a crowded chamber held in rapt attention with many shedding tears, but he failed to answer the charge that bribery had been used in his election. The sole matter for the Senate to decide, is whether the bribery did not make the election invalid. On that point, Senator Root's argument has not been answered. Certainly it is no answer to assert that Senator Lorimer struggled up from poverty and was a good friend to Irish and Hebrew Democrats.

CHILDREN AFFECTED.

BY MOTHER'S FOOD AND DRINK.

Many babies have been launched into life with constitutions weakened by disease taken in with their mothers' milk. Mothers cannot be too careful as to the food they use while nursing their babies.

The experience of a Kansas City mother is a case in point:

"I was a great coffee drinker from a child, and thought I could not do without it. But I found at last it was doing me harm. For years I had been troubled with dizziness, spots before my eyes and pain in my heart, to which was added, two years later, a chronic sour stomach.

"The baby was born 7 months ago, and almost from the beginning, it, too, suffered from sour stomach. She was taking it from me!

"In my distress I consulted a friend of more experience and she told me to quit coffee, that coffee did not make good milk. I have since ascertained that it really dries up the milk.

"So, I quit coffee and tried tea and at last cocoa. But they did not agree with me. Then I turned to Postum with the happiest results. It proved to be the very thing I needed. It not only agreed perfectly with the baby and myself, but it increased the flow of milk.

"My husband then quit coffee and used Postum and quickly got well of the dyspepsia, with which he had been troubled. I no longer suffer from the dizziness, blind spells, pain in my heart or sour stomach.

"Now we all drink Postum from my husband to my seven months' old baby. It has proved to be the best hot drink we have ever used. We would not give up Postum for the best coffee we ever drank."

oughly the religious spirit into education throughout the country. They called together in Chicago probably the most representative assembly of educators that ever met to consider this subject, and organized the Religious Education Association along lines similar to those of the National Education Association. The eighth annual convention of this body, was held recently in Providence, R. I. The subject was "Religious Education and the American Home." The discussion was of an exceptionally high order and the attendance and interest were good.

It is apparent that the temperance situation in 1911 is going to be describable again by the old war cry, "Go in anywhere; there is good fighting all along the line." The submission of a prohibition amendment in Texas and the resubmission of the prohibition section of the constitution in Maine will make those two States the special centers of action. The temperance forces will be on the aggressive in the South and on the defensive in the North, but there is the best reason to hope for victory on both wings, for it is plain that the temperance folks are not asleep in either State. The foes of the saloon would not have invited the fight in Maine, but a good round victory there will stop the mouths of a host of people who are always telling us that prohibition is a failure in Maine, so in the end there will doubtless be reason enough to thank the Maine Legislature for putting the issue up to the people again.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Truths, by E. B. Lowry, M. D. Publishers, Forbes & Co., Chicago, Ill. Price, $0.50.

This little volume attempts to do for boys what "Confidences" does for girls. It is a straight-forward, modest talk about the sexual life of a boy; and is the best thing on the subject that has yet come to our notice.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ALLEN JAY

Completed a short time before his death

Contains a most interesting history of the Society of Friends for over fifty years, together with many personal incidents and sketches of most of the prominent men and women who have been active in any important movement in the Church during that eventful period. Allen Jay traveled more extensively and personally knew more Friends than any other man of his time. He had a part in almost every religious and educational movement connected with Friends for the past fifty years. No other man could have written such a story of the life of the Society.

In telling the story of his career, Allen Jay touches on many interesting subjects. Among them are the following:

The Millerites and Spiritualists; Friends in Indiana; Anti-Slavery Separation in Indiana Yearly Meeting; Friends in Maryland, North Carolina and Tennessee; The Baltimore Association; Visits and Work in Great Britain and Norway; The Five Years' Meeting; California Yearly Meeting; Guilford, Earlham and Whittier Colleges; Work in Oregon and Washington, etc.

Over 400 pages, sizes 5½ x 8½ inches, 16 full page illustrations, well printed on good paper, handsomely bound in cloth.

A CALIFORNIA PARADOX

Peculiar Feature of the Lindsay Orange District

Strange to say, in the immense area devoted to orange growing about Lindsay, Tulare County, California, the fruit ripens six weeks earlier than it does 250 miles southward, in the vicinity of Los Angeles.

The climatic conditions causing this early ripening of fruit, also give immunity from the scale pest, thus giving to the grower the earliest and best market, and relieving him from the expense of fumigating. These conditions, with plenty of water and low-priced lands make Lindsay the supremely inviting field for the orange grower.

Olives here grow to perfection, and their production is a close second to that of oranges. It is estimated that 1,200 acres will be planted to olives in this district this year.

Grapes and all deciduous fruits do equally well, while alfalfa raising and dairying are important industries.

A Friends meeting has been established in this fruitful section, with Charles White as pastor, and there is good promise of a steady increase in its membership.

Friends or others wishing further information may address Robert Meredith, Lindsay, Tulare County, California.

The Great Guest Comes

WHILE the cobbler mused, there passed his pane a beggar drenched by the driving rain; he called him in from the stony street and gave him shoes for his bruised feet. The beggar went, and there came a crone, her face with wrinkles of sorrow sown; a bundle of faggots bowed her back, and she was spent with the wrench and rack. He gave her his loaf and steadied her load as she took her way on the weary road. Then to his door came a little child, lost and afraid in the world so wild, in the big, dark world. Catching it up, he gave it the milk in the waiting cup, and led it home to its mother's arms, out of the reach of the world's alarms. The day went down in the crimson west, and with it the hope of the blessed Guest; and Conrad sighed as the world turned gray; "Why is it, Lord, that your feet delay? Did you forget that this was the day?" Then, soft, in the silence a voice was heard: "Lift up your heart, for I kept my word. Three times I came to your friendly door, three times my shadow was on your floor; I was the beggar with bruised feet; I was the woman you gave to eat; I was the child on the homeless street."

Give modern instances of good use of wealth.

What is your system of setting apart gifts to God?

Quote promises showing that the giver is blessed.

Money is like a sharp sword. The danger lies in the possibility of wounding with it our heart life. The use of money is not only to provide the necessities of existence, the pleasures and luxuries of life, but for the Christian it is the means of carrying happiness, comfort and even the Gospel into needy, destitute, and Christless lives.

* * *

There is an exhilaration in making money, in watching the pile grow. There is a joy in giving money compared with which the excitement of getting money pales into insignificance. "It is more blessed to give than to receive." No one knew this better than Jesus and yet where have we the record that He ever gave money, or that He had money to give? He gave that which is better than money, life. Many give their money instead of their life to the service of Christ. This is a dangerous use of money. It dwarfs the soul.

* * *

One splendid use that every Christian Endeavorer should make of his money is in the regular and systematic contribution toward the support of his own meeting, and the benevolent work, home and foreign, carried on by his yearly meeting. He will surely do this for he has pledged himself to support his Church in every way. Every way means every way, and refers to money as well as service, and giving as well as receiving. A genuine Christian experience is deep enough to reach the pocket book. If it fails to open the purse strings, it is superficial. The essence of Christianity is giving. A Christian who does not give is Christian only in name. Test your Christian experience by defining your feeling when the collector for home Church work or foreign missions visits you. Do you say, "O dear, what a nuisance this continual begging is," or "This is a real pleasure for me to share in the work of the Kingdom?" The mercury in the thermometer of your Christian life is down or up according to the way you inwardly answer this question. This is a better test of genuine Christianity than the test of emotion.

The dangers of money as hinted at or enumerated in the lesson passage in I Tim. 6: 17-19 are suggestive. Setting oneself above others—riches should not be the dividing line between men. Riches as an end in life—to the neglect of the Giver of all good. Neglect of good works up to the measure of their riches—we are stewards not owners of money; from him who has the most of this world's goods is expected the most activity in doing good. The process of accumulating money imperils generosity and sympathy; such men are in danger of thinking more of the money than they do of men. When a man becomes disturbed over unfavorable reports from the money market but reads indifferently of hundreds killed in a railroad accident or a mine disaster, the dangers in his life are apparent.

* * *

Some men distribute their money by will after death, other men wishing to fill their own lives full to overflowing with true joy dispense their gifts before they die, and sound the deeps of true happiness by seeing happiness come into their lives. Conspicuous examples may be seen in Mrs. Russell Sage, Miss Helen Gould, Mr. Andrew Carnegie and Dr. D. K. Pearsons. The habit of giving is as necessary to true living as the habit of saving. One may cultivate the plant of generosity as well on a small income as on a large one. Giving is a flower that blooms best in the garden of the heart. Charles Kingsley says "Prudence is a nasty little virtue."

The "Tenth Legion" is a body of young people within the United Society of Christian Endeavor who set apart a tenth of their income for the work of the Kingdom of Christ. Giving is a habit. It needs cultivation in youth. If neglected then it may never become a part of the life. Let every young disciple of Christ learn how to give as he learns how to pray, to read his Bible and to testify for his Master. Giving has a voice that often speaks louder than words. Giving often keeps words from sounding hollow, and fills the emptiness of mere phrases with the solidity and weight of reality. Money often speaks a deeper and more tangible sympathy than words.

Jesus had something emphatic to say about riches for He realized their danger to the best development of the soul life. Read these passages and ponder them carefully. Luke 6: 20, 24; 12: 13-21; Matt. 13: 22; 19: 23, 24. When riches become an end in life, the result is fatal to the soul. When they are used as a means to the larger end embodied in that phrase "rich toward God" they become a stepping stone of grace. How very hard it is to securely place one's feet on this stepping stone and not be crushed beneath it, history, personal observation and the words of Jesus amply illustrate.

HONEST CONFESSION.

A DOCTOR'S TALK ON FOOD.

There are no fairer set of men on earth than the doctors, and when they find they have been in error they are usually apt to make honest and manly admission of the fact.

A case in point is that of a practitioner, one of the good old school, who lives in Texas. His plain, unvarnished tale needs no dressing up:

"I had always had an intense prejudice, which I can now see was unwarrantable and unreasonable, against all muchly advertised foods. Hence, I never read a line of the many 'ads' of Grape-Nuts, nor tested the food till last winter.

"While in Corpus Christi for my health, and visiting my youngest son, who has four of the ruddiest, healthiest little boys I ever saw, I ate my first dish of Grape-Nuts food for supper with my little grandsons.

"I became exceedingly fond of it and have eaten a package of it every week since, and find it a delicious, refreshing and strengthening food, leaving no ill effects whatever, causing no eructations (with which I was formerly much troubled), no sense of fullness, nausea, nor distress of stomach in any way.

"There is no other food that agrees with me so well, or sits as lightly or pleasantly upon my stomach as this does.

"I am stronger and more active since I began the use of Grape-Nuts than I have been for 10 years, and am no longer troubled with nausea and indigestion." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The Fact of Vicarious Suffering

It is always well in dealing with some momentous truth of religion—especially a truth about which controversy has raged—to ask ourselves what facts of experience there are which bear witness to and verify this truth. There is, I believe, nothing more original and central in Christian faith and teaching than the truth that patient love, forgiving grace, suffering, sacrifice and self-giving is Christ's way of redemption. The Cross has in all ages of the Church been the supreme symbol of our religion, and all the conquering apostles have proclaimed it to be the power of God in the conflict with sin. What facts of experience are there which help us to appreciate this kind of conquering power?

My answer is that life is crowded with facts which establish the reality and power of vicarious suffering. Life is so blood-red with suffering for others that it is hardly a figure of speech to declare, in the words of Revelation, slightly adapted, that the "Lamb has always been making war against the beast." No good person can come into a world like ours without suffering because of the sins of others. There are no sin-tight compartments. There is no way of confining the effects of sin to the narrow area of the sinner himself. A man commits his sin and goes his way and possibly forgets it, but others, known and unknown to the sinner, live in an atmosphere tainted by that sin, and perhaps suffer much more because of it than ever the doer of it suffered. To fling a sin out into human society carries more complicated results than to pull up a floodgate in a mountain reservoir, for the damage in the former case may go on accumulating for uncounted generations. It is, thus, an unescapable fact that sin makes—always makes—innocent persons suffer.

But there is a deeper fact. Innocent sufferers, when they suffer out of love, actually do work redemption. One of the most striking cases of it in religious history is found in the voluntary sufferings of the prophet Jeremiah. He saw, as clearly as he saw the Western sunset, that the wicked and sinful course of the responsible people of Jerusalem meant the near destruction of the city and the collapse of the nation. He saw it, and agonized over it: "My anguish, my anguish, my heart makes a noise within me; I cannot hold my peace, because thou hast heard, O my soul, the sound of the trumpet and the alarm of war! * * * O that my head were great waters and my eyes fountains that my tears might run night and day for the daughter of Jerusalem." But the clearer he saw the doom and the louder he called to the people to repent and save the nation, the more he was hounded and persecuted. Like one of his great successors in the prophetic mission, "he was killed all the day long," and for many long years. At last, with his city gone, the temple in ashes, the people scattered, himself an exile, divided from the main group of the exiles, he died, apparently beaten and defeated. Nevertheless, his service, his suffering and his defeated life, consecrated to save the people he loved, probably more than any other one influence rallied together a remnant of the exiles, made them see the value of his powerful message, helped them to realize the mission of suffering, gave the suggestion for that amazing forecast of the perfect, divine Sufferer, drawn in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and prepared a little spiritualized Israel within Israel, ready for the larger mission of the nation, as presented in the sixtieth chapter of Isaiah: "Arise, shine; for thy light has come and the glory of the Lord has risen upon thee."

There almost never was a good mother who has not some time suffered over the foolishness or wrongdoing of her child, and there almost never was a true father who did not have his moments of fear and sorrow over some beloved child floundering about in the green and unformed period of youth. If the child actually becomes wayward and stubbornly sinful, then the parents pass through as bitter sorrow and grief as it is possible to know. It is one that sins, but many that suffer, and the persistent love of father and mother, the love that will not let go, the love that endures and suffers and pursues, is, more often than any other influence, the one which works the change in the misguided youth. There is no one of my readers who cannot remember, with me, with a swelling of emotion in the throat, how the love and patience of some good soul reached him when he was on the perilous edge and drew him to a safer course of life. But we never know, we never can know, how much suffering we have cost those who love us—a suffering which is clearly vicarious.

The Cross, then, is no irrational method of redeeming men from sin. Christ took a world-old method and glorified it forever. The love that loves everlastingly and that ceaselessly pursues the wanderer, even at the cost of deepest agony of suffering, is like the love we know, only here we see it as the very heart of our infinite Father, and we discover that the highest and divinest way of redemption is the simple, familiar way which we learned as children in our father's house and by our mother's knee.

Retiring Allowances for College Professors

The principle of giving college professors a retiring allowance is generally recognized as sound and just, and the sooner it becomes a fixed policy, the better it will be not only for those directly interested, but for our educational system generally. It is therefore gratifying to find Haverford College taking a leading part in the movement.

In the general scramble for a share in the Carnegie Foundation, the deeper purpose of its donor has been very generally overlooked. Dr. Prichett, therefore, takes occasion to say in his recent annual report that "the Foundation has only hoped to establish the system in a sufficient number of institutions to make the principle of it an accepted part of the American system of education." He records with gratification the fact that the trustees of Haverford College have provided a system of retiring allowances within the college, upon the same basis as that obtaining in the Carnegie Foundation. In commenting on the matter, the New York Evening Post says:

It must be a satisfaction to everyone to find a college preferring to continue on its own lines—in this instance, the requirement that the trustees of Haverford shall be members of the Society of Friends was the point at issue—rather than waive its traditions for the sake of being relieved of part of the need of caring for its own teaching staff. Brown University has taken a similar decision, and is engaged in an effort to raise the funds necessary for the establishment of a pension system of its own.

A New Peace Society in Japan

A meeting of far-reaching significance was that recently held in Yokohama, when the American citizens residing in Japan organized a peace society. The gathering was thoroughly representative, including the American ambassador at Tokyo, Thomas O'Brien; representatives of the diplomatic and consular bodies; representatives of the churches, of missionary and educational institutions, and heads of American business houses, as well as many women. Gilbert L. Bowles, our missionary at Tokyo, was made secretary of the permanent organization. While the society was organized for the purpose of keeping the Japanese public correctly informed concerning international affairs, especially such as relate to peace, the immediate concern of this particular gathering seemed to be to allay the suspicion that there is any unfriendly feeling entertained in either Japan or the United States towards the other country.

Resolutions were adopted expressing the opinion that the people of Japan have at all times entertained the most friendly and cordial sentiments towards the Government and people of the United States, and that there is not to be found in the Japanese Empire any wish or thought other than to maintain the most friendly relations, and pledging the society to do its best to give publicity to the sentiments expressed.

A Teaching Campaign Needed

That the American public is far from accepting the peace principles of Friends has been forcibly demonstrated by the recent move for the fortification of the Panama Canal. The sundry civil bill which was passed on Seventh-day includes an appropriation of $3,000,000 for this purpose. While $3,000,000 will not go far towards fortifying the Panama Canal, it is, however, enough to inaugurate a policy diametrically opposed to neutralization, which, if carried out, will call for large additional appropriations.

More discouraging than the passing of the appropriation is the support which the bill has received from a large number of professing Christians. Bishop Walden, of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Cincinnati, is quoted as saying: "I am a kind of peace man. It was for peace that Christ came into the world; but you got to take things as they are, and it looks like an unprotected and unfortified Panama Canal would be almost an invitation to attack." Another clergyman in the same conference remarked: "It will not do to sit supinely idle and declare, 'God takes care of fools and the United States.'" We are loth to regard as typical this exhibition of ignorance concerning the International Convention, forbidding the bombardment of unfortified places, and this total disregard of the protection afforded by neutralization, but it does make us realize that there is yet a great work for Friends to do in educating public opinion.

Closing Days of Congress

By constitutional requirement, the Sixty-first Congress terminated on Seventh-day. A number of important measures failed to pass, and both Houses adjourned in unprecedented confusion. An extra session was immediately called by President Taft to meet on Fourth month 4th.

The constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of Senators failed to receive the required two-thirds majority in the upper House, the vote being 54 to 33. That the measure should have such strong support in the Senate, however, indicates that the time is not far distant when it will be submitted to the people for their decision.

Senator Lorimer was allowed to keep his seat, although there seems no doubt that his election was secured through bribery. The vote in his behalf stood 46 to 40; and while he escaped expulsion, he cannot claim to have been vindicated. Ten of the men who supported him are now on the retired list. All the lawyers of the Senate who have large reputations at the bar—with the exception of Senator Bailey—voted against him.

Due credit should be given the Senate for defeating the Sulloway Pension Bill, which would have increased the budget of war pensions $45,000,000 or $50,000,000.

Among the important measures which failed to reach a vote were a reapportionment bill fixing the number of Representatives at 433; the measure subsidizing ocean mail steamers; the proposed increased postage on advertising pages in magazines; the measure providing for a permanent tariff board; and the Canadian Reciprocity Bill.

The Sixty-first Congress

The Sixty-first Congress opened with a special session which resulted in the passing of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, with its maximum and minimum features, its corporation tax provision and its customs court. The resolution providing for an income tax amendment to the Constitution was also part of its work.

To the first regular session must be credited the establishment of postal savings banks; the enabling act for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico to statehood; the creation of a court of commerce and important amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act; conservation legislation, including authorization of withdrawal of public lands to preserve water sites, and authorization of the issue of $20,000,000 in bonds for completing irrigation projects; legislation designed to suppress the "white slave trade"; and publicity of campaign contributions in the election of members of the House.

The short session accomplished but little; probably the most important constructive action was the ratification of the new treaty with Japan. Among other bills passed were a measure providing for forestry reserve in the southern Appalachian and White Mountains, another for the inspection of boilers on locomotives, and a third for the purchase or erection of embassies, legations and consular buildings abroad. A small appropriation was made for investigating the mail service relative to postage rates.

A New French Ministry

Premier Briand and his cabinet resigned last week after a strenuous administration of a year and a half. The two principal reasons for the premier's downfall were his rigorous policy in suppressing the recent labor strikes and his leniency towards religious orders. Both these policies, which were evidently dictated by experience, alienated from him the socialistic parties with which he was originally affiliated. Their constant obstructions made his work intolerable. He declared that he was weary of the whole affair, and proposed to take a rest.

Senator Antoine Monis has been called to take Briand's place, and a new cabinet has been organized, practically every member of which is experienced in public affairs, and is considered well qualified for the work assigned. M. Monis is a lawyer, and since 1891 has occupied a position of considerable authority in the Senate. Since 1900 he has been vice-president of that body. In politics has been vice-president of that body.

Revising the Decalogue

A committee of the Anglican Church is revising the decalogue for use in their liturgy. This seems to have occasioned some alarm, as though it were an attempt to reconstruct the "word of God." Nothing of this sort is intended. They are merely reducing the Commandments to their original terms. Comments by The Congregationalist are to the point:

Omitting reasons and specifications which have been attached to them in the process of time does not lessen their authority. For example, in the different versions of the law written on the tables of stone, different reasons are given for observing the fourth Commandment. The reason mentioned in the version of Exodus 20 is that God made the world in six days and rested the seventh day. The reason given in the version of Deut. 5 is that God brought the Israelites out of Egypt, where they had to work all the seven days, and they were to remember his deliverance by resting the seventh day. In the version which Moses was commanded to write in Exodus 34: 17-27, which was perhaps the earliest, no reason is attached to this Commandment. In Exodus 31: 12-17, the reason attached was that it was to be the sign of a perpetual covenant between Jehovah and His people, while it was enlarged by the sentence, "Whosoever doeth any work on the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death." This would hardly be an appropriate command to be repeated in the churches now. The second, fourth and tenth Commandments will not lose force by being separated from sayings which have accrued to them.

The English Bible

BY W. O. TRUEBLOOD.

The Printing Press and the New Learning.

After the Wycliffe version, there was no other translation for a hundred years. However, the intervening years were not fruitless, for the work which Wycliffe had done was acting as leaven, and was not to stop until every "plow boy should have the Scriptures." During this interval, Johann Gutenberg, a German boy from the town of Metz, invented the printing press. This new invention was destined to make it easy for the common people to possess the Scriptures in their own tongue. It is said that about 1450 the Latin Bible was printed, being the first book ever printed.

Also, during the intervening years, the revival of Greek learning was spreading over Europe. Before this time, Hebrew and Greek were practically unknown to western Europe. Now there was a passion for possessing the store of riches which had been locked up within these languages. The "new learning" furnished the key to the storehouses. The first and richest treasure which scholars found was the Old and New Testaments in their original languages. Before this the translator was confined to the Latin version, but now a new field for English translation was opened.

William Tyndale.

In the year 1483, William Tyndale was born. By disposition and character and scholarship he was especially qualified to enter the field as a translator of the Scriptures. Tyndale began his literary study of the New Testament under the distinguished Greek scholar, Erasmus, using the Greek Testament just completed from a comparison of some ancient manuscripts. His literary interest soon passed into an intense desire to know more of God's revelation to man. "His heart burned within him as he mused." He was at last consumed with a passion to pass on his new-found treasure to the vast multitude who had never seen it.

The bitterness against Wycliffe and his attempt to give the people the Bible in their own tongue was not dead. Naturally Tyndale soon became the focus of the contempt and hatred that had burned the body of his distinguished predecessor. But he had the blood of a martyr flowing in his veins, and was never daunted. A priest contemptuously told him one day that "we had better be without God's laws than the Pope's." To which statement Tyndale cried, "I defy the Pope and all his laws; and if God spare me, I will one day make the boy that drives the plow in England to know more of the Scriptures than the Pope does."

The declaration was deeper than a mere statement. He meant to make it true, and forthwith began his work of translation. He found no help or encouragement among the priests. A London merchant received him kindly, and in his house he prosecuted his task for nearly a year. Soon the enmity of the ecclesiastics of the city made it clear to Tyndale that London was no safe place for the work. He says: "I perceived that * * * in all England there was no room for attempting a translation of the Scriptures."

In 1524 he left England for Hamburg, where, amid dangers and poverty, he worked so faithfully that in one year the translation of the New Testament was ready for the printer's hands. He moved to Cologne for the printing of his New Testament. The printing progressed secretly for a time, when, through wine, the printer divulged the secret to a priest, who immediately determined to destroy the copy. Being apprised of this, Tyndale seized his copy and escaped to Worms, where, about 1526, there was printed for the first time a complete New Testament in English. It was an epoch-making achievement for the Bible. Copies came from the press rapidly and, in spite of threats, found their way into England. In cases, in bales of cloth and sacks of flour, many copies got into the hands of the English people. The vigilance of the priests could avail little against the inflow of God's Word. Many copies were seized by the clergy and publicly burned as "a burnt offering most pleasing to Almighty God." Such a public display of opposition only increased the desire of the people to read the Bible; other copies followed, until the tide became too great to resist. It was soon evident that the priests must get back of the English translation itself and seize and silence the one who was responsible for its publication. At last, through treachery of the most villainous sort, Tyndale was betrayed into the hands of his enemies. On Friday, Tenth month 6, 1536, he was strangled at the stake and then burned to ashes. As he died he prayed: "Lord, open the king of England's eyes." The prayer was to be answered much sooner than even the most sanguine could have hoped, for within three years the Bible was sent forth to priest and people with the full approval of the king of England.

Tyndale's Translation.

It is exceedingly difficult for us to conceive of the hardship which Tyndale endured; but harder still is it to comprehend the difficult task he had to properly translate the Scriptures from older languages and express the thought in English that is both true to the spirit of the text and at the same time flows with that ease and beauty for which his translation is noted. But he was a man of God, inspired for his supreme work. He came to his task filled with the Spirit that breathes through the entire Scriptures. He was a man with clean hands and a pure heart. We are not surprised, then, that he embodies the Scripture truth in such pure and simple language that little improvement has been made on it even to this present day. "The peculiar genius," says Froude, "which breathes through the English Bible, the mingled tenderness and majesty, the Saxon simplicity, the grandeur unequaled, unap-proached in the attempted improvement of modern scholars, all are here, and bear the impress of the mind of one man, and that man, William Tyndale."

It must be borne in mind that Tyndale did not have access to the well-nigh perfect manuscripts that have been used largely in recent Bible revision. He had access in his work of translation to the Vulgate and other Latin versions, some Greek and Hebrew manuscripts, and perhaps to Luther's German translation.

The New Testament received most of his attention (only parts of the Old Testament were translated by him). Revision after revision was made, until he brought forth the well-nigh perfect translation, which became the guide of all subsequent scholars.

There are some expressions in the Tyndale Version that sound quite unusual after we have become so accustomed to the Authorized Version. The following renderings will show that a few improvements have been made on the version of the distinguished translator:

Genesis 39:2. "And the Lord was with Joseph and he was a luckie felowe."

Matthew 26:30. "When they had said grace."

Mark 6:27. "He sent forthe the hangman."

Revelation 1:10. "I was in the Sprete on a Sondag."

Matthew 27:62. "The daye that foloweth Good Fridaye."

Acts 14:13. "Brought oxen and garlandes to the churche porche."

Hebrews 12:2. "Who for one breakfast sold his birthright."

Matthew 4:24. "Holden of divers diseases and gripinges."

Matthew 6:7. "When ye pray, bable not moche."

Luke 20:9. "He lett it forthe to fermers."

The Little Old Chair

BY EMMA KATHERINE MACY.

It sits in our chimney corner, the little old chair. Do you wonder why I give place to anything so homely and unattractive? The rockers are gone, and so it stands prim and straight, with no air of sociability or friendliness. Its paint has well-nigh vanished, and the split bottom is in many places doubly split. But for all its homeliness, it is stanch and strong, for it was no factory product made to sell, but was hand-wrought, and a gift of love.

Sometimes as I look at the little old chair the years fade away and I seem to see the little girl that sat therein—a little girl with golden-brown curls and a broad, fair forehead. The hands that hold the sampler, or perhaps father's wristbands, which she is stitching, are also fair and tender; for when the little girl is through her stint and can go out for her playtime, the sunbonnet is securely tied over the brown curls and the long half-handers are drawn well up over the plump arms; for the mothers and grandmothers of that day would have been horrified at the tan we strive so hard to acquire. Although the surroundings are plain and simple, there is something patrician about the little girl; the clear eyes, the straight nose, the long, tapering fingers all speak of it. And why not? Did not the blood of the Fitzgeralds, the Chancellors, the Padgetts and the Wroes flow through her veins? And was she not a native of Virginia, the land of Presidents? And was not the home of the great John Marshall across the valley, and did she not count the tall chimneys every time they crossed the clear place in the mountain road?

We wonder of what she is thinking, as she lifts her eyes from the sampler and gazes at the far-away crest of the Blue Ridge. Was it of how black the waters of the Shenandoah looked the other night when father was bringing her home from grandfather's, and how, when they reached the ford and he saw how high was the water, he opened the saddlebags and took out his great bandana handkerchief and tied her fast behind him, so that she could not slip even if she was too frightened to hold on? It may be she is remembering her visit to Lord Fairfax's plantation, and how she walked over the same ground that her countryman, the great George Washington, surveyed when he was a young man. Or more likely she is thinking of how cross Master Samuel Simpson looked the other day when she missed that word in the dictionary spelling-class. Many things there are the little girl may be thinking of as she sits and muses in the little chair; for the elders sometimes drop vague hints of impending perils that the slave trade may bring to this land, and her mother's anxious face makes her wonder the more. But children did not ask questions and demand answers as they do now, so there is nothing to do but keep on wondering.

After a while the father's long cherished desire to bring up his family in a free State becomes a possibility, and the little girl and the little chair, with the rest of the family and a few household necessities, are packed in the wagons, and the journey is begun. They say good-bye to the Blue Ridge with its towering pines, the old fields where she has gathered chestnuts and huckleberriss so often, and the beautiful Shenandoah upon whose banks she was born, and turn their faces westward. There were 18 in the company of three families.

What a wonderful journey that was! What fun the children had around the campfires! How good the ham and beaten biscuit tasted! What a wonderful road that was, the great National Road, then the main highway from the East to the West! What joy to listen to the coach horn, echoing among the hills, warning the people that the great coach was approaching and demanding the right of way. Then to watch the coach come dashing past—what a royal way to travel that must be! Once they passed a company on horseback wearing wide-brimmed hats, and someone told the little girl they were people called Quakers. Little did she then know how her life was to be woven and interwoven with the people of this faith.

At one camping-place the little chair was forgotten, and four miles had been traveled before it was missed. But the little chair had been a gift of love, and father would ride back for it. He found it there, but not alone, for two little neighboring children had also discovered it. One was sitting in it and the other as near to it as possible. I wonder if there was as much grief to them in surrendering the newly-found treasure as there was joy to the little girl in regaining it?

At last the delightful journey was ended; the wagons stopped in a fertile Ohio valley. The years were kind to the little girl. After a while, when the country became more populated and the land increased in value, thrifty young farmers sold their farms and sought to better themselves in Indiana. Again the little girl, a little girl no longer, and the little old chair—which must not be left behind, because it was a gift, a gift of love—with him who was her heart's chosen, left friends and home and kindred, and took up the journey again, over the same highway, to central Indiana, which was to be her home henceforth. Here the trials and hardships of pioneer life must be met and conquered. Five children came to sit in the little old chair and call the little girl, mother. Two, with golden curls like her own, tarried but a little while, and then went out into the everlasting sunshine. Her heart was full of sadness for their loss, but her hands were full of work, and that brought partial solace.

She did no great or wonderful things, this little girl. Fame never found her. Riches never crowned her. She laid no claim to wisdom or goodness. She fed the hungry that came to her door. She mothered the orphan. She did the homely, commonplace task without complaint. Riches or poverty made no difference in her estimate of character. She met all with the same warm handshake, the same rare smile. She felt the pain in the lives of others, and gave sympathy out of her abundance. Late in life, when her heart was rent by a great sorrow, she simply leaned a little more heavily on the Everlasting Arms, and gave cheer to those about her. Young and old, little children and learned men, found joy in her comradeship.

A year ago the little girl fell asleep. There was no fear of the dark, only a great peace. The hair was no longer golden, but lay in shining waves like spun glass above the smooth brow. The hands, strangely idle now—for the sampler and the wristband and the patchwork were laid aside—held nothing within their cold fingers but one white rosebud and a trailing spray of smilax. They are no longer fair and shapely, but drawn and discolored by age. But to us for whom they have so long ministered they are most beautiful. It is good to think of their well-earned rest. It is good to know that the long waiting is ended, the journey finished, the home reached. Nevertheless, when I look at the little old chair, and its crowd of memories come surging over me, I feel the sore heartache of the motherless.

A Letter from Alix

DEAR CHILDREN:—As you walk through the woods, you may have noticed how the young shoots spring up from the roots of the large trees, so that by the time the old trees fall, there are strong young ones to take their places.

Now the children of the meeting are like those young shoots. If we are to have a Society of Friends in the next generation, you will be the ones to carry it on, and so you should fully understand the principles upon which it is founded.

In common with all other orthodox churches, we hold the doctrine that the "Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." Since "He died for the sins of the whole world," our sins were among those He bore, and when, with grateful love, we claim the pardon He has bought for us, we become His children.

Is it not a beautiful thought that He has done it all, and that what we have to do is only to accept it and trust Him for the strength to live pure, true lives?

When we get this thought in our hearts, one no longer feels that it is a hard duty to come to meeting. The very name means that it is a meeting-place with Him who loves us and who has said, "When two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them." When we think of this, the very silence becomes sweet to us, for we know that He is near us.

In the early days, those who belonged to the Society of Friends had to bear much persecution. Frequently their meetings were broken up and the worshipers thrown into jail. There is an account given us that after a meeting-house had been thus closed, the children of the Friends who had been carried off to prison met the following Sabbath day and held a meeting upon its steps. These were brave boys and girls, were they not?

I wonder if those of the present day would be as true to their principles. As you sit in your quiet meetings, week by week, let your hearts praise the dear Lord who now has made it so easy to worship Him in the way we feel to be right, and ask your Heavenly Father to make you faithful and true to the testimonies that our earthly fathers in the past suffered so much to preserve.

"Freely ye have received
All things from God;
Freely give such as ye have
To anyone in need."

In the Country

There is a charm about country life in China that reminds one of the early days before machinery and science reduced farming to a high art in our homeland.

There is something most restful and peaceful about the country homes, especially of the well-to-do. When called out to visit the sick in these homes, I have often said: "If ever I get worn out, take me out to one of these farm homes for a month's rest."

The better farmhouses are brick and covered with tile; but they are mostly made of mud and thatched. Out in front there is a threshing ground, as level and clean as a dirt floor can be made. This is often surrounded by trees. Then there is usually a pond, with ducks and snow-white geese. About the door are the domestic animals, domesticated to a degree of docility that we seldom see in America—dogs, cats, pigs, hens, donkeys, oxen and, most docile of all, the water buffalo—sometimes a little baby donkey or buffalo so bewitching you can scarcely pass them by without caressing them. Often a grist mill or a hand mill, such as is mentioned in Matt. 24:41, adds interest to the scene. There are no barns. Straw, stacked neatly, affords shelter for the animals, although in bad weather they are taken into the house.

One often sees beds prepared for servants in the same room with the cattle. The animals, especially the water buffalo, are cared for with attention approaching devotion. One often sees a man sitting before one of these immense animals, selecting and forming into wisps the straw and patiently feeding the animal.

Only one thing mars the picture. It is the fact that the household are without God. They live in fear—fear of robbers, fear of famine, fear of ghosts, fear of death—ignorant of aught beyond the limits of the homestead.

When the Kingdom of Heaven comes to China, these fertile fields will become the garden of the Lord, and these ignorant but patient and thrifty people His faithful servants.—Friends Oriental News.

Dr. Stephen T. Birdsall

In the death of Dr. Stephen T. Birdsall, which occurred at his home in Glens Falls, N. Y., First month 27, 1911, the Church, not only locally, but throughout the country, has sustained an irreparable loss. Dr. Birdsall was born at Newburgh, N. Y., Twelfth month 15, 1845. He came of a family long associated with the active interests of the Church. He inherited not only his right as a member, but the training of a cultured Quaker home and a love and loyalty for the Church of his fathers. In early manhood he studied medicine, and at the age of twenty-four he began the practice of his profession in the city of New York. In the year 1874 he located his home and office at the corner of Bedford and Lafayette Avenues, Brooklyn, and in 1884 he removed with his family to Glens Falls, N. Y., where he was identified with interests of the Church of the city until the time of his death. For several years Dr. Birdsall was president of the Board of Education of the city, and his work for the educational interests of his community in that capacity was valuable and highly appreciated. At the time of his death he was a member of the city Board of Health, and had been for some years prior thereto. He was one of the founders of the Young Men's Christian Association of the city, was a charter member, a member of the first Board of Directors of the association, and was elected to a place on that board each succeeding year to the time of his death. He was a trustee of the Glens Falls Academy and vice-president of the board, and was a trustee of the Home for Aged Women. His interest in educational matters was not confined to his city, but extended throughout the yearly meeting, and for years he was a trustee of the yearly meeting boarding-school. His efficient work in behalf of the interests of the Church was recognized throughout the yearly meeting, and there were few members of the yearly meeting whose counsel was more generally sought and followed. His interest in his local meeting at Glens Falls was deep and constant. At the time of his death he was a member of the Board of Trustees of the meeting, an elder and overseer, one of the clerks of the monthly meeting and chairman of its finance committee, and clerk of the quarterly meeting on ministry and oversight.

Dr. Birdsall endeared himself to young and old by his kindly interest and by his keen insight. His wide knowledge of men and affairs made his counsel of rare value and his judgment accurate. In all religious, philanthropic and educational matters affecting not only his Church, but the community, his interest was deep and his participation active and highly valued, and his financial support always ready. He has left an example of loyalty, faith and of earnest purpose, and of a noble Christian character. May God give to those who feel his death most keenly, grace to emulate his example and to continue the work which was so near his heart.

Some Views on Present Day Topics

Should a Church Have a Declaration of Faith?

BY LUKE WOODARD.

My late article (see AMERICAN FRIEND of First month 5th) on "Creed or Declaration of Faith—Is There a Difference?" elicited a very respectful notice in a subsequent issue of the same paper by a correspondent signing himself "Constant Reader." He, however, proceeds to state his objection to "any written formula." This seems to open the way for me to respond to his intimation that I should have gone further, and I therefore do so by offering a few observations on the affirmative side of this question.

Every organization necessarily has as its basis certain distinctive principles, written, or otherwise clearly understood, to which those who voluntarily join such organization give their assent. On such a basis the various churches are founded. This is well expressed in what is known as the "Uniform Discipline," page 35: "A Christian denomination is an organization composed of those who hold similar views of the teachings of the Holy Scriptures, and maintain practices based upon these teachings, and who voluntarily [italics my own] associate themselves for joint participation in worship and mutual help, and for united efforts in the promotion of truth and righteousness. The denomination of Friends is such a body." It is further stated in that discipline, page 50: "The Scriptures are the only divinely authorized record of the doctrines which we are bound as Christians to accept and of the moral principles which are to regulate our actions. No one can be required to believe, as an article of faith, any doctrine which is not contained in them."

"Constant Reader" urges "the impossibility of stating spiritual truth in words that will convey the same meaning to everyone" as a serious objection to any written formula. How is the case altered when the Scriptures are made the only creed? It is a well-known fact that spiritual truth stated in the words contained in the Bible is not understood alike by everyone.

As a consequence of this diversity of understanding, denominational classification has resulted, where such as do agree in their interpretation of Scripture voluntarily associate themselves together in an organized capacity. As no coercive means are used to acquire or retain members, there is no ground for any to complain of "forced submission to written formulas or creeds." Such attempts were made in the days of the thumb-screw, the dungeon, the fagot and the rack, but no Protestant church now compels submission to its creed, written or unwritten, or closes the door against a peaceable withdrawal on the part of a member who no longer feels that his conscience will allow him to be bound by the church's rules or doctrines.

Reference is made to "the great Baptist communion, which for more than two hundred years has had no written formula which must be subscribed to." But it is a well-known fact that they have an unwritten formula to which those who join them must assent and conform. They must be baptized after their particular mode.

If other churches claim that they have no creed but the Scriptures, the Friends church can equally well claim that we have none authorized by the church that is not Scriptural, for what has already been quoted in this paper is an axiom in our church, viz.: "No one can be required to believe, as an article of faith, any doctrine that is not contained in the Scriptures."

Our "Declaration of Faith" is but a grouping and arranging in convenient form the Scriptural truths which we as an organized church acknowledge as our belief. This will be seen to be the case on examination of the one adopted by the Richmond Conference, in 1887, and now incorporated in the Uniform Discipline of the American yearly meetings. It abounds in Scripture quotations and citations. It is neither ambiguous nor misty, but simple enough to be understood by anyone of common intelligence, and one can hardly avoid the conclusion that a refusal to assent to it and to its adoption by the church arises not from a difficulty of understanding it, but from a dissent from some of its statements of doctrine.

I have referred to the difference in Scripture interpretation on the part of the different churches. Too much is often made of this. Between the evangelical churches the points of agreement are far more than the points of difference. On all the great fundamental doctrines they are substantially agreed.

This point is well expressed by Benjamin Seeborn, an English Friend and minister of note. What is here inserted is found in the "Life of Stephen Grellet,"* of which he was the compiler. Speaking of the early Friends, he says: "In common with the other orthodox professors of the Christian name, they most fully recognized the divine inspiration and authority of the holy Scriptures, and thoroughly believed in all that is revealed therein concerning the unity of the Godhead—the Father, Son and Holy Ghost—one God over all, blessed forever. They unhesitatingly held the utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the fall; the pre-existence and incarnation of the Son of God; the proper, eternal deity and the real manhood of the Lord Jesus Christ; the need and efficacy of His propitiatory sacrifice as an atonement or expiation for the sins of mankind; His mediatorial intercession and reign; the forgiveness and reconciliation of the repenting sinner through faith in Him alone; the work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion of the sinner and in the preservation, guidance and sanctification of the believer in Jesus; the immortality of the soul; the resurrection and final judgment of the world by Jesus Christ; the eternal blessedness of the righteous, and the eternal punishment of the wicked. In reference to these things, William Penn, in the full maturity of his judgment and the brightest period of his Christian experience, had explicitly declared: 'Where we are vulgarly apprehended to differ most, we dissent least. I mean in doctrine. For, except the wording of some of the articles of faith in school terms, there are very few of those professed by the Church of England to which we do not heartily assent. I say, then, that where we are supposed to differ most, we differ least. * * * We plainly and entirely believe the truths contained in the Apostles' Creed, which is very comprehensive as well as ancient."

The foregoing statements by Benjamin Seeborn of the doctrine held by Friends are in language so plain and simple and so clearly Scriptural that differing interpretations on the plea that it is "impossible to state spiritual truth in words which will convey the same meaning to everyone" are hardly within the range of probability.

While it may be admitted that there are in "the epistles of Paul and other Scriptures," as Peter says (II Peter 3:15, 16), "some things hard to be understood," such as what is said concerning the man of sin, or anti-Christ, and the visions of John, Ezekiel and Daniel, yet these enigmatical portions form no part of the creeds of the Protestant churches, certainly not that adopted by the Friends church, and should not therefore be urged as an objection to such written formula. The same may be said concerning "words whose meaning has changed." I find no obsolete words in the Richmond Declaration of Faith.

Bangor Quarterly Meeting was held at Marshalltown, Iowa, the 24th to 26th ult. President David M. Edwards, of Penn College, was acceptably present. Aaron Napier, of Ames, preached a strong sermon on Seventh-day. Zeno H. Doan, New Providence, delivered a missionary address. There was a good attendance at all the sessions.

* * *

Kokomo Quarterly Meeting was held at Kokomo, Ind., the 24th and 25th ult. All of the six monthly meetings were well represented.

The chief service in each session was by J. Walter Malone, Cleveland, Ohio.

A loving message was read from David Tatum.

Vincent D. Nicholson, field agent of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, who for the past seven months has been working in Indiana, Western, Wilmington, North Carolina and New York Yearly Meetings, is at present in Iowa. During the course of his work he has canvassed 135 particular meetings and has presented THE AMERICAN FRIEND at 26 public meetings.

The Chapman-Alexander mission, in Brooklyn, N. Y., closed the 28th ult. The Brooklyn Friends were very active in the campaign. On the closing day a luncheon was served, attended by about 175 ministers, 3 of whom were Friends—Robert Pretlow, Richard R. Newby and William J. Sayers. In addition to J. Wilbur Chapman and Chas. M. Alexander, several of the leading ministers of the city spoke, among them Dr. Pretlow, who was frequently interrupted by applause.

In the triangular debate held by Penn, Parsons and Leander Clark Colleges, Penn won both contests in which she was engaged. The question was as follows: "Resolved that the power of the Federal Government should be paramount to that of the States in the Conservation of Natural Resources." Lloyd Mendenhall, Carey Macy and Jay Newlin represented Penn against Leander Clark, while Cecil R. Peckham, Linneus McCracken and Jens Jensen defended the negative side of the question against Parsons.

Meade A. Kelsey, Berkeley, Cal., has been for some weeks with his mother, Sarah Kelsey, who is quite ill, at Newberg, Oregon. He has also been attending his father, Asa Kelsey, who underwent a surgical operation in Portland, Oregon, but who it is hoped will soon be able to return home. Owing to these conditions, Meade A. Kelsey is serving as pastor in the Newberg meeting, while Abijah J. Weaver, the regular pastor, has gone to Berkeley until such time as Meade A. Kelsey shall feel free to leave his parents.

William G. Hubbard, who has been doing pastoral work in the meeting at Goldsboro, N. C., has also found time to make several extended trips during the year for the American Railway Literary Union, of which he is General Superintendent and Treasurer. Through his efforts several objectionable books have been removed from railroad news stands, and trains on the Southern, the Illinois Central, and the Great Northern Western Railways. He investigated the literature on 12 railway systems during the year.

It is a very realistic picture which the Friends Oriental News presents of the iniquities of opium importation into China. A paragraph in the current number says: "The cultivation of the poppy plant has almost ceased. The consumption of opium has greatly decreased, and all licenses permitting the use of opium expire in the Sixth month of the coming year. But there remains still an obstruction in which China is not the sole dictator, and that is that Great Britain can, in accordance with the treaty of 1907, continue as she now does to send thousands of chests of opium annually into China from India, and this she may do until 1917 unless she can be entreated to forego her treaty rights in this matter. The Chinese are asking England to unite with them in nullifying the treaty and to desist from sending further shipments."

Friendswood Quarterly Meeting was recently held at League City, Texas. There were nine visiting and eight local ministers present, making it seem almost like a yearly meeting. Rachel Thomas, Indiana, spoke at length in the opening meeting Seventh-day, and several others followed with brief messages. This being the first quarterly meeting after its establishment in Eleventh month, there were several committees and superintendents to appoint. The quarterly meeting is now fully organized for work. Robert C. Smith, from Sterling Quarterly Meeting, Kansas, took a leading part in the meeting on First-day. He continued holding evangelistic services at League City after the quarterly meeting closed.

The late Susanna Edwards was born in Barnesville, Ohio, and removed with her parents to Henry County, Indiana, when seven years old. She was married in 1838 to David Edwards, who, in his ninety-seventh year, survives her. This remarkable union of over seventy-two years covered a period of wonderful development, beginning in strictly pioneer days. She was a birthright member of the Society of Friends, and was acknowledged as a minister in 1865 by Spiceland meeting. Hers was a sublime faith, and by precept and example she led many souls to see the light. Her children to the third and fourth generation rise up and call her blessed, and gratefully acknowledge the inspiration of her simple, Christlike life.

Nathan T. and Esther G. Frame recently conducted a series of revival meetings at Vermilion Grove, Ill. Although the weather was unfavorable and an epidemic of la grippe was prevalent, the attendance was good, and interest increased as the meetings progressed. The students and faculty of Vermilion Grove Academy were especially blessed. Thirty odd publicly professed conversion during the meetings. Since the meetings closed the membership seems more closely knit together in a loving bond of fellowship than ever before, and the faculty at the academy has organized a Bible class.

Franklin and Mary Moon Meredith are pastors in Vermilion Grove Meeting and heartily co-operated in the revival.

Nathan T. and Esther G. Frame went to Kirksville, Mo., from Vermilion Grove and are now taking a much-needed rest, both having suffered from la grippe. Esther is taking treatment from an osteopath physician. They expect to be with Friends in Indiana and Ohio in the near future.

Many Friends will sympathize with Wm. T. and Bertha P. Dixon in the loss of their little daughter, so soon after going to the mission field. The obituary appears in another column. Bertha Dixon is a daughter of Wm. P. Pinkham, Huntington Park, Cal., who writes concerning his little granddaughter:

"After a short illness this precious child left the earthly circle which her presence had gladdened, and went to dwell with her Saviour. The frail body, still beautiful in death, was placed in a small hillside cemetery owned by native Chinese Christians, six miles from Canton. The parents, strangers in a strange land, and as yet with few acquaintances who could sympathize with them in this new sorrow, have been favored with such evidences of the presence and care of God as strengthen faith and hope and love, making heaven seem nearer and Christ dearer than ever before. Never does the Lord become more precious to His trusting children than in the moments of their deepest trials."

The new register of alumnae and former students of Bryn Mawr College, up to the first of this year, contains interesting statistics. The total number of students who have attended Bryn Mawr College now amounts to 2,724; 1,099 of these are alumnae of the college; 200 students have held fellowships and 28 of these have held both European and resident fellowships. The table of present occupations of the alumnae shows that 28 per cent. of the alumnae are teaching; 28.4 per cent. are married; 25.6 per cent. are unmarried and have no paid occupation; a small proportion remains of physicians, lawyers, private secretaries, students of art or music, engaged in philanthropy, engaged in college administration as deans, registrars, wardens of college halls, etc. Among the occupations in which only one student is engaged are bookkeeper, photographer, medical missionary, editor, bacteriologist, jeweler, government clerk, newspaper correspondent, farmer, book reviewer, student of architecture, etc. In the table of marriages by classes we find that in at least three classes the percentage of students married is 50 per cent. or over and in seven classes the number married is over 40 per cent. This is an unusually high percentage for classes of students which have graduated since 1889.

The announcement in another column of the decease of Asa Nordyke, formerly of New Vienna, Ohio, will carry with it a tender interest to a large circle of friends who knew him and honored this humble minded and devoted servant of God through his long life of over ninety-three years.

He belongs to that noble band of Friends of a former generation, who by their simple lives, upright walk, and daily ministrations of love and mercy so conspicuously adorned the doctrine they professed, and so many of whom, both in its spiritual and physical sense, realized the fulfilment of the Scripture promises, "with long life will I satisfy him and show him my salvation."

In 1889, Asa Nordyke, removed from Ohio to Whittier, Cal., where he resided for seventeen years. Three years ago he went to the home of his son, E. M. Nordyke, in Inyo County, Cal., and here, having been faithful in his stewardship, he joyfully awaited his Master's coming in the quiet of the surrounding mountains, whose snowy peaks seemed consonant with his evening meditations on higher things. His surviving children are Mary and E. M. Nordyke, who tenderly cared for him in his last days. Their mother, who passed away some twenty years ago, was a sister of the late Jonathan Bailey, one of the founders of Whittier.

A recent number of The Earlhamite contains a short sketch of Clarence M. Case. After speaking of his early life and training, it tells of his work at Moses Brown School, Providence, and of his graduate study at Brown University, and continues: "During the summer months while in the East, Mr. Case had charge of religious meetings in a Boys' Camp in Maine, being employed as superintendent of the camp which position he still holds. * * * At present, in the Oskaloosa Y. M. C. A., he is conducting with much success a high school boys' Wednesday dinner class, at which the various problems confronting high school boys are discussed. He also has charge of a young men's Bible class in Penn College, now studying the social significance of the teachings of Jesus. Mr. Case's work in Iowa is just begun, as he laid down his duties at Moses Brown School only last spring to accept the chair of history and sociology at Penn College. Economics, sociology, and modern social problems have always appealed strongly to him and he has for a number of years devoted much time to investigation and study along these lines."

Falmouth Quarterly Meeting held at Lewiston, Maine, First month 28th, was a season of Divine favor.

Charles M. Woodman, a minister of the quarterly meeting preached Seventh-day P. M. On First-day, Linwood W. Jones, of Vassalboro Quarterly Meeting and Albert Smith of Fairfield Quarterly Meeting spoke in the meeting for worship. Falmouth Monthly Meeting was granted the privilege of holding their monthly meeting on Sixth-day evening instead of Fifth-day evening as heretofore and a committee was appointed to take into consideration the advisability of holding the quarterly meeting at Oak St., Portland, in First month instead of Lewiston as now held.

Mary D. Goddard, who will be one hundred and one years old the 10th inst., was re-appointed elder of Durham Monthly Meeting. She frequently attends meeting and speaks briefly by way of testimony.

Charles W. Webber, a member of Durham Monthly Meeting, recently declined re-appointment as Clerk of the meeting, having served in that capacity forty years, and having probably signed more certificates for Friends traveling in the ministry than any Friend living, as at one time Durham Monthly Meeting had 13 ministers.

Jennie E. Reynolds, Superintendent of Gospel Work for Falmouth Quarterly Meeting, is assisting the pastor of China Monthly Meeting in holding revival services at South China, Maine.

East Whittier Meeting, Cal., is having a most prosperous year under the pastoral care of W. Mahlon Perry and his wife. The addition of 18 new members at the last monthly meeting has already been noted. The past week was one of social activity. Third-day evening the regular monthly social of the Christian Endeavor Society was held at the home of O. L. Baldwin. It being Valentine Day, the decorations, games, etc., were fitted to the occasion. Thirty-three were present and the evening was enjoyed by all. At the close of the evening light refreshments were served.

On the same evening at the home of C. Calwell, Mattie Ware's Bible School class of boys spent a happy evening together. One of the rules of this class is that at their socials the members having the poorest attendance record are to furnish refreshments for those having the best record. The device is very successful in its results as shown by the regular attendance of the class.

The regular business meeting and social of the Loyal Circle, composed of the members of the two adult Bible classes occurred on Fifth-day evening, the 17th. There were 64 present and a very enjoyable evening was spent by all. After the business meeting a very interesting program was given by different members of the circle, consisting of songs, recitations and a Round Table conducted by Mr. Bruley. During the social hour which followed, sandwiches, cake and chocolate were served.

H. V. Tormohlen, Portland, Ind., has been discussing "Marriage Among the Early Members of the Society of Friends in Indiana" in the last two numbers of a local church paper, The Silent Evangelist. After calling attention to the special provisions made for Friends in the Indiana law, and quoting at length from Clarkson's "Quakerism," the author concludes: "The exception for members of the Society of Friends from procuring a marriage license comes down from the earliest history of the State, and indeed it may be found in the laws of the Northwest Territory in 1787, when the territory north and west of the Ohio River was first set apart from Virginia. The wording of the provision has been changed but little during all this time, although the territory was subdivided into smaller territories, and then Indian Territory was made into a State and her laws changed and revised many times. With the adoption of the code and the new Constitution, it took its present form, and may be found in the old Revised Statutes of 1812, page 361, in force May 6, 1853. It reads: 'Before a person, except members of the Society of Friends, shall be joined in marriage, they shall procure a license from the clerk of the circuit court of the county in which the female resides, directed to any person empowered by law to solemnize marriages, and authorizing him to join together the persons therein named as husband and wife.' And is found in Burn's Revised Statutes of 1908, Section 3262. Quite recently attorneys have declared it to be good law, so that members of the Society may still avail themselves of the opportunity to unite themselves in marriage according to the customs of the Church if they so wish to do."

A new Friends meeting has been started at Vale, South Dakota, a pioneer community in sight of the Black Hills. The land has recently been taken by settlers with a prospect of the Government's irrigating the valley. At present these settlers are living in "shacks" and the community is quite primitive. Susan B. Sisson, Iowa, went to the valley last Eleventh month to make her home with her son, Stephen C. Berry, who has been in the employ of the Government on the survey. She immediately began holding meetings on First-day in a schoolhouse, and it was not long before the little house was entirely inadequate to take care of the people who wished to attend. A large Bible school and Christian Endeavor Society have been organized, and a strong cottage prayer-meeting is being conducted.

The change in the valley is wonderful: Old feuds have been settled; men have given up profanity and tobacco and Sabbath desecration, and the young people their dancing and card-playing.

Late in First month steps were taken by the Christian Endeavor Society to raise funds for the erection of a meeting-house. A suitable location was found, and the cornerstone laid Second month 14th. The lumber is being hauled, and the building will be erected during the coming month. All the labor will be donated; $600 has been subscribed, but the building when completed will cost about $1,500. The promoters feel that they are greatly in need of financial assistance from outside. They hope to be able to turn the money into some other good cause later, when their lands are made productive by irrigation; but just at present they need help to provide a meeting-house adequate for their demands.

Anyone interested in the matter should send their donation or correspond with Stephen C. Berry, the chairman of the Building Committee, Vale, So. Dak. Two other denominations are offering to advance the money, but the people prefer that Friends should hold the field. They expect to unite with the Society and organize themselves into a monthly meeting within a few weeks.

Probably few persons have such a volume of accurate information concerning the work of Friends in Indiana sixty years or more ago, and of their pioneer experiences in Kansas, as that which Wm. H. Coffin, Pasadena, Cal., has preserved in written or printed form, or is able to recall with surprising readiness from the archives of memory. He is able to recount events of the visits of John Allen and Josiah Foster at the home of his father in Indiana in 1845, with features of their gospel work in America at an important period in the history of our Society. He has on file a correspondence with these eminent English Friends, carried on after he removed to Kansas, ante-dating and during the Civil War, in which they treat the events of those stirring times in a manner intensely interesting.

Of equal interest are Wm. H. Coffin's reminiscences of the visit of Robert Lindsay, England, in his own and other meetings in Kansas in those pioneer days. In assisting this English minister in his local travels he used a conveyance drawn by a yoke of oxen, which he had trained to such docility that he could guide them from the seat of the vehicle, and they seldom failed to reach appointments on schedule time.

The late Benajiah Hiatt, brother-in-law of Wm. H. Coffin, assisted Robert Lindsay in his more extended travels in Kansas, and at the end of one journey of over a hundred miles they were hospitably received by a family of Friends late in the evening at their one-room claim shack on those prairies of "magnificent distances." The prospect of lodging accommodation here presented in contrast with those of the palatial homes of England to which he had been accustomed, evidently struck the itinerant minister with a sense of dismay. But this was quickly dispersed when he was assigned to the one comfortable bed in the apartment, and his companion and the household found lodging in wagons or under the starry canopy of the summer night. The pursuit of the English Friend's ministerial concern seemed to suffer no deflection from these pioneer experiences, and was accomplished "to the peace of mind" of all concerned.

Wm. H. Coffin, while shut in by illness during the past weeks, has at intervals been reviewing some portions of his Quaker lore, and it was the writer's good fortune to find him thus engaged as an opportunity to get a rehearsal of some of its salient features.

THOMPSON.—At South China, Maine, Twelfth month 17, 1910, to Percy A. and Mary Thompson, a daughter, Bernice Hope.

Died

BIRDSALL.—At his home in Glens Falls, N. Y., First month 27, 1911, Dr. Stephen T. Birdsall, aged sixty-five years.

BOICE.—At Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Second month 19, 1911, Priscilla Boice, aged almost ninety-one years. She was an elder of Poughkeepsie Meeting and for thirty years clerk of Nine Partners Quarterly Meeting.

DIXON.—In Canton, China, First month 17, 1911, Gertrude, daughter of William Taylor and Bertha Pinkham Dixon, aged nearly three years.

EDWARDS.—At the home of her daughter, Lida Saint, Newcastle, Ind., Second month 20, 1911, Susan Edwards, in the ninety-sixth year of her age. The deceased was a birthright Friend, and since 1865 a recognized minister.

JACOB.—In Philadelphia, First month 5, 1911, Isaac J. Jacob, 3d, son of Joshua and Catharine Jacob (the former deceased), aged thirty years. He was much interested in Bible school work and actively engaged in work at the Joseph Sturge Mission for Colored People.

NORDYKE.—Near Independence, Inyo County, Cal., First month 24, 1911, Asa Nordyke, in his ninety-fourth year. An esteemed member of Whittier meeting.

PHELPS.—At Thurlow, Ontario, First month 20, 1911, Eliza M. Phelps, widow of the late Alfred Phelps, in her seventy-seventh year. Her parents, William and Eliza Mullett, were among the pioneers in that section of Canada, coming from England early in the year 1821. Her life was spent quietly amid rural occupations, yet exercising an influence for good in the home and throughout the community, which all who knew her remember with gratitude and favor.

LESSON XII.

THIRD MONTH 19, 1911

DEFEAT THROUGH DRUNKENNESS.

I KINGS 20:12-21.

GOLDEN TEXT.—It is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes strong drink. Prov. 31:4.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Third month 13th. Defeat through drunkenness. I Kings 20:12-21.

Third-day. Wine not for kings. Prov. 31:1-9.

Fourth-day. Into captivity. Isa. 5:1-23.

Fifth-day. Staggering with drink. Isa. 28:1-13.

Sixth-day. Wine takes away the heart. Hos. 4:6-19.

Seventh-day. The Nazarites. Amos 2:6-16.

First-day. Wine in bowls. Amos 6:1-6.

Time.—It is not possible to give dates with any degree of certainty. Ahab reigned from 882 to 861 B. C. (or 925 to 904). The incident of the lesson probably belongs to the period not long before the translation of Elijah.

Place.—In the neighborhood of the city of Samaria.

Rulers.—Over Israel: Ahab and Jezebel; over Judah, probably Jehoshaphat; over Syria: Benhadad II. This Benhadad was probably the successor of the Benhadad mentioned in chapter 15:18.

Parallel passages.—None.

In the resumé by Josephus and in the Septuagint, the events of chapter 20, are put after the account of Naboth's vineyard. This would seem a rather better order, but as Ahab's history is not told chronologically, it is not possible to speak definitely.

There are three kings of Damascus called Benhadad: the one of the present lesson; the one named in chapter 17; and the one named in II Kings chapter 13. It is not easy to identify these names with those of secular history. The whole of chapter 20 should be read.

The Syrian King proclaimed war against Ahab and invaded the kingdom of Israel. Ahab, apparently hopeless of success in the open field against this great opposing force, shut himself up in the city of Samaria, which, as has been seen, was well situated for defence. Benhadad invested the city and settled down to a siege. The great power at this time was Assyria, and she cast longing eyes upon Syria, including Palestine. The wise policy would have been for Benhadad, Israel, and Judah to have entered into an alliance against their common foe, instead of quarrelling among themselves and coveting each other's possessions. The result of this policy was seen later in the complete overthrow of Israel.

Ahab seems to have been the vassal of the Syrian King. The message which the closely invested king sent to his foe must not be understood literally. The language is in accordance with Oriental exaggeration and is analogous to the expressions used by the Japanese, for instance, at the present day. The passage (verse 4) simply means that Ahab is ready to acknowledge Benhadad as his over-lord, pay tribute and give large presents. Benhadad, however, demands an unconditional surrender. By the advice of his counsellors Ahab refuses, though he expresses himself willing to carry out his first offer. Benhadad scornfully refuses, and Ahab retorts by using, what seems to be a proverbial expression equivalent to, "Let not him that beginneth a work boast until it is finished."

12. Ahab's message reached Benhadad when he was feasting with his officers, probably in anticipation of his expected victory and spoil. "The Kings." The word is equivalent to prince, or petty ruler. George Fox in his Journal speaks of "the Indian Emperor and his Kings" in Maryland. Compare Josh. 12:9-24. "Pavilions." The same word translated sometimes as "tabernacle," as in the "Feast of Tabernacles." "Set yourself in array." In the original only the one word "set" is used, and so the order may mean either putting the military engines in place so they could be used against the walls; or, it may mean get the men ready to make an assault. The Revisers put the latter into the text, and the former into the margin; either is as correct as the other.

13. "And behold a prophet came near." To Ahab and his company all seemed on the verge of destruction, but encouragement came most unexpectedly. The lesson is that there is One who controls all things, and it does not do to leave Him out of your calculations. The prophet is unannounced, but his words are striking. As if to emphasize his message, he points to the investing hosts—"Thus saith the Lord;" "Hast thou seen all this great multitude? I will deliver it into thine hand this day." "Thou shalt know that I am the Lord." Know that Jehovah is the God of Israel.

14. Ahab, naturally, questions as to how this will come to pass. It seemed too strange to believe. The young men of the princes of the provinces. Possibly officers analogous to those mentioned in Kings 4:1-20.

15. Ahab's forces seem absurdly small compared with those of Benhadad.

16. "At noon." In the heat of the day. A time when it was the custom to rest. The Israelites, therefore, surprised the Syrians. "But Benhadad was drinking." Neither he nor anyone of his chiefs was in a condition to appreciate their situation, or to give orders.

17, 18. Benhadad probably thought that it was an embassy to sue for better terms. Whether they came for peace or war they were to be seized, for he was sure that he had Ahab and his city within his grasp.

19, 20. Well led, sober, active, fearless, the small body of the Israelites falling upon the leaderless, unprepared host of Syrians, threw them into a panic, and the defeat soon became a complete rout. The Syrian King had a narrow escape from capture, while his army suffered a terrible slaughter. Had not Benhadad been drunk it is scarcely possible that he would have suffered such disaster.

Alcohol destroys clear thought, good judgment, ability to meet crises. It clouds the brain and saps the strength. History, past and present, is full of examples. Yet men will drink and young men begin to drink in spite of example. Much has been done in the cause of temperance; it is stronger than it has ever been, but much remains to do. It is needful not only to conquer, but to hold conquests.

NEW YORK'S GREAT PENNSYLVANIA STATION.

One of the greatest works of modern times was the construction of the concrete-lined steel tubes under the Hudson and East Rivers, the tunneling of Manhattan Island, and the erection of the magnificent Pennsylvania Station at Seventh Avenue and Thirty-second Street, New York, bringing the through trains of the Pennsylvania Railroad into the heart of New York City.

An illustrated booklet describing this great work, and telling what it means to the New York passenger, has been issued by the Pennsylvania Railroad and will be sent postpaid to any address by George W. Boyd, General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, Pa., on receipt of a two-cent stamp. Send for it.

Wave and Tide

On the far reef the breakers
Recoil in shattered foam,
Yet still the sea behind them
Urges its forces home;
Its chant of triumph surges
Through all the thunderous din—
The wave may break in failure,
But the tide is sure to win!

The reef is strong and cruel;
Upon its jagged wall
One wave—a score—a hundred,
Broken and beaten fall;
Yet in defeat they conquer,
The sea comes flooding in—
Wave upon wave is routed,
But the tide is sure to win!

O mighty sea! thy message
In clanging spray is cast;
Within God's plan of progress
It matters not at last
How wide the shores of evil,
How strong the reefs of sin—
The wave may be defeated,
But the tide is sure to win!

Tell about mission work in logging-camps.

What has been done to provide churches in the West?

Mention some signs of success in mission work.

Missions in the United States (West) are intended to cover the large field of home missions in the logging and mining camps, in the newly settled portions of the country where churches cannot as yet be self-supporting, and among the Indians. As the work of the Society of Friends is almost exclusively among the Indians, we use our space this week in a brief statement about that work. Pamphlets (10 cents each) on Immigration and the Evangelization of the Great West and the Indians have been published by the United Society of Christian Endeavor. "Black Rock," "Sky Pilot," and other stories, by Ralph Connor, give vivid portrayals of religious work in the wilds of our western country.

* * *

The work of Friends among the Indians is conducted by the Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs. Its chairman is Edward M. Wistar, 704 Provident Building, Philadelphia, Pa. Hetty B. Garrett, Greene and Coulter Streets, Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., is clerk. The published minutes of this committee give a good account of the work the Society is doing for the Indians.

The Executive Committee consists of representatives from eleven Yearly Meetings.

* * *

The Indian Mission Stations conducted by Friends are fifteen in number. Three are in the State of Missouri; twelve are in Oklahoma. The work is in charge of twenty-three missionaries. Approximately $6,500 are spent yearly. The faithful persistent work of the missionaries shows itself in the following statement.

"Better houses are being built; more land is being cultivated; more inquiry is being made by the women as to improved methods of housekeeping and cooking; the marriage relation is being held more sacred. Indian men seem to be aspiring, and pressing out in various lines of business; much more interest seems apparent among different tribes in Bible study."

There are now in the United States about 250,000 Indians.

Four hundred years ago they were an independent, self-governed people, with laws respected throughout their territory, courageous, virtuous, heroic in endurance.

As to their religion, they evidently had some idea of a Supreme Being (or Great Spirit), and also a future life. Their forms of worship were most primitive, but without the degrading features of the religions of old Greece and Rome, or of modern India.

With their needful manufactures, their agricultural industries, and their fearless hardihood in hunting, they certainly were no ease-loving, luxurious, tropical dreamers, these North American Indians. Up to the time of the white men, theft and dissimulation were unknown among them, and cold water was their only drink.

* * *

At least twenty industrial training-schools, under government management, are in full operation, and they are all, in the fullest sense, home schools. They receive Indian youths from the reservations, often members of many different tribes meeting in the same school. They not only learn the English language and are well taught from books, but they are also taught practical life, and made to know and understand those things that belong to their success as bread-winners and American citizens. The schools are all farm schools, but their industries are not confined to the departments of agriculture.

Missionary work was begun with the Indians in 1581. The Friends started Indian missions in 1685. Many denominations are now engaged in this worthy enterprise.

The history of missions among the Indians has established very clearly that they are made of the same flesh and blood with the rest of us, having the same spiritual necessities, capabilities, and inclinations, and that they are susceptible to the same elevating influences of the Gospel as other races. When refined by education and ennobled by the Gospel, the native Red Man of the forest becomes a man worthy to associate with the proudest and noblest of the land.

* * *

In seven years of wild life 2,200 Dakotas cost the government nearly $200,000,000. In seven years as Christian Indians they cost less than $120,000. Hence, what it cost the government to feed, clothe, and kill them, as Indians, for one year, the Christian churches could take better care of them with, as Christians, for sixteen years.

News in Brief

The veto bill passed the British House of Commons on second reading, the 2d instant.

* * *

Dr. Aked has received a call from the First Congregational Church of San Francisco which leads The Springfield Republican to observe that the distinguished English clergyman, who came originally from Liverpool to New York, may preach his way, in time, around the world. From San Francisco he could perhaps go to Australia, thence to Cape Town and thence to England again. But he will nowhere find salaries higher than in America or a better opportunity to fight sin and perdition.

* * *

President Taft has appointed William H. Lewis, Boston, Mass., a negro, to be an Assistant Attorney General of the Department of Justice. This is the first time that a negro has been named for such a prominent position in the department. Lewis, who is at present an Assistant United States Attorney at Boston, is one of the best-known negro lawyers in the United States. He will succeed John G. Thompson, who resigned recently to take up private law practice in Danville, Ill. The place pays $5,000 a year.

* * *

The woman suffrage hearings before various State Legislatures this winter have been held under especially favorable auspices. The movement is unmistakably gathering strength. In the Western States there have been several notable triumphs, and in time the East will follow the West in this matter exactly as it is following the West in direct primary legislation. The recent suffrage hearing before a committee of the New York Legislature was the most largely attended, of any, within the memory of the oldest equal rights campaigner; and the hearing on Beacon Hill was no less notable.

* * *

The evidences of public indignation over the seating of Senator Lorimer are so widespread as to command special attention. Several State Legislatures have approved the votes of their Senators when cast against Lorimer, and there is a marked tendency in certain others to pass resolutions of censure upon Senators who voted for him. The Assembly of California has formally condemned Senators Perkins and Flint and an effort to censure Senator Curtis is being made in the Kansas House. In Illinois, religious and educational bodies are even attacking the venerable Senator Cullom on the ground that, in supporting Lorimer, he failed to uphold the honor of the State.

* * *

Chicago now has the best chance she has had in years to elect a Mayor who will be something more than a politician. The impressive victory of Charles E. Merriam for the Republican nomination over four competitors by a plurality of 25,000 is doubtless due in part to the failure of the party bosses to agree on a candidate against him, but this is only a favorable augury for him in the

How Shall We Safeguard the Truth?

There are many Friends who cannot yet understand the bold and fearless policy of freedom in thought and speech. Their way of safeguarding truth is to allow only what they consider "truth" the privilege of uttering itself. Only one side of a question may ever be presented. The other side is "error" and it is to be rigidly suppressed. This method reminds one of the famous policy of the Persian king, referred to in the book of Esther: "None might enter within the king's gate clothed with sackcloth." This king was eager to have a life of undisturbed peace and joy. He did not wish ever to be reminded of pain and death and sorrow. Inside his domain he drew a sharp line beyond which no sign of grief and trouble might show itself. He could enjoy his beautiful palace-life unmolested, for he never heard of tears nor ever saw any marks of mourning. How beautiful and sweet such a world must be to live in!

Yes, but it wasn't the real world; it was only an artificial world, and those palace-dwellers were both shallow and selfish and forever unable to deal effectively with humanity as it really is, for they were shut away from the actual tug and strain of life, with its mingling of joy and sorrow, its triumphs and tragedies. He who would seriously think of helping and saving men must take down his artificial wall and look on life as it is.

The same thing is true in dealing with truth. You cannot save it or keep it by building an artificial fence about it and by refusing to see or hear any other side. The people inside their hedge are not in the real world where issues are being settled. They are in an artificial world and are purchasing peace by refusing to look at the real world in which their fellows are fighting and are winning their truth in a hand-to-hand battle with error. I love the truth as much as anybody does; I hate error with as much earnestness as anybody does. But I can never bring myself to the Ahasuerus method of settling the difficulty—by proclaiming that inside my fence, truth is corraled and error may not enter nor show its face. I prefer, of course, the peace of green valleys and still waters, where struggle and striving are absent, but the life I really get and have always had to put up with has hard hills and dark valleys in it, and I have learned to find my truth—my soul's food—"in the presence of enemies" who make me strive for it and battle for it like a man. And I have learned gradually to love my enemies, because they force me to examine my truth and to dig deeper and to face all the issues and look on all the sides. If you can do that and still have your "cup run over," it is a satisfaction which Ahasuerus could never feel.

We have always worked out this policy in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, often to the surprise and regret of those of our readers who have been trained in the guarded and timid method. First one side protests: "How can you print such error?" and then someone who gloried in the first article protests in turn when an article appears on the other tack: "How can you let your readers see such shameless error?" We have generally been able to learn something from both articles, and very likely have detected some error in both, but by thinking round the subject and seeing it from divergent points of views, we have been able to think a little farther and to make progress toward the truth. This method takes patience and restraint. As one learns to enjoy the world, even though sackcloth is present in it, so one must learn to hold his truth and his faith in the face of militant situations and to discover the new light which comes to our old truths when somebody assaults them. What we want is not to train up a timid group of believers, living behind artificial fences, ignorant of the intellectual problems of our fellows, but a virile Church with a solid grip on truth, won in the face of error and powerful to hold its own in the issues of life where men think and struggle.

Observations on Our Pastoral and Evangelistic Work

A Friend who has broadened his appreciation of our Society by extended travel and residence within the limits of at least two yearly meetings, one east and one west of the Alleghenies, has expressed a few candid opinions in a private letter, parts of which we take the liberty of reproducing. Writing from his home in a western yearly meeting, where he grew up and was educated, he says:

I have learned to love the Eastern Quaker for his reality, his quiet, lovable, even-tempered, honest, unpretentious ways. Often I have thought that the loud, erratic, changeable character who speaks lightly of him would ever do well to follow his example.

While sometimes I have felt that the East lacked in evangelistic energy, yet it is plain to be seen that the West is suffering from an overdose. The evangelism, such as it is, tends to detract from the more substantial pastoral work. In the revival, which must come once or twice a year, the evangelist, a stranger to the meeting, wins the hearts of the people to himself as well as to the Master by a temporary and unnatural fascination, which leaves the pastor, who has to take care of the work, a kind of second choice. And yet the pastor, who goes into the homes and into the hearts and lives of the people, who mingles in the wedding festivities and ministers to the sick, who is acquainted with the particular needs of every individual member, who knows how to speak the loving word of encouragement, of comfort and of hope, who knows how to lead the children into that better way, and how to teach the adults of the deeper things of God, this is the man that is building up the Church and filling the need of the hour.

I am sure that the problem of the East is the problem of the West, but, judging from results thus far attained, it is yet unsolved.

I am glad I have always been a Friend, and can say God speed the great body of united Friends who are working and praying and hoping and planning for that better day that is already dawning upon us. I see no great mountain of difficulty which may not be surmounted, no barrier reef that may not be avoided. What we need is that quiet evangelism which the Saviour was ever engaged in, "Taking one here and another there," and every man working his own field. We need a teaching ministry as well as an awakening ministry. "What does it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul," or what does it profit if we gain a man for the moment and do not hold him for Christ and the Church.

Some have judged our evangelism by the number of converts counted at revivals, and our pastoral work by the number of new members retained. Is this a fair comparison? May not our lack of ability to hold new converts be attributed to the way they are won quite as legitimately as to the way they are cared for? Is not there something lacking in the evangelism that awakens a soul in such a way that it becomes next to impossible for it to merge readily into the workaday life of the Church? Our correspondent at least seems to think so, and the issue is worthy of serious consideration.

An Unsolved Problem

To another correspondent the present situation in our Society presents a number of perplexing features yet unsolved. To quote with some abbreviations:

We Friends are a queer lot. We profess to want more ministers, and will not open the way for those we have.

Meetings get tired of ministers and push them out, and so it goes. It seems to me that about the most undesirable position in our Church is that of pastor in almost any meeting. Here in ——— is an instance. ——— ——— has served the meeting for some years, and now the members feel that he will not do any longer. He wants to preach, but there seems to be no place for him to exercise his gift, and yet there is an utter dearth of ministry in our meetings. ——— is a splendid fellow and a fine pastor, but not a great preacher, and the meeting wants a man who can catch the public ear. I know of several young Friends who give evidence of having a gift in the ministry, but there is no opening for them. If they go into business, as several have in the past, that will absorb their time and thought and they will not develop their gift—although they may make useful members. Most of our young men who under the old regime would have made ministers and supported themselves besides, now readily find places in the Y. M. C. A., where they do splendid work.

If a person is a minister now, he must be ready to preach when he is expected to and when he is called upon, and for this, leisure from other business is imperative. I know one man, who is a principal of a graded school, earning his living by teaching, who goes somewhere to preach almost every First-day. He is wearing himself out, and he is one of the best ministers we have.

It is our unsolved problem, and for my part, I cannot see the solution.

Since we have so few good speakers, such as the meeting at ——— desires for a pastor, we question the right of particular meetings to monopolize their talents. Why might they not be allowed to exercise their gifts in a larger field with possibly two or more covering the same territory, leaving distinctly pastoral work to a local committee or pastor? Then depend upon the devotional, educational, missionary, social, philanthropic and various other activities of each particular meeting to make it an attractive center and a power in the neighborhood? Different parts of this plan are being used in various localities with sufficient success to warrant the conjecture that it might be successfully extended.

Military Manoeuvring

The most extensive movement of troops and war vessels ever executed in this country in time of peace was inaugurated last week, when the President ordered 20,000 troops to move to the Mexican border. Four armored cruisers in the Atlantic and most of the Pacific fleet are included in the "manœuvres." Since our relations with Mexico were generally considered satisfactory, considerable inquiry was naturally aroused as to the purpose of the order. At first the object was supposed to be the training of officers and men under service conditions, and practice in co-operation between land and naval forces. Another explanation more generally accepted is that it is a precautionary movement for the purpose of showing the disaffected elements in Mexico, and especially the insurgents, what might happen if they disturb American interests. Many are inclined to question the wisdom of the movement, and others hint at motives not yet revealed. It is understood that the State Department is not in sympathy with the affair, since it is likely to make future dealings with Mexico more difficult.

A Tribute to Homely Virtues

Ex-Governor Pennypacker, Pennsylvania, who is generally considered an authority on American history, declared before a recent meeting of Congregational ministers that the beginnings of freedom and religious toleration in this country did not emanate from their early forebears who settled New England, but from the Quakers in Pennsylvania and the Schwenkfelders, a small society not unlike the Friends, who emigrated to this country during colonial days and settled on the Schuylkill River within the limits of Penn's territory. An instructive feature of the ex-Governor's address was his tribute to their simple virtues. He told how, in a recent visit to their homes, he was impressed with the sweet, gentle faces of their women and the rugged manhood of their men. In their libraries he found rare volumes. In one home was an original issue of "Savonarola," bound in the year 1760. In another he found a catalog of Schwenkfelder's works, compiled in 1777. Commenting on the situation, he said: "Virtues don't come suddenly. They are a matter of training. The Schwenkfelder face suggests generations of men and women who have been cleanly, decent and self-restrained." With our fondness for innovation, it would be well for us to remember these words.

A New Secretary of the Interior

The first break in President Taft's original cabinet came last week, when Richard A. Ballinger resigned as Secretary of the Interior. No sooner had Ballinger assumed the duties of his office than he became an object of criticism on account of his conservation policy, which was not altogether in accord with that of the former administration. The opposition forces were led by Gifford Pinchot, for a time chief of the Forestry Bureau under Ballinger.

With the acceptance of Ballinger's resignation, President Taft named Walter L. Fisher, Chicago, as his successor. Fisher is a Pinchot disciple and a man of unquestionable character and ability.

Municipal Research Work

A Bureau of Municipal Research is a comparatively new feature in our civic life. It is a voluntary organization which employs a corps of experts to investigate conditions and keep in touch with the administration of the city government. It is not a political, religious or philanthropic organization, its purpose being to co-operate with the officials who are elected and with existing agencies in making their work more efficient. It is pre-eminently a bureau of expert information.

During the past week the Philadelphia bureau has been making sensational revelations concerning the prevalent use of short weights and measures by the retail dealers of the city. The bureau found a shortage in 70 per cent. of 500 purchases made; of 50 measures of groceries, 46 were short, the total deficiency being 13 per cent. Of 20 tests of meat, 14 were under weight, while 13 out of 15 loads of coal were short from 19 to 393 pounds.

In New Jersey towns where like tests were made, the situation was quite as startling. About two-thirds of the tests revealed false weight or measure.

Social Service and Its New Literature

An awakening along the line of social service is evidenced by what seem to be spontaneous and independent movements in several widely separated fields, and the current issue of the Survey devotes considerable space to a review of the new literature on the subject. A score of books and a number of magazine articles are cited in the review, most of which deal with city or urban situations. "The Problem of the Country Churches," by Prof. Butterfield, of the University of Chicago, and the investigation of country churches in Missouri by A. C. Zumbrunnen, are interesting exceptions.

Accompanying this movement of social life and literature within the churches are very significant inquiries into existing social conditions. The Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations are leading the way in making and publishing careful investigations of conditions affecting immigrants, our city populations, women in industry, men and boys employed on railways, mines, shops, lumber and construction camps, and in the army and navy.

Feast Days in Jerusalem

BY A. ROSENBERGER.

The Day of Atonement.

It may be of interest to the readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND to have a brief account of how the Hebrews in Jerusalem observe some of their ancient feasts in somewhat modified form. Sixty thousand, or two-thirds the entire population of the city, are Jews, and therefore they are strong enough to support many synagogues and, in a sense, give religious tone to society. They have the commercial interests in their hands and largely control the trade of the city. On Seventh-day every Jewish shop is closed, and on the Sabbath all are open. The Moslems observe Sixth-day; the Jews and Seventh-day Adventists, Seventh-day, and the Christians the regular Sabbath as generally accepted by the Christian Church in all lands.

On Tenth month 13th we were privileged to witness the great Day of Atonement as now observed in Jerusalem. The night before is the time of serious preparation, many of the faithful spending the whole night in prayer and tears. It is then that the sacrificial cock is killed and its blood poured out, typical of the shed blood that the promised and long and anxiously looked for Redeemer was, in the fulness of time, to pour out for the sins of the world. The cock is said to be chosen as the sacrifice bird from the fact that the name in Hebrew is somewhat like the word for burden-bearer, or, possibly, for sin-offering. Every house is expected to offer a cock, and because of the large number killed, in derision this is often spoken of as "the chicken feast."

From morning till evening the synagogues were crowded with people of serious demeanor, ranging in ages from stripling boys with ruddy countenances to trembling age hoary with years. The women, in galleries and alcoves, hidden from the men by screens, unobserved, could perform their devotions and look down upon the scenes transpiring in the main room below. Many of the men wore plush robes of gorgeous colors, red, saffron, yellow and blue being the favorites, judged by their predominance. The women were generally clad in white sheet-like robes, such as are common upon the streets of the city at all times, being worn by women of all religious creeds.

The services consisted largely of chanting the penitential Psalms, of lamentations for Israel's departed glory, and prayers for the return of the favor of their justly offended and indignant Jehovah. A gentleman who had resided some years in America, recognizing our nationality, brought up a book of services for the day with the Hebrew and English in parallel columns, and explained something of the nature of the service, interjecting between a complimentary remark about the homeland. On being asked if certain men with white capes thrown over their shoulders were priests, he replied, in a sad voice: "No; how could there be priests when there is no longer a High Priest to minister?"

By reference to the book in our hands, we found that they were lamenting the downfall of king and kingdom, the destruction of their beautiful temple and temple worship, the removal of their High Priest and the priesthood, the altars thrown down and the glory that long ago had departed through their transgressions against the Holy One of Israel. Long, loud and earnest were their prayers for the return of the divine favor, when Jehovah in mercy would again lift up the light of His countenance upon His chosen people, according to the promise made to Abraham and confirmed by everlasting covenant with Isaac and Jacob. The demonstrations reached their climax as those officially charged with the duty moved in solemn procession through the midst of the assembly, carrying the scroll of the law, and proceeded to place it in its sacred enclosure.

When the confessions were being made of the transgressions that were accountable for the withdrawal of the Shekinah from the Holy of Holies, for the destruction of the great temple itself and for the vanished glory, it was touching to hear the bitter wail of the pleading penitents and to see the eyes that were fountains of tears, as the voices of old and young alike were mingled in the sad refrain with sighs and groans. In some the sense of grief was unutterable and inexpressible except by beating the breast with closed hands and in striking the head against the wooden support in front.

Practically the same order of exercises occurred at the various synagogues in the city, differing somewhat according to the national temperament of the congregations. It seemed inexpressibly sad that with backward gaze they should behold in gloom their golden era forever gone when, with the forward look of faith, they might behold bright visions of the glorious Messianic reign even now far ascending toward the zenith, as foretold in the gorgeous imagery of their great statesman, poet and prophet, Isaiah.

The Harvest-home.

Their Feast of "Harvest-home" or Feast of Tabernacles or Feast of Ingathering is of a very different nature from that of the Atonement. The fields have yielded their harvests of golden grain to the reaper, as with joyful song he has plied with industrious hand his sickle of ancient pattern; the vineyards have given back their purple clusters as a reward to toil; the fig and olive orchards have added their beauties as tokens of nature's generosity; the red-cheeked pomegranates have come to give their relish to the daily bread; the almond tree's early bloom of snowy whiteness has given place to a fruitage of incomparable richness, and the flocks of sheep and goats, everyone bearing twins, and the herds of well-fed kine, with the stalled ox, have come, following the soft notes of the shepherd's flute or the owner's command, all evidences of the divine favor. Do not all these give promise of a year full of physical comforts, and bear witness that Jehovah is good to Israel? Is it not a day in which His people should acknowledge His goodness with songs of joy and gladness?

From ancient times it has been a Hebrew custom to come together thus annually, dwell in booths and spend a week in joy and happiness, giving utterance thereto in songs, accompanied by high-sounding instruments. The "Harvest-home" comes soon after the Day of Atonement, during which booths are erected throughout the Hebrew quarters of the city. Everywhere there are signs of joy and gladness upon the streets, in their homes and in the synagogues. Shops and counting-houses and places of business of every kind are closed, and old and young devote themselves to "let joy be unconfined." The quick, joyous music of the synagogue, accompanied by an occasional blast upon the ram's horn, is in striking contrast with the sad refrains and mournful lamentations of the great Day of Atonement, when all Israel is in "sackcloth and ashes" for their sins and transgressions. The joyful Psalms are used upon this occasion, in which the goodness and mercy of Jehovah are recounted, His beneficence sounded forth and His name exalted. One comes away from the synagogue feeling that God is good, His mercy everlasting, and that all the peoples should praise Him. Well may the Christians perpetuate in spirit the joyful feast of the "Harvest-home" and cultivate the disposition to offer thanksgiving and praise to the "memorial name" of Him who alone is the Giver of every good and perfect gift.

Sunday in Bournville, Cadbury Garden City

BY EDWARD HAROLD MARSH.

Even on a rainy Sunday in winter the garden suburb of Bournville cannot quite divest itself of its charm, nor can the rolling Worcestershire landscape beyond it. We had walked the five dreary miles of rain-washed road from Birmingham, meeting scarcely a soul, although it was 9 or 10 in the day, and it was a refreshment for the eye, if not exactly a desirable experience for the boots, to turn down Oaktree Lane and find a village settlement which, with its few hundred detached or semi-detached cottages, its eloquence of open spaces, its tree-lined roads, and its treasured plots where the children play, seemed to suggest that here, at any rate, the home was exalted above the factory. Birmingham itself, in some of its corners, has a way of conveying the reverse impression.

But our path winds to the little meeting-house at the crossroads—one of the prettiest meeting-houses of the Friends in this country. It is not the only one that we have passed on the way from Birmingham. There is a large one at Selly Oak, and another nearer the city. But the Bournville meeting-house is the most interesting. In exterior appearance it is like any modern village hall, without a suggestion of its religious purpose in its architecture. Within it is simple without being severe. There are flowers in the porch and on the little platform and on the table below. There are warm-looking curtained windows, comfortable chairs for perhaps 300, and a somewhat insistent clock at each end of the building, while another outside chimes the quarters and sharply punctuates the Quaker silences. There is an ample vestibule, too, which, if it had a place in church architecture generally, might go some little distance towards solving the problem of winning men to Church. For there is cloakroom accommodation sufficient unto the largest congregation, and the impedimenta of hats and umbrellas are not suffered to litter the sanctuary itself, greatly to the peace of mind of—particularly—the silk-hatted men worshippers.

Almost every seat is full as the clock strikes 11. Behind the table, facing the rest of the congregation, sit the members of the Cadbury family, but not one of them takes the slightest part in the meeting. The silence is just beginning to be oppressive when it is broken by a young man at the back of the meeting-house, with the announcement of a hymn. It is the only hymn sung during the morning. There follow, after a pause, the reading of a brief chapter and a prayer, and the remainder of the meeting is surrendered to testimony. A curious diversity of style, and even of opinion, this testimony represents. There is the man who was delivered from the fate of the suicide, and who paints luridly his condition when the conviction of sin came upon him. There is the young university man, who delivers a brief message, pointed and sincere, and withal full of original and deep thought. There is the old lady with the shining face, who says a few simple words in a voice that trembles, but with the fear of God, and not of man.

The intervals of silence that space out these testimonies become shorter as time goes on, and with the interaction of spirit on spirit, one begins to be conscious of a spiritual glow in the meeting. It is a trifle disconcerting, on the instant of 12, to find the whole congregation break up without any formal dismissal. But the benediction—there is no one to pronounce it, and, besides, it began with the service and has lasted the whole way through.

It is easy for anyone fresh to a meeting of the Friends to criticize the proceedings. The first criticism that arose in the writer's mind related to the bewilderment caused by starting so many detached lines of thought, like trains proceeding from a junction and taking different routes. It was only by accident if the little message of one speaker had any relevance to the one that had been given before. And how do they protect themselves against the bore? Is there some invisible time limit in operation? Certainly no one acted the bore on this occasion. Each had his little deliverance, sometimes suggestive of previous thought and study, at others evidently spontaneous and big with the inspiration of the moment. And from it all—the halting words of this speaker and the finished speech of that—there came an abiding impression of spiritual fragrance.

There is one lesson that the churches generally might take away from a Quaker meeting. If a few meditative intervals could intersperse our services, it would be a gain indeed. Our worship at high pressure, our hurried petitions, our rapid singing, our packed sermons—they are interesting, they are full of vitality and life, but they are singularly deficient in restfulness, either for soul or mind. Could we not have one prayer in the course of a service with a pause after each sentence? But perhaps, after all, even the character of our worship is influenced by our surroundings. In Bournville, with its ample breathing spaces, a service which is full of rests seems to be appropriate. It might be less appropriate in the packed and crowded city. But that would be the city's fault—not Bournville's, nor the Friends.

Quakerism Beyond the Mississippi

BY RAYNER W. KELSEY.

The Labors of Robert and Sarah Lindsey in Oregon and Washington.

In this portion of the journal we follow our friends from Corvallis back toward Portland, in which journey they passed through the district which, in less than twenty years, was to become the center of a flourishing settlement of Friends.

"Corvallis, Fourth-day, 7th. Rode four miles into the country this morning to see a person spoken of as a Friend. In a rude timber house, and the room in which we sat having no windows or light except when the door was open, we found Hiram Bond and wife, with a family of nine children. They emigrated to this country about eleven years ago, having previously lived in Indiana and Iowa. Their farm consists of 640 acres of land, which is mostly fenced in. They are putting up a large new barn, and I think a new house is wanting for their comfort. Being out of the way of Friends, they have joined the Methodists. After conversing awhile, we gave them some books, and before coming away it was concluded to return tomorrow and have a meeting in their meeting-house.

"Fifth-day, 8th. We have had two fine, clear, frosty days, and enjoyed our ride into the country. The meeting was attended by about 35 persons who were evidently unaccustomed to sitting in silence, it being the practice in some places to beguile the time with singing if a number meet together before the preacher comes. * * * Father had good service in union with the exercise of my own mind, pointing out the emptiness of a profession of religion without a possession of it and a change of heart. * * * Books and tracts were distributed, and although pressed to stay, we took leave and returned to Corvallis to dinner. In the evening, attended a meeting held in the courthouse, which was mercifully owned by Him who continues to be the crown and diadem of all rightly gathered assemblies. * * * Feeling clear of further service in this neighborhood, we removed our luggage and slept on board the steamboat, which was waiting to sail early tomorrow morning for Salem.

"Sixth-day, 9th. At Salem, where we arrived at noon, after a quick passage of six hours. * * * We find the supreme court of the State is in session, and the Governor, chief justice and other officers are staying at the same hotel as ourselves, which, although only a second-rate place, is the best in the town (which is the capital of Oregon). In this levelling country all stand upon equal ground. Professors and profane, the Governor and officers sit down indiscriminately at the same table as the mechanic and stable boy, and all are attended upon alike. Such mixtures were very unpleasant to me on first setting out upon our travels. I dislike them still, though they must be borne. Sometimes young men who are entire strangers will undertake to question us and compare our little island with their large continent and its many resources. A youngster of this class told us a few days ago that Oregon was about as far advanced as England was twenty-five years ago. We could only smile at his arrogance. Father has obtained leave to have the use of the courthouse for a public meeting tomorrow evening, and has employed a man to sweep out the upper room and stairs, an operation but seldom performed.

"Salem, Oregon, Twelfth month 11th. We are glad to hear that the steamer "The Cortes," which I mentioned as having been due some time before we left San Francisco, has arrived with the mail. * * * Tomorrow we expect to go 8 or 10 miles into the country to visit some families, and on leaving here we have to stop at several places on going down the Willamette before we reach Portland, our place of embarkation for the north. The circumstance of our being here at the time when the supreme court is sitting has given opportunity of placing books illustrative of our peaceable principles in the hands of those who are in authority, and some copies of the address issued by our yearly meeting some years ago on the subject of slavery. Sat down together to wait upon the Lord this morning for a renewal of our spiritual strength, and our waiting was not in vain; our minds were solemnized and, I trust, strengthened in the faithfulness of our merciful High Priest and Intercessor with the Father, who was not unmindful of his unworthy children. We have had calls from various individuals. Two brothers of the name of Bass, whose father formerly lived in Brighton, are in business here, one of whom seems willing to render assistance in connection with the public meeting. We have not yet seen the other brother. The weather for several days, indeed, during the last week, has been remarkably fine, with frosty nights and clear, warm, sunny days.

"Salem, Marion Co., Oregon, First-day, Twelfth month 11, 1859. In the evening we attended a public meeting in the courthouse, which was much crowded, many standing, and others not being able to find seats, went away, which caused a degree of unsettlement, but on father's informing the people that it was our practice to sit down in silence on such occasions to wait upon the Lord, in order for the ministers to witness a preparation to speak, and for the congregation to have their hearts prepared to receive instruction, they became more settled, and we had a solemn and interesting season, which commenced and closed with supplication, and we had an earnest address on the subject of vital Christianity, Jesus Christ being held forth as the chief Cornerstone, elect and precious, which I believe found a place in many hearts.

"Second-day, 12th. Hired a light wagon this morning and rode eight miles to the house of Samuel Simmons, passing through a fine district of enclosed prairie land and one forest of fine timber. Found our friends living on what is called Howels' Prairie, where they settled about fourteen years ago amongst the Indians and wolves, and endured many privations. The farm, consisting of 640 acres, is now divided, and their children are settled upon it. During the last four or five years the farmers in Oregon have had a great source of wealth from the growth of apples. Samuel Simmons has some large orchards which have been remarkably productive. Last year the wholesale price was from 12 to 20 cents per pound, but much attention having been paid to this profitable mode of money-making, the markets have been well supplied this year, and the price has fallen to 4 to 7 cents per pound. * * * After a consultation about the best time for holding a public meeting, it was concluded to have one tomorrow morning, and notice is to be sent to some persons at a distance. Our friends have put up a comfortable house this summer, but their habits are simple.

"Third-day, 13th. After dressing this morning, father was showed to the pump to wash himself, and had to walk over the icy ground on his way to it. I was privileged to have some water brought into the kitchen in a tin dish. Although considered wealthy, this family has no female servant, but the weakly mother and son's wife, who has a young child, have to do the work of the house. The meeting was attended by a considerable number of persons. It was a season wherein many Gospel truths were opened and dwelt upon. * * * Took leave of our friends after meeting, and came directly back to Salem, rain falling the latter part of the day.

"Fourth-day, 14th. Crossed the river in a covered wagon this morning, and went about eight miles through a hilly country to the house of Amos Harvey, who has a wife and large family of children. Arrangements were made for a public meeting to be held in a schoolroom at Bethel, a village about a mile distant at 6.30 in the evening, when there was a full attendance. Many of the scholars gave us their company, some of whom seemed restless and amused themselves with reading during the silent part. * * * Lodged at Amos Harvey's, where our accommodations were of a very rustic kind.

* * * * *

"Fifth-day, 15th. Returned to Salem this morning amidst heavy rain, and in the afternoon called upon some parties whom we do not expect to see again.

"Salem, Sixth-day, 16th. There being nothing more to detain us in these parts, we took our departure by steamboat, but owing to detentions in taking in freight, the day closed when we had only made 18 miles.

"Oregon City, Seventh-day, 17th. Arrived here about 10.30 A. M. and went to a temperance hotel, where we found clean quarters, which tends to reconcile many other things. On making inquiries for James Whinstone, whose relations are Friends, we found he lived in the country, but was then in town, and being found, he made himself very useful in extending notice and making arrangements for a public meeting to be held in the courtroom tomorrow evening.

"First-day, 18th. Held our morning meeting by ourselves in our bedroom, and although no words were uttered, it was to me a very precious season, wherein our merciful High Priest opened a door of access to our heavenly Father. * * * At 6 P. M. attended the public meeting in the courthouse, which was filled to overflowing. The solemnizing presence of the Lord was felt to spread over us, and we were strengthened to be faithful to apprehended duty. The people seemed much pleased with the tracts, it being so unusual to receive something at the close of a meeting, it being a common practice to send a box or plate round before the close of a meeting to receive contributions."

"Second-day, 19th. James Whinstone, formerly of Virginia, brought a wagon this morning and drove us to his farm, a distance of three miles. He has a wife and five children. Although owning 600 acres of land, they reside in a small log house, which, however, is more comfortable than some which have a more inviting outside appearance. Here we spent the day in social converse with some of their relations and neighbors, who had been invited to meet us, and returned to the city as the sun was setting.

"Milwaukee, Third-day, 20th. Left Oregon City this morning and came here by steamboat. We were the only passengers landed, and could find no one to assist in carrying our luggage, so, taking some of the smaller things in our hands, we left the others on the bank of the river and went in search of a hotel, but finding there were none in the place, we inquired for the house of Seth Lewelling, one of the two individuals whose names had been given us as being connected with Friends, where we were provided with a night's lodging. In the afternoon, called upon Henry Eddy and family. Both he and Seth Lewelling are apple growers, and one of them has disposed of 7,500 bushels this year. This once promised to be a thriving little town, but its progress has been impeded. It remains only a small village, in which a number of the houses are vacated and going to decay. We had a public meeting in the schoolhouse in the evening, which was well attended."

Does "Dry" Legislation Make a Town "Wetter"?

The New York Evening Sun a few months ago published the following editorial:

"The Drier the Wetter."

"The great literary center of the United States, the Parnassus of America, Indiana on the Wabash, has been closing saloons lately, pursuant to the operations of a county option law. In the last year the shutters have been nailed up on almost a thousand drinking emporiums. The result, as regards the consumption of liquor, will hardly please the reformers. In the Indianapolis district, for example, for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1910, the consumption of whiskey has increased handsomely, the gain in governmental revenue being $853,000. The receipts from beer are practically stationary, and the prima facie conclusion would seem to be that closing down saloons has boomed the consumption of strong liquor at the expense of mild.

"All this is not a new story by any means. Attempts at compulsory temperance have often operated to accentuate the evil of drinking without lessening its prevalence. Under prohibition the evils are often at their height, and there is considerable evidence for the view that the drier a community writes itself down upon the statute book, the wetter it becomes in fact."

This strikes the ordinary, well-meaning person, who has had a general idea that it helped the cause of temperance to make it hard, rather than easy, for people to buy liquor, as somewhat disconcerting, if the position of the New York Evening Sun is well taken. But is it? A few facts need to be considered.

It may be said, in the first place, that there is no "Indianapolis" revenue district as such. Indianapolis is a part of the Sixth Indiana Internal Revenue District of 59 counties. No official figures are available for Indianapolis alone.

The Sun claims that the revenue collections for whiskey in this "Indianapolis district" were increased in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, by $853,000. The fact is that the total increase in revenue collections from all sources in this district was but $660,932 (Internal Revenue Report, 1910, p. 24; 1909, p. 14). And this increase includes the increase of revenue not only on "whiskey," but on all spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, oleomargarine, filled cheese, mixed flour, adulterated butter, process butter, banks, corporations, playing cards, etc.

It is true that there was a gain in revenue from all spirits (not whiskey alone) in the Sixth Indiana District in 1910 over 1909. But this gain amounted to only $340,189, or about 3.5 per cent. (Report, 1910, p. 140; 1909, p. 132).

Despite this gain, the revenue for 1910 was $150,816 (1.5 per cent.) less than in 1908 (Report, p. 148), and $853,715 (8 per cent.) less than in 1907 (Report, p. 154).

It is not wholly true, as claimed, that the malt liquor revenue has remained "practically stationary" while the spirits revenue has been rising. The malt liquor revenue receipts for the four years (1907-1910) were as follows:

1907, $712,165 (Report, p. 155).
1908, 692,334 (Report, p. 149).
1909, 667,336 (Report, p. 132).
1910, 657,112 (Report, p. 140).

So the fermented liquor revenue for 1910, compared with preceding years, shows the following losses:

1.5 per cent. less than 1909.
5 per cent. less than 1908.
7.7 per cent. less than 1907.

Compare this with the spirits revenue income for 1910:

3.5 per cent. greater than 1909.
1.5 per cent. less than 1908.
8 per cent. less than 1907.

Therefore it would appear that, covering a period of years, the spirits revenue has suffered a net loss as well as the fermented liquor revenue.

But the internal revenue paid on liquors as such in a given district gives no reliable evidence as to how much is being drunk there if, as in this case, it is a district where liquors are manufactured. Local option or county option does not in the least touch the manufacture of these drinks. Indiana stands third among the States (Report, 1910, p. 4), and the Sixth District fourth among revenue districts (Report, 1910, p. 140) in the whole United States in the manufacture of distilled spirits. It is among the first 25 of the more than 60 districts in production of fermented drinks. Tax is paid on these liquors in Indiana when withdrawn from the warehouse, but the liquors may be sold anywhere in the United States or in other countries as well as in Indiana. Therefore, so far from revenue statistics affording any evidence as to the amount of liquor consumed in a given district, the present revenue of $9,350,002 (Report, p. 124) from distilled liquors in the Sixth Indiana District—exclusive of tax on liquor dealers—might be obtained without one gallon being drunk in this district.

Obviously it is impossible to demonstrate exactly how much liquor is being consumed in a place at any given period. Certain results of its use at least serve to indicate the facts. There are many statistics giving evidence of the relatively greater sobriety when the saloons are closed, provided always the law is fairly enforced in both cases. Worcester, Massachusetts, which is the largest city in the world which has voted no-license for two consecutive years, had the following record on arrests alone.

	Two License Years 1906-1908	Two No-License Years 1908-1910
Arrests for drunkenness.....	7,971	4,641 Decrease 42%
First offenders for drunkenness	4,792	3,125 Decrease 35%
Total arrests	12,162	9,325 Decrease 23%

In 1910 Worcester voted to open the saloons again. The following shows the arrests for drunkenness for the first four months of five succeeding years:

1906 License	1,372
1907 License	1,513

Average	1,442.5
1908 No-License		539
1909 No-License		961
Average	750
1910 License	1,074

The health record of the city showed:

Two License Years	Two No-License Years
Alcoholic patients in city hospital. 497	327	Decrease 34 %
Deaths from alcoholism. 48	16	Decrease 66 2/3 %

In the first six months of license, 1910, the deaths from alcoholism were 15, or only one less than occurred in the entire two previous years of no license. The same city government was in charge of affairs for the last six months of the license year 1907 as for 1908, 1909 and 1910. This, of course, is only one bit of evidence, but it confirms evidence gathered in many places and by many observers.

One other bit of experience as to the actual amount of liquor used in a community under no license:

In a Massachusetts town, Athol, a fairly representative town, figures of the importation of liquor for use were obtained from express and freight records. The town had no distillery or brewery. An estimate was made of that brought in by "overland" local expresses. The statistics of the liquor brought in for consumption in a license and a no-license year, as published in a local paper, were as follows:

	Beer gallons	Whiskey gallons	Wine gallons
1907-1908 No-License	24,310	3,287	171
1908-1909 License	196,917	9,513	759

In other words, in the license year there was nearly eight times as much beer, three times as much whiskey and four times as much wine brought into the town for consumption as in the no-license year. Evidently there was quite enough illegal selling in the latter year; but in this town at least, and probably in many others, the statistics which are freed from the complication of local breweries or distilleries do not bear out the contention that "the drier it wrote itself down, the wetter it became in fact."—*The S. Things of Interest Among Ourselves

S. Smith, Haverhill, Mass., who has been confined at his home on account of serious illness, is slowly improving.

* * *

Ellis A. and Clara Wells have been asked to remain in pastoral work at North Loup, Neb., another year, beginning Fourth month 1st.

* * *

The meeting at North Driftwood, near Seymour, Ind., enjoyed a revival effort of two weeks recently in which some half dozen professed conversion.

* * *

Bloomington Academy, Indiana, is making steady growth under the principalship of Caroline M. Hill. All departments of work are progressing satisfactorily.

* * *

Frank E. Kinsey, Indiana, has been conducting an evangelistic campaign at Lowell, Kans. He was assisted by Will C. Kinsey, a singer. The attendance was good and the presence of the Holy Spirit was felt throughout.

* * *

A recent event of more than ordinary interest at Friends University, Wichita, Kan., was the piano recital by Lucy H. Francisco, head of the Music Department. Her musical talent has won her an enviable reputation in Wichita and throughout Kansas Yearly Meeting.

* * *

Yonge Street Quarterly Meeting, held 18th and 19th ult., at Newmarket, Ont., was well attended. All the reports of the business meeting were encouraging. Willard O. Trueblood's messages were very helpful and inspiring. W. F. M. S. collection amounted to $5.95.

* * *

A communication from Whittier, Cal., dated Second month 28th, says: "Arthur Dann is still ill at the home of Dr. J. J. Mills. His case shows substantial improvement over its previous serious aspect, but it will be a considerable time before he can resume active evangelistic work."

Wm. J. Cleaver, pastor in the meeting at Bloomingdale, Ind., has recently given three sermons of especial interest on: 1. The Foundation of Life. 2. Building the Life Here. 3. The Future Life.

William Hill gave a very interesting talk on Good Citizenship in the meeting-house the evening of the 5th inst.

* * *

A revival was held at Prairie Vale, near Coldwater, Kan., from First month 26th to Second month 5th—nineteen sessions in all. Abel J. Bond, Stafford, Kan., and M. F. Swafford, Cullison, Kan., were the leading workers. The local meeting was greatly helped by their ministry. Twenty-three were definitely blessed. Four new members were received at the last monthly meeting, and more will join soon.

The gymnasium at Light Street Mission, Baltimore, is having better use this season than ever before. Two afternoons it is used by school boys after school hours, the average attendance being about 57. Two evenings it is used by girls under the direction of the Bryn Mawr League and the other four evenings small boys who work during the day use it from 7 to 8.30 and the senior boys from 8.30 to 10. The total attendance during the week is about 575. The work of Herbert L. Huffman is beginning to show results, as the boys learn to know and appreciate him.

Charles E. Tebbetts, secretary of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions, spent a very busy week in Whittier, Cal. Following the quarterly meeting, Second month 18th, at which he took a leading part in ministry on two occasions he addressed the students of the college at chapel hour one morning, and the Men's League of the Friends Church in the evening. On First-day following he spoke morning, afternoon and evening, and addressed the young people Second-day evening. His addresses, all on the line of missionary endeavor and world movements for reform, were fresh, vigorous and instructive.

A farmer in Gray County, Kan., who is not a Friend, writes a vigorous letter to the Fowler Gazette, stating his reasons why he supports the Fowler Academy in preference to a local high school. His third and fourth reasons, which are expressed with more force than elegance, are as follows: "Third: I believe the education of our young people should be under the care and auspices of the Church. Fourth: I have known of the Quakers and their good work a long time, and, taking in all as a whole, considering all the pro's and con's, I feel it my duty to say I do not think many of our denominations are so fitted to run a work of this kind as the Friends, especially at Fowler."

* * *

White Water Quarterly Meeting was held at East Main Street Meeting-house, Richmond, Ind., the 4th inst. Jacob Baker, Michigan, preached in the opening devotional period. Charles O. Whiteley, Walnut Ridge Quarterly Meeting, presented the needs of Southland College, Arkansas, and took subscriptions to assist in the erection of a new building. In addition to the usual reports considered, President Robert L. Kelly and Lester C. Haworth spoke of the campaign to raise the Earlham College debt by next yearly meeting time. A report on the recent repeal of the county local option law was also presented, and a petition was prepared asking the commissioners of Wayne County to allow only one saloon to 1,000 people.

The Daily Observer, Charlotte, N. C., speaks in very high terms of a discourse given by Prof. J. Edwin Jay at Guilford College on a recent First-day evening. It says:

"Professor Jay gave a truly remarkable discourse on how to believe in God, how to think of God. He showed, as one might expect, that the truest ideal of God is found in the expressions and in the evident attitude of Jesus Christ. His discourse was a fine interpretation of the 'Lord's Prayer,' full of tenderness and rich in illustration. No vague belief in the almighty force apart from personality and a care for individuals can satisfy the human soul. It was a fine scholarly address, full of personal experience and honest conviction and was just suited to the needs of a student body."

Berkeley Quarterly Meeting was held at San Jose, on the 3d to 5th inst. John and Nettie Riley were present on Seventh-day and Levi Gregory throughout the quarterly meeting. The weather was very rainy, hence the attendance was small.

The Friends greatly missed Addison W. and Rebecca S. Naylor and their daughter Jessie N. Cole, who are on a trip to Palestine, also the Quarterly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work, Mead A. Kelsey, who is spending some time with his parents who are both in ill health, at Newberg, Oregon.

Besides routine business, a request for the establishment of a monthly meeting at Lindsay, Tulare Co., Cal., endorsed by Berkeley Monthly Meeting, was considered and granted and a committee appointed to attend the opening of same.

A protest against the expenditure of public funds for the fortification of the Panama Canal was fully endorsed and directed signed.

Following are items from Earlham College:

At the eighth annual convention of the Religious Education Association, held at Providence, R. I., last month, President Robert L. Kelly was made director of the association for the State of Indiana. On the night of Third month 10th, President Kelly acted as judge in the annual debate between the State Universities of Illinois and Indiana. The debate was held at Champaign, Illinois.

Professor Harlow Lindley has been granted a leave of absence for the winter and spring terms of the next college year, and will spend the time in study at the University of Chicago. During the summer term, Prof. Lindley will teach history at Indiana University.

Professor W. O. Mendenhall who is spending the present year in study at the University of Michigan, will resume his duties at Earlham at the opening of the summer term.

Professor Lawrence Hadley has been granted a full year's leave of absence for the year 1911-12 and will study mathematics either at an American or European university.

In the death of Charles H. Thorndike, whose obituary appears in this issue, New England loses another staunch Friend. He was born in Concord, N. H., in 1833, but was engaged in business for a number of years at North Weare. In 1870 he returned to Concord to live at the old home of his grandfather. His interest in Christian service extended beyond the Society which he so loyally supported. For twenty-three years he was a trustee of the Margaret Pillsbury General Hospital, resigning only when failing strength made impossible the conscientious fulfilling of his duties on the board. His knowledge of the practical needs of such an institution as the hospital made his work as trustee of great value, and to this work he devoted much of his time for years.

At a time when the Concord Y. M. C. A. was more than usually in need of efficient workers, Charles Thorndike carried its burdens as president and as member of the board of directors for a number of years. He had a large part in bringing the association through troublous times to its present position of prosperity.

He was a staunch Prohibitionist, and did much for that cause in Concord and in the State.

The Pelham, (Ont.) Quarterly Meeting was held there the 11th and 12th ult. Favorable weather and good sleighing made it possible for a large attendance at most of the sessions. Willard O. Trueblood, Toronto, was present, and his ministry was greatly appreciated. His addresses at the Township Sunday-School Convention just preceding the quarterly meeting were well received. His call for a special men's meeting on First-day afternoon met with a good response, and about 90 men and boys assembled. His sermon, from the text "Is the young man safe?" was an appeal for Christian manhood.

Others present representing the monthly meetings at other points were George Bishop, William Deller and Thomas Waud, from Norwich, and John R. Webb from Rockwood.

George Bishop gave a helpful talk on "Faithfulness in Service" at the meeting on Ministry and Oversight.

William Deller attended the meeting at Effingham and had acceptable service in the ministry.

Hannah Taylor, a former resident of Pelham and a member of this meeting was present and expressed her pleasure in being privileged to again attend quarterly meeting. The occasion was one of much spiritual profit and many were encouraged to greater faithfulness in their work for Christ and the Church.

Daisy Barr, who is located as pastor in the meeting at Muncie, Ind., has been assisting George C. Levering in a revival effort at Winchester, Ind. The local newspapers devoted considerable space to the meetings and the Winchester Daily Herald thus commented editorially on the work:

"One of the greatest revivals of true religion which has ever visited this city is in progress in connection with the meetings which are being held from night to night at the Friends Church. There is nothing sensational or overdrawn about Mrs. Barr's preaching, but in simple earnestness and directness, she presents the great and sublime principles of the Christian religion to the minds and conscience of her hearers. She believes in the actual presence of God, a personal loving spirit, with every man both saint and sinner. The voice of God is as real to her today as it ever was to prophet or apostle in days that are past and gone. Religion to her consists not in creeds or in outward ceremonies, not in obedience to custom or in special observances of any kind, but in a love to God and fellow-men which is the outward manifestation of the life of God within the soul. Faith with her is not the mere assent of the mind to any truth however divine, but is the act of trust by which a man accepts the offered mercy and grace of God. Conversion is not a fiction or a change of mind alone, but includes a real spiritual birth in which man is regenerated and the life of God is begun within us. She calls men and women, boys and girls, to forsake sin and selfishness, greed and pride and passion, and to go out to live a life of tenderness, self-control and service; a life inspired by the Spirit of God and lived after the pattern of Jesus Christ himself. Is it any wonder that crowds press to her preaching and that many are turned to God and to the Church?"

Deep River Quarterly Meeting was held at High Point, N. C., the 4th and 5th inst. The meeting on Ministry and Oversight convened at 9.45 and was characterized by an earnest devotional spirit.

At 11 o'clock the regular meeting for worship was held. James R. Jones preached a practical and pointed sermon, which was well received. Walter White, Thomas Anderson and Enos Harvey took part in the vocal services to good effect.

A recess was taken, during which time luncheon was served by the Women's Auxiliary of High Point Meeting. After lunch the business session convened. In the absence of the regular clerk, A. M. Briggs was appointed for the day. Reports from the monthly meetings on spiritual conditions showed much of active interest and systematic work. A lack of regular ministry and evangelistic effort was shown to exist in some of the meetings. The Friends are making an effort with fair success to secure the attendance of all their children at school. A committee appointed for the purpose had petitioned the Legislature in the name of the quarterly meeting for a compulsory educational law. While this had not been granted, much discussion had been aroused which will result in good. J. Elwood Cox presented statistics showing the rapid increase in the State educational funds and in the building of school-houses in the past few years. Many engaged in a discussion of church affairs in an optimistic spirit.

James R. Jones preached twice on First-day to appreciative audiences. The attendance was good throughout.

The Friends at High Point have let the contract for a $3,000 addition to their church building for the better accommodation of their services and Bible school.

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

The Thirteenth International Sunday-school Convention will be held in San Francisco, June 20-27, 1911, and California Yearly Meeting convenes at Whittier on the 27th. This makes it possible for Friends to attend both, and the low round-trip rate certainly gives a great opportunity for a visit to the Coast. The published round-trip rate from Chicago is $62.50; and from Omaha and Kansas City is $50.00; for other places the rate may be easily obtained. Sunday-school workers here are expecting not only a large attendance, but great blessings to come to all the churches, by this great gathering of strong workers. As the representative of Friends on the State Executive Committee, I am anxious that our people may, not only from California, Oregon and Washington, but from beyond the Rockies be at the convention.

Not only has united effort in Bible study and Bible schools had much to do in removing the sectarian walls that used to exist, but we have profited by one another's experience. The better we understand the Bible, the nearer we come to the Lord Jesus, the nearer we find ourselves to each other. Statistics show that 80 per cent. of church members come from the Bible school. The boys and girls are worth saving. Have we had the vision of the church's opportunity? I shall be glad to be of service to Friends who wish to attend the convention.

Born

DORLAND.—To Walter E. and Annabel Dorland, 6232 Magnolia Avenue, Chicago, Ill., Third month 1, 1911, a daughter, Claudia Catherine.

Died

BALES.—At the home of his son, Edward R. Bales, in Centuria, Ill., Second month 10, 1911, Oliver H. Bales, aged seventy-four years. The deceased was superintendent of White's Institute, near Wabash, Ind., for twenty-one years.

GARWOOD.—At his home in Pasadena, Cal., First month 11, 1911, David C. Garwood, in his sixty-ninth year.

GEORGE.—At Bear Creek, Iowa, First month 26, 1911, Evan George, in his eighty-fourth year. The deceased was a member of Bear Creek Meeting.

HOLLINGSWORTH.—At the home of her daughter, wife of C. J. McLean, Portland, Oregon, Second month 26th, 1911, Sarah J. Hollingsworth, widow of the late Moses Hollingsworth, aged 86 years. The deceased was a member of Newberg Monthly Meeting, Oregon, and an earnest Christian.

HUBBARD.—At Sierre Madre, Cal., Third month 6th, 1911, John B. Hubbard, aged thirty-two years. The deceased was a birthright Friend and a son of William G. Hubbard and wife, of Goldsboro, N. C., recently of Wilmington, Ohio. John B. is the second son in this family called away within six month, an elder brother having died Ninth month last.

THORNDIKE.—At his home, in Concord, N. H., Second month 27, 1911, Charles H. Thorndike, in his seventy-ninth year. He was a member and valued minister of Weare Monthly Meeting.

The International Bible School Lesson

FIRST QUARTER.

LESSON XIII.

THIRD MONTH 26, 1911.

REVIEW.

Read Proverbs 14: 21-35.

GOLDEN TEXT. Happy is that people whose God is the Lord.
Ps. 144: 15.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Third month 20th. Kingdom divided. 1 Kings 12: 1-24.

Third-day. Asa's good reign. 2 Chron. 15: 1-15.

Fourth-day. Jehoshaphat's reign. 2 Chron. 17: 1-13.

Fifth-day. Elijah's victory. 1 Kings 18: 1,2,17-40.

Sixth-day. Naboth's vineyard. 1 Kings 21: 1-29.

Seventh-day. A child's life restored. 2 Kings 4: 8-37.

First-day. Defeat. 1 Kings 20: 12-21.

Time.—The lessons of the quarter cover a period of about 80 or 90 years; from 939 (or 982) B. C. to 849 (or 892) B. C.

Place.—The incidents all took place in Palestine as usually known, most of them west of the Jordan, but one or two east of that river.

Kingdoms.—Judah and Israel.

Prophets.—Elijah and Elisha, the two greatest, though there were others.

Kings.—The chief monarchs were Rehoboam (17 years), Asa (40 years), Jehoshaphat (25 years), all in Judah. Over Israel the ablest monarchs were Jeroboam (22 years), Omri (12 years), Ahab (22 years). Jezebel, queen of Ahab, was very influential.

Contemporary monarchs:

IN JUDAH

IN ISRAEL

Rehoboam

Jeroboam

Asa

Omri, Ahab

Jehoshaphat

Ahab, Ahaziah, Jehoram

The Kingdom of Judah was only about half as large as that of Israel, or about the size of the State of Connecticut. Israel was about the size of New Hampshire. Owing to the fact that the desert lay to the south and southeast of Judah, and Israel to the north, it was more protected from foreign attacks. The inhabitants were not so much exposed to the temptations of heathendom. This in part accounted for the longer life of the southern kingdom. Judah also had two good kings, Asa and Jehoshaphat, who together reigned 65 years.

Israel was not only double in size, but was far more fertile than Judah. On three sides it was bounded by heathen nations; the intercourse with these nations was frequent, the great routes of communication with Damascus and the East crossed its territory, so its inhabitants were not only prosperous, but greatly exposed to the temptations of the heathen world. It was natural that alliances should be entered into, and from a human point of view Ahab's marriage with Jezebel, the heathen princess, was very politic. Under the conditions named it cannot be wondered at that Israel and her kings fell into heathen ways. With the introduction of Baal worship it was inevitable there should be a decline. Not even the life, preaching and miracles of Elijah and Elisha could stem the tide.

The accounts of both Judah and Israel are meagre, and it should never be lost sight of that the object of the compilers of Kings and Chronicles was not primarily historical, but religious. They wrote to point religious lessons, and inculcate religious teaching.

The lesson on Rehoboam shows how dangerous it is to follow unwise counsel; that on Jeroboam teaches the risk of making one's religion a matter of convenience or worldly profit; Asa's good reign shows the benefit of a moral and religious course of life and effort; as a contrast the reigns of Omri and Ahab show the result of evil ways, evil policy and evil life.

The story of Elijah is one of the most picturesque and graphic in the Bible. We see him bringing his message to Ahab; we see him hiding at the brook Cherith, fed by God's messengers; at the house of the widow of Zarephath, raising her son to life. Then in his grandeur and faith at the trial with prophets of Baal, his glorious triumph, followed by the time of despondency, and the striking scene on Mount Horeb. Then rebuking Ahab for his seizure of Naboth's vineyard and the terrible prophecy. Then the travel with Elisha and the wonderful translation of the elder prophet.

Elisha, the successor of Elijah, though so different in character, carries on the work by deeds of mercy and sympathy.

Lastly we see Benhadad defeated and barely escaping capture, as a result of indulgence in "strong drink."

The lessons of the quarter are those which will not soon be forgotten.

April election. As one of the few instances of the college professor in politics, and municipal politics at that, Alderman Merriam has won a national reputation by his insistence upon honesty and efficiency in the conduct of the public business. His election would enable him to give effect to the recommendations of the investigation commission which unearthed bad conditions a few years ago, and of which he was the head.

The sufferings of the famine stricken provinces of China grow worse and worse. The government is not meeting the condition as, for instance, the Indian government invariably meet a famine in any of its provinces. Japan is sending some help and from America gifts of food and money are on the way. But the need is desperate. Dr. Samuel Cochran of the American Presbyterian mission estimates that a million people must die before the first crop can be harvested. And that harvest may bring little relief. The people have no strength to sow and no animals remain for the plowing. When news comes that the missionaries have food to give, they are mobbed by the eager crowds. Men are selling their children. The plague continues its ravages in the north. For virulence, the doctors say, there has been nothing like it since the Black Death of the Middle Ages, that killed 40,000,000 people in Europe and Asia. There is no efficient control of the situation in the constantly broadening advance of the disease, except where the foreign or foreign-trained doctors are in control.

A careful study of the workmen's insurance and compensation systems of European countries has just been completed by our own Government, and the first volume, treating of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France and Germany, is now issued. The most advanced and complete of these systems is that of Germany, where under the paternalistic government system few wage-earners are left outside the plans for insurance against industrial accidents, sickness, invalidity and old age. Benefits are also provided in case of maternity for wage-earning women. About 27,000,000 persons were insured against accidents in 1908, out of a population of more than 60,000,000, the whole cost being borne by the employers. The number who obtained such liability compensation in that year was 143,000. In sickness insurance the employers pay one-third and the employees two-thirds of the cost. In the old age and invalidity systems, employers and employees pay equal amounts, with a large added subsidy from the general taxpayer. The amount expended for old age and invalidity in 1908 was $48,000,000, while in twenty-five years a reserve of $355,000,000 has been accumulated. These three systems have been in operation for a quarter of a century and have been greatly successful.

Quanah Parker, the chief of the Comanches, Apaches and Kiowas, who has just died at his home in Lawton, Okl., was a notable man. A half-breed, to be sure, but reared as a savage, he was conspicuously engaged for many years in warfare against the race of his white mother. He had taken part in fully 100 frontier battles. In later life, he gave up the struggle and settled down in Oklahoma. He owned 2,700 acres of farm land and was accounted well-to-do. He made many trips to Washington in the interest of his tribe, whose leadership he retained to the end. Parker had six wives and 15 children. The government once determined to abolish plural marriages and the old chief's way of handling the situation revealed his skill and also his wit. He went to Washington at the head of a delegation. Acting as spokesman for his Comanche associates, he said:

"Mr. Commissioner, it is your wish and your order that we Indians have only one wife. Mr. Commissioner, I have six wives. I have married them all, according to Indian custom. I love them all. They all have children. They have been with me many years, and we are very happy. I am willing to obey your orders. I have obeyed all your orders, and I will obey this one, but, Mr. Commissioner, there is just one little favor. You must select the one I am to live with. Then you tell the rest."

The honorable commissioner was at bottom a man of sense, and having considered the matter more fully, he sent the Indians home with the assurance that their domestic customs would not be disturbed.

EDITOR BROWNE.

OF THE ROCKFORD MORNING STAR.

"About seven years ago I ceased drinking coffee to give your Postum a trial.

"I had suffered acutely from various forms of indigestion and my stomach had become so disordered as to repel almost every sort of substantial food. My general health was bad. At close intervals I would suffer severe attacks which confined me in bed for a week or more. Soon after changing from coffee to Postum the indigestion abated, and in a short time ceased entirely. I have continued the daily use of your excellent Food Drink and assure you most cordially that I am indebted to you for the relief it has brought me.

"Wishing you a continued success, I am

Yours very truly,

J. Stanley Browne,
Managing Editor."

Of course, when a man's health shows he can stand coffee without trouble, let him drink it, but most highly organized brain-workers simply cannot.

The drugs natural to the coffee berry affect the stomach and other organs and thence to the complex nervous system, throwing it out of balance and producing disorders in various parts of the body. Keep up this daily poisoning and serious disease generally supervenes. So when man or woman finds that coffee is a smooth but deadly enemy and health is of any value at all, there is but one road—quit.

It is easy to find out if coffee be the cause of the troubles, for if left off 10 days and Postum be used in its place and the sick and diseased conditions begin to disappear, the proof is unanswerable.

Postum is not good if made by short boiling. It must be boiled full 15 minutes after boiling begins, when the crisp flavor and the food elements are brought out of the grains and the beverage is ready to fulfill its mission of palatable comfort and renewing the cells and nerve centres broken down by coffee.

"There's a Reason."

other's mistakes as well as successes, and it is "among Friends" that we can talk plainly without meaning any harm. Having explained this, the author proceeds to offer some plain criticism on provincialism, literature, politics, theology, and other subjects. The work is a spicy, yet good-natured commentary on a number of living topics.

The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge. Volume IX. Edited by Samuel M. Jackson, George W. Gilmore and others. Cloth, price $5 per volume; set complete, in twelve volumes, $60. Publishers, Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York.

The ninth volume of the New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge has just been published, which brings the work down to "Reuchlin."

One of the longest articles in the volume is also one of the most important in the whole encyclopedia—"The History of Preaching," occupying 32 pages, by Edwin Charles Dargan. What the pulpit has been since Apostolic times, what it has sought to accomplish amid all the turmoil and political strife of the many peoples to whom the Gospel has been preached, is here interestingly and profitably told. The article closes, appropriately with "the twentieth century outlook," the features of which are "the social and ethical forces in the pulpit today."

Pietism," "Rationalism and Supernaturalism," "Pharisees and Sadducees," "The Philistines," "Polytheism," "Positivism," "Psychotherapy," "Providence," "The Philosophy of Religion," "Prayers for the Dead," "Platonism and Christianity," show the wide range of religious knowledge covered by this encyclopedia, and afford the serious student a variety of topics that must at least prove entertaining if not always in accord with his own predilections.

THE ROAD TO HAPPINESS.

BY ANNIE JOHNSON FLINT.

This is the road to happiness:

Start Now, from Where You Are;
Turn to the Right and Keep straight on,
And you'll not find it far.

Along the Path of Willing Feet

And over Heartsease Hill,
Across the fields of Sweet Content,
The stream of Glad Good-will;
Then through the lane of Loving Heart,
The gate that's called To-day,
And down the steps of Little Things
Into the Common Way.

And take the Cloak of Charity,
The staff of Wise Employ,
A loaf of Bread of Daily Grace,
A flask well filled with Joy;
A word of cheer, a helping hand
Some good to give or share,
A bit of song, a high resolve,
A hope, a smile, a prayer.

And in the Place of Duty Done,
Beside the Door of Home,
You'll find the House of Happiness,—
For Happiness does not roam.

THE QUIET LIFE.

Wouldst thou live the life serene
Keep the thought life pure and clean.
Daily say, "Thy will be done,"
Daily pray, "Thy Kingdom come."
Silently, and without warning
There will dawn, the glad sweet morning
When the things for which thou wrought,
Will come, richer than thy thought.

Oranges Ripen Earlier as You Go Northward

Owing to climatic conditions, oranges in the extensive orchards about Lindsay, Tulare County, Cal., ripen six weeks earlier than they do in the section about Los Angeles, 240 miles south, thus furnishing to the growers a top-price market.

These climatic conditions also exclude scale pests, saving large annual expense to the grower, and assuring him of clean and desirable fruit.

Olives, grapes, deciduous fruits and alfalfa all grow luxuriantly, and to great profit. The near-by mountains, with their winter mantle of snow in view for 50 miles, furnish an exhaustless supply of water, with electric energy that affords power and light for every home in the valley.

One of the giant Sequoia National Parks is only 40 miles away, affording a delightful summer resort.

A Friends meeting has been established with every prospect of an increasing membership.

The True Reformer.

By JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

He stood upon the world's broad threshold; wide
 The din of battle and of slaughter rose;
He saw God stand upon the weaker side,
 That sank in seeming loss before its foes;
Many there were who made great haste and sold
 Unto the cunning enemy their swords.
He scorned their gifts of fame, and power and gold,
 And underneath their soft and flowery words
Heard the cold serpent hiss; therefore he went
 And joined him to the weaker part,
Fanatic named, and fool, yet well content
 So he could be nearer to God's heart,
And feel its solemn pulses sending blood
 Through all the wide-spread veins of endless good.

LESSONS FROM GREAT LIVES.

IV JOSHUA.

JOSH. 1: 1-11.

(Consecration Meeting.)

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Third month 27th. Joshua's apprenticeship.

Ex. 24: 12-18.

Third-day. Faith and faithfulness. Num. 14: 6-10.

Fourth-day. The warrior. Ex. 17: 8-13.

Fifth-day. The judge. Josh. 7: 10-13.

Sixth-day. The leader. Josh. 4: 11-14.

Seventh-day. True to his word. Josh. 9: 10.

What do you think is Joshua's greatest achievement?

How was his faithfulness rewarded?

How does he resemble the Christian soldier?

Suggestions for leaders:

1. Let someone tell the story of Joshua's life up to the time he assumed the leadership of the people. Ex. 17: 8-13; Num. 13, 14; Deut. 31: 1-33.

2. Let someone read the entire book of Joshua and briefly tell the story of his leadership of the armies of Israel when they entered Canaan.

3. Let someone read Josh. 1: 1-11 and Josh. 23, 24, with the purpose of comparing the prospects of youth with the retrospect of old age. Compare especially Deut. 7: 24, and Josh. 1: 5 with Josh. 23: 9. Josh. 1: 3 with 23: 4. Josh. 1: 7, 8 with 23: 6.

"Foremost captain of his time,
Rich in saving common sense,
And, as the greatest only are,
In his simplicity sublime."

* * *

If Canaan stands in Christian experience for the best and choicest that God has to give His children, surely the "land flowing with milk and honey," "the land of pure delight" is a place of temptation, struggle and conflict.

"The conquest which Joshua made is suggestive of that which may be made by every man of faith. Life lies before him as a promised land. The work of life consists in bringing this land of promise into subjection to the highest, so that the harvests of its valleys and the inspiring vintage of its hills shall support the unselfish life of the ideal Christian disciple."

* * *

The scripture lesson is the commission of Joshua. Every verse and phrase is worthy careful study. It is the word which comes to a young man at the threshold of his career. Find in the passage three things that every youth should find in his own life: 1st, the task; 2d, the equipment; 3d, the action. Note further that the task is great and dangerous; the equipment consists in knowledge of God and His law; the action is quick, immediate, confident and energetic.

* * *

"Be strong and of good courage." What a watchword for a life filled with heroic action. It was Moses' final word to his young lieutenant. Deut. 31: 6; it echoed and re-echoed in Joshua's soul when Jehovah called him to take up the responsibilities of leadership. Josh. 1:

6, 7, 9; it resounded from Joshua's lips to those leading under him when he would inspire noble action. Name some motto that has woven itself into the fabric of your life like a golden thread to brighten the sombre blues.

* * *

Joshua had the triple inspiration that comes from a great example, Moses, a great God, Jehovah, and a great task, the occupation of the promised land.

* * *

Joshua was prepared for his work. His apprenticeship was in the realm of his life's activity. When God has a great work to be done he finds a prepared man. Those who are prepared are not found standing "idle in the market place." The great architect lays out the plan of a life in the youthful years. Mature life works out the prepared plan. Have you received the plan of your life? Lack of aim does not facilitate but hinders the leadership of the Holy Spirit.

* * *

"Every place the sole of your foot shall tread upon, to you have I given it—" To claim the land of Canaan and to possess it are two very different things. The distance between what is and what should be is often immeasurable. The abyss between aspiration and achievement is where many a soul slips through and loses its hold on real life. The theory is of use only as it is proved in trial to be practical. Moses preached and promised the land of Canaan for forty years. Joshua's task was to make the vision a reality, the promise a possession.

* * *

Standing alone. In the years of preparation Joshua learned to stand alone, because of his convictions. Num. 14: 4-10. The minority report of the spy committee was unpopular. It nearly cost Caleb and Joshua their lives. In the years of maturity Joshua was willing to stand alone though all Israel should choose the gods of the Amorites. Josh. 24: 14-16. His great choice in life was made early. He never had to make it again. Standing alone with God makes a majority if power and outcome are the vital things. Cite other instances of men who stood alone with God. Elijah on Mt. Carmel. I Kings 18: 22. Jesus, Mark 14: 50. Daniel, Daniel 6. Paul, Acts 27: 21-26. Alone and right is better than in company with the entire world and wrong. "Let us have faith that right makes might; and in that faith let us dare to do our duty as we understand it."

* * *

"I had rather be right than be President," said an American statesman. You probably cannot be a President and you cannot be a Joshua, but you can be right. The greatest things in life are within the reach of all.

The Red Cross at Washington is keeping up its contributions of relief for the Chinese famine sufferers as fast as donations are received from the charitably minded in this country. Last week it cabled $3,000 to the American consul-general at Shanghai, making $25,000 which already has been sent to China in this way. The sum of $8,000 was also spent in Seattle for food supplies.

While we are celebrating the tercentenary of the publication of the Authorized Version of the English Bible, we should not forget that Fourth month 5th, marks a century since the death of Robert Raikes. It is an interesting circumstance that the centenary of the decease of the founder of Sunday-schools should so nearly coincide with the tercentenary of the publication of their great text-book.

The most drastic action ever taken by the License Court of Pennsylvania was that of Judge William E. Porter last week when he refused to grant a single license in the whole of Lawrence County. Petitions circulated by the Anti-Saloon element and signed by 30,000 persons were presented to the court. This action affects four breweries, thirty-eight hotels and about seventy saloons, representing property valued at eight million dollars.

Worship

Worship, as I understand it, is a joyous, undisturbed appreciation of God, and it is, thus, religion at its highest and most intense stage. It is the soul's way of arriving at its supreme refreshment and renewing. It is not a passive, lazy state when the loins of the mind are ungirt and all the inward powers are stagnant. The proper word for that condition is "sleep." Many a person, no doubt, approaches it in religious meetings, and is as empty of thoughts as the dozing kitten by the open fire, but that is not worship. As I have said, worship is an intense state when all the inward self is awake, alive, active, joyous—only it is too deep and rich an experience to be expressed in thought alone, or feeling alone, or will alone.

"In such high hours,
Of visitation from the living God
Thought is not; in enjoyment it expires."

Any person can realize at once that worship is by no means the same thing as silence. Silence is a purely negative situation. It only means absence of sound or disturbance. Within the silence many things may happen. One may sleep, another may think, another may scheme and plan, another may dwell upon a fancied injury, another may observe the various hats and gowns or the expression of faces, another may wish the meeting would close—and some may worship.

It is, again, not the same thing as service, which is a very common word for a religious occasion—"divine service" it is often called. "Divine service" consists generally of a series of religious exercises, designed to interest the attenders, or to entertain them, or to instruct them, or to edify them, or to bring them to a decision. These exercises may be, and often are, of very real value. Most persons need to be interested, entertained in a quieting and refreshing way; they need to be instructed, edified and moved to decision. But none of these things are quite what we mean by worship. And it must therefore be admitted that many Christians get very few moments of real worship. Too often the "service" is the whole thing and no provision is made for worship.

Here is undoubtedly one of the weaknesses of modern Christianity. We arrange for almost everything; we get into touch with life and society at many points, but we do not sufficiently arrange for and expect these moments "of visitation from the living God," when the soul lets go of things and thoughts and schemes and plans, and finds itself absorbed in joyous appreciation of God.

How, then, shall we succeed in securing times of worship? First of all we must expect to worship; we must cultivate a desire to attain to it; we must see to it that we are not satisfied to stop with words and performances and service. We must arouse within ourselves a passion for experiences of communion, a thirst for the living God, a deep inward cry of soul for the real Presence. In all such things, expectation is a necessary condition of the experience. It has happened only once in history that a man has found a kingdom when he was looking for his father's donkeys. In other words, you find what you are looking for. The faith is the victory, the preparation of soul, the forereaching of the spirit; the hunger for the living God is the very way to find Him. If we hold our meetings as "services" only, if we make no provision for hush and expectancy, if we do not realize that there is something beyond words, we shall not get worship, though we get many other good things.

Everything, however, which helps to make God seem real in a meeting is a good preparation for worship. A passage of Scripture, impressively read, may do it; a prayer which rises out of a sincere soul and voices the deep need of a congregation often brings that sense of reality which is a preparation for worship; a sermon which unfolds in a genuine way some central truth of religion and produces a fresh conviction of divine realities may do it. Some feel helped in this direction by lofty music, and some by art, and some by solemn silence in which the gathered company waits in co-operative expectancy. But the last step must be a personal one—the individual soul itself must open its windows and look and find—and worship.

Current Events and Comments

Why Have Quarterly Meetings?

To those who are watching the trend of affairs in our Society, it is evident that the function of our quarterly meetings is becoming somewhat of a problem. In many of them, few matters of importance are considered. The wholesome old custom of "visiting meetings" is declining. Our ministers are becoming attached to particular fields and the old-time "traveling Friends" are disappearing. Time and again quarterly meeting reports state that "no visiting Friends were present."

Some Friends have suggested that we have too many grades of meetings in our church system, and that monthly meetings, yearly meetings and the Five Years' Meeting are adequate for disciplinary purposes. In this connection we wish to call attention to a paragraph in the report from Hesper Quarterly Meeting, Kansas, appearing elsewhere in this issue, which states that during the business sessions, two definite subjects were taken up for consideration: "How Best to Care for Isolated and Small Meetings," and "The Best Methods of Utilizing the Sessions of the Quarterly Meeting Other Than Those Devoted to Business and Worship." The report also states that Seventh-day evening and First-day afternoon were devoted to a discussion of Bible school methods, several excellent addresses being delivered. A report from Whittier Quarterly Meeting, California, held in Eleventh month, is even more suggestive, and is worth reprinting:

Whittier Quarterly Meeting, recently held at El Modena, was given new features in the way of well-prepared papers or addresses at the several sessions on important problems of the Church and its work. In the meeting on Ministry and Oversight, W. Mahlon Perry discussed "The Development of Spiritual Gifts," and at the evening meeting following, Benjamin Coppock presented "The Relation of Higher Education to the Church." On Seventh-day morning, Andrew F. Mitchell gave an address on "The Church in the Home, and the Home in the Church," followed by President Thomas Newlin with a paper on "The Relation of Higher Education to Foreign Missions." The evening session was given to considering "The Relation of the Christian Endeavor to the Church," Dr. C. R. Dixon giving the address. The conference features closed with the morning meeting on First-day, at which Dr. Joseph John Mills presented the question of "Personal Consecration and Loyalty to the Church." All the addresses were notably able and instructive, and it was felt by all that this feature of the quarterly meeting was most helpful. The holding of like conferences in some of the isolated monthly meetings is contemplated.

We are convinced that the move to make our quarterly meetings pre-eminently quarterly conferences is an exceedingly practical one. Better talent and a wider range of experience can be focused in a quarterly meeting than in a monthly meeting, while on the other hand our yearly meetings are ill-adapted for conference work. It seems eminently fitting, therefore, that the quarterly meeting should be the occasion for such exercises.

These conferences as at present carried on are not a part of the meeting for discipline, but we believe that a degree of dignity and weight would be added to the work if all papers and discussions were made a matter of record and were presented with the regularly appointed officers of the meeting in charge.

President Taft's Peace Program

Some weeks since, President Taft outlined what he considered to be a "promising path to peace and disarmament." In the course of his remarks, he declared:

If now we can negotiate and put through a positive agreement with some great nation to abide the adjudication of an international arbitral court in every issue which cannot be settled by negotiation, no matter what it involves, whether honor, territory or money, we shall have made a long step forward by demonstrating that it is possible for two nations at least to establish as between them the same system of due process of law that exists between individuals under a government.

The crucial point in this program is the co-operation of "some great nation" with the United States. It is therefore exceedingly gratifying that Sir Edward Gray, Secretary of Foreign Affairs for Great Britain, has responded so heartily in his speech before Commons last week. His words are of peculiar weight, coming as they do from an experienced and responsible statesman. He said:

Arbitration has been increasing, but you must take a long step forward before the increase in arbitration will have an effect upon the expenditures for armaments. I should perhaps have thought it unprofitable to mention arbitration had it not been for the fact that twice within the last twelve months the President of the United States has sketched out a step in advance more momentous than any one thing that any statesman in his position has ventured to say before. His words are pregnant with very far-reaching consequences.

Mr. Taft recently made the statement that he does not see personally any reason why matters of national honor should not be referred to a court of arbitration. He has also expressed the opinion that if the United States could negotiate a positive agreement with some other nation to abide by the adjudication of an international arbitral court on every question that could not be settled by negotiation, no matter what was involved, a long step forward would be taken.

* * * * *

I do not think that a statement of this kind made by a man in Mr. Taft's position should go without response. In entering into an agreement of that kind there would be risks and you would have to be prepared for some sacrifice of national pride in such an agreement as that proposed by the United States. We should be delighted to receive such a proposal. I should feel it something so far reaching in its consequences that it required not only the signature of both governments, but the deliberately decided sanction of Parliament. That, I believe, would be obtained. * * *

What may be impossible to one generation may be possible to another. The great nations of the earth are in bondage, increasing bondage, and it is not impossible that in some of the future years they will discover, as individuals have discovered, that the law is a better remedy than force, and that in all the time they have been in bondage, the prison door has been locked on the inside.

More significant than Sir Edward's speech is the heartiness with which his words seem to have been greeted by the English public. Nor is the opportunity for deliverance from military bondage likely to be delayed to "some of the future years," as he has indicated. A treaty such as he and President Taft have outlined is already being negotiated.

The Corporation Tax Constitutional

In a decision handed down last week, the United States Supreme Court sustained the validity of the corporation income tax provisions of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. The taxing of particular lines of business, such as the refining of sugar and petroleum, is not a new thing with the national government, but heretofore the levy has been made regardless of the class of institution doing the business, individuals, partnerships and corporations sharing a like tax under like conditions.

The fact that the present law imposes a tax on corporations and exempts individuals and partnerships was urged as a sufficient reason for an adverse ruling. The court, however, found corporations enjoying privileges which put them in a class to themselves and justify the imposition of special taxes. Some of these advantages are obvious; for instance, there is the continuity of the business, without interruption by death or dissolution; the transfer of property interests by the disposition of shares of stock; the advantages of business controlled and managed by corporate directors; the general absence of individual liability; these and other things inhere in a business thus conducted, which do not exist when the same business is carried on by private individuals or partnerships. It is this distinctive privilege which is the subject of taxation.

To offset the objection that the law was unconstitutional because it imposed a direct tax, the court pointed out that the tax was determined not by the amount of property held by a corporation, but by its volume of business.

The decision is considered a new departure in American jurisprudence, since it establishes the Government's right to interfere with an institution which is the creation of a State and gives it a weapon by which it can control the trade carried on by corporations, whether they be interstate or local.

What Has Been Found on Mount Gerizim

Professor Reisner, of Harvard University, who has been directing excavations on the site of the ancient city of Samaria, claims to have discovered relics from the reigns of Omri and Ahab. The most interesting item in his statement is that he was able to identify the palace of Jezebel, and found many jewels and charms, some of which without much doubt belonged to the personal adornment of that beautiful but cruel queen. He says that the evidence found goes to substantiate the character which the Bible gives to Jezebel.

The Mexican Revolt

We know comparatively little about what is really happening on the other side of the Mexican border, since the Diaz Government has for weeks maintained the strictest possible censorship of news. The rebels tell only of their successes, and the government is disposed to minimize the trouble.

Judging by what can be gleaned from the daily press, the disaffection continues to spread in the Northern States, especially in Chihuahua, and is more or less sporadic all over the republic.

The Mexican Minister of Finance last week returned from New York to Mexico with the avowed purpose of persuading the Diaz Government to accede to the demands of the insurrectionists, who claim to desire only a new general election with the privilege of casting a free ballot.

Railroads and The New Interstate Commerce Ruling

As a result of the recent ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission denying the proposed increase in freight rates, the New York Central has reduced its dividends from 6 per cent. to 5 per cent. This, at least, is the reason assigned by President Brown; and there are indications that other railroads are preparing for similar reductions. The St. Paul, Northern Pacific, and Great Northern, all 7 per cent. stocks, are selling on the market at a price anticipatory of a cut to 6 per cent.; and the Baltimore & Ohio, a 6 per cent. stock, is selling around a 5 per cent. level.

The Great Bible.

Immediately following the death of William Tyndale, the political changes in England came with such rapidity and with such revolutions of sentiment that it is difficult to follow the evolution of opinion among the clergy and the ruling class in favor of the Bible. The glow had scarcely died away from the burning Scriptures at the cross of St. Paul's when the very bishop who had contemptuously hurled the Bible into the flames from his pulpit, allowed the identical translation to go forth to the English people, bearing not only his approval, but his "ryghte reverende name."

Such rapid changes in opinion are not surprising when we remember that the office of bishop was dependent upon court favor. Just at that time Henry VIII was not only breaking with the Roman Catholic Church, but was also breaking with the customs and traditions of the English people. In order to remain secure, he was compelled to make some concessions to his subjects. The right to the Scriptures was one of these concessions. During his reign the Bible had a friend at court. It was now unsafe to oppose Bible translations. It was therefore expedient for the bishop, who had chanted hymns while the odors of the burning Bible were going up as "a sweet incense to Almighty God," to, within three years, be more willing to have the translation, which he had condemned, licensed by the king than to receive £1,000.

Following the death of Tyndale, three translations appeared within as many years. In fact, the Bible of Myles Coverdale appeared in the very year of Tyndale's death. This translation is sometimes called the "Treacle Bible," from its rendering of Jer. 8:22: "Is there no treacle in Gilead?"

Coverdale was in no way the equal of his great predecessor. He did not have the ability nor the character to improve upon the work which had been done before him. His Bible makes no pretence to be an original translation; he translates "out of Douche and Latin into English." He evidently followed Tyndale's version very closely in the New Testament. His ability to translate into elegant English may be judged by the following curious impressions:

Joshua 2:11.—"Our heart had fayled us, neither was there good stomacke in any manne."

Judges 9:53.—"And brake his brain-panne."

In 1537 "Matthews Bible" appeared, being the work of John Rogers, whose pronounced views as a reformer made it necessary for him to suppress his real name as likely to injure the circulation of the book. This work was simply Tyndale's translation in its entirety, with the exception of the latter half of the Old Testament, which was taken with some revision from Coverdale's Bible.

The third translation to appear within these eventful three years was "Taverner's Bible," which was little more than an edition of Matthew's Bible with its anti-papal notes somewhat modified.

"None of these translations," says J. Paterson Smith, "was satisfactory. Coverdale's was but a second-hand translation, and Matthew's was only in part derived from the originals, besides which the controversial notes were against its success."

Such a complete change in sentiment had now been wrought that Archbishop Cranmer, with some of the king's advisers, had set their hearts on having a translation that would be really worthy of its position as a national Bible. The suggestion met the approval of the king. Myles Coverdale was forthwith selected to take charge of the work. Naturally no greatly advanced step in translation was to be expected under his direction. In 1539 there issued from his hand the "Great Bible." This translation was little more than a revision of Matthew's Bible by Coverdale, and since Matthew's was simply a translation of Tyndale's version, the "Great Bible" was in reality a revised edition of Tyndale's work. This version received the sanction of the king, who decreed that "in God's name it should go forth among the people." Thus the "Great Bible" became the first authorized English version, and William Tyndale, the martyr, had triumphed at last. The eyes of the king of England had been opened. "The fervent effectual prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

The Geneva Bible.

The next twenty years were troublous times in England. The Protestantism established under Henry VIII and confirmed by Edward VI received a severe blow when Mary came to the throne. She was a devout Catholic, and resolved to uproot every vestige of Protestantism. The English Scriptures came in for their full share of her censure. She decreed that anyone found guilty of reading the English Bible should be punished by death. The severity of the penalty and the diligence with which her decree was enforced drove many of England's most learned men to the Continent for safety. Geneva became a safe retreat for them. There the work of Bible study and revision was carried forward.

When Elizabeth came to the throne of England, conditions were reversed again. Protestantism was restored, and she herself, on the day of her entering into London, received from the hands of the people an English Bible. Amid the applause of the multitude, she lifted the volume to her lips, and then pressed it to her heart, gracefully thanking the people of London for so precious a gift.

It was an auspicious day for the Bible and its friends. The scholars and reformers who had been in exile during the previous reign, returned. Those who had been residing in Geneva brought back with them the fruits of their labors during the years of their banishment in the form of a new version, known as the "Geneva Bible," 1558. The dedication of this book was accepted by Elizabeth, and with its acceptance the dark, troublous days of opposition to the Bible ceased.

The Geneva Bible was afterward called the "Breeches Bible," from its rendering of Genesis 3:7, where we find this statement: "Adam and Eve sewed fig-tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches." (It should be stated, however, that only one edition contained this reading.)

The Geneva version was the most popular Bible that had ever appeared in England, and for sixty years it was without a peer. It was a much cheaper and more usable edition than the cumbrous volumes that had appeared before. From the standpoint of translation it was little more than a revision based chiefly on the work of Tyndale. But from the standpoint of a book for general use, it surpassed all former editions. The Geneva exiles had discovered the Bible as a book for daily use. This edition was printed in the present Roman type, and was the first to recognize the division into verses. It, too, is the first edition to show any of the effect of critical study, for it omits the Apocrypha, the name of St. Paul from the Epistle to the Hebrews, and uses italics for all words not occurring in the original.

The California Field

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

Friends in Pasadena.—Pioneer Meeting of Southern California.

When the fine plateau lying ten miles northeast of Los Angeles, at a mean altitude of 1,200 feet, now covered by the city of Pasadena, with its 32,000 population, was largely a grainfield and sheep pasture, there arrived a company of Friends from Iowa, on Second month 23, 1882, and here established homes. They included Emmor and Tacy Rood, Henry and Harriet Wesley, and Charles Crew and wife, from Cedar County, and Samuel and Leanna Bundy and children Wilson and Eva, Henry Wood and wife, Josiah Stratton and wife, and Lillie Negus, from Linn County. John Painter and family had preceded these from Iowa by eighteen months, and Edith Painter was doubtless the first resident Friend. Adonijah Gregory and family located at Sierra Madre, a few miles eastward, at about the same date.

The first Friends meeting in Pasadena, the date of which can be definitely fixed, was held Seventh month 23, 1882, at the home of William Sharpless, between Mountain and Washington Streets on North Los Robles Avenue, there being present Emmor and Tacy Rood, William Sharpless and family, Frank Heald and wife, Samuel and Leanna Bundy, Lawson Hollingsworth, Adonijah and Margaret Gregory, and the wife of Frank Ball. Following this, meetings were held regularly at different homes, mostly those of Smith James, Emmor Rood, Samuel Bundy and Adonijah Gregory. Adonijah Gregory was the only recorded minister, but Smith James, Emmor Rood and others frequently participated in vocal service.

Martha Dorland, a remarkably useful Friend, first attended the meeting Eleventh month 12, 1882, and Milton and Mary Lindley, Los Angeles, Fourth month 29, 1883. During these months, additional arrivals from Iowa included Robert C. Hiatt and family, Smith James and family, Thomas K. Bufkin and family, and Isaac McCollum and family. The congregation having grown too large for the diminutive living-rooms of those days, a building 16 x 24 was leased from John Painter and fitted up for a meeting-house, with seats of a very primitive character, and here Friends first convened for worship Seventh month 15, 1883. The first Gospel message from a traveling minister echoed by these cheap board walls was that of Ruth M. Hartley, in Sixth month, 1884, followed by one from Samuel Lloyd in Twelfth month, 1884. This little building did service for over three years, and it may still be seen at 824 North Marengo Avenue. If Friends of Pasadena would purchase and preserve this building as the pioneer friends meeting-house of southern California, it would be regarded with an ever deepening interest by their children's children.

A Bible school was organized upon the occupancy of this building, with Adonijah Gregory superintendent and Robert C. Hiatt assistant, and a monthly meeting was organized by Springdale Quarterly Meeting, Iowa, Third month 1, 1884, with Emmor Rood and Ella Negus clerk and assistant for the day. The first permanent officers were Thomas K. Bufkin and Edith Painter, clerk and assistant, and Smith James, treasurer. Lawson D. Hollingsworth was the first member received by request, and Aaron Winder was the first janitor, with a salary of $1.00 per month. The first overseers, appointed First month 2, 1886, were Smith and Elizabeth James, Robert C. Hiatt and Edith Painter.

Soon following the Eastern arrivals above named, came Samuel and Calvin Abbott and families from Kansas, and Eleazar Andrews and wife and others from Iowa, necessitating a larger church building.

A GROUP OF PASADENA FRIENDS.

 Second Row—John Henry Douglas, John H. Green, Hannah T. Green, Wm. H. Coffin, Sophia Hadley, Mary Hill, Sarah Kirk, Sarah McMillan, Lizzie R. Townsend, Dr. J. R. Townsend.
 Third Row—Albert Negus, Mrs. Worden, Martha Van Nuys, Hezekiah Van Nuys, Martha Spencer, Geo. Hammond, Jennie Chambers.
 Lower Row—Tacy Rood, Jane McCracken, Phoebe White, Jane M. Grinnell, Mary Kendall, Linda Coffin, Lavina Hall, Mary G. Hammond, Catharine Andrews.
 Of this group, taken a few months ago, Daniel Lewis, Albert Negus and Lavina Hall, have since passed away.

An acre of ground on North Marengo, cornering on Mountain Street, was purchased, and during the summer of 1886 a building was erected, at a cost of $2,000, with a seating capacity of 300. This was dedicated in Eleventh month.

These dates were approaching the great "land boom" of 1887, and Friends came in increasing numbers, over 100 certificates of membership being received at three sessions of the monthly meeting in this year. Many of these were soon transferred to Whittier, El Modena and Wildomar, where meetings were being organized, making Pasadena for a time a notable center of Church extension.

Here, as in all the older meetings of this coast, Jeremiah A. Grinnell gave valuable pioneer Gospel service, and having served Pasadena as pastor about two years, was succeeded by Reuben Hartley in Tenth month, 1887. Pastors next serving were Dr. Wm. Nicholson and Ruth Ridges. In 1892 Charles E. Tebbetts entered the work, and for eleven years served the meeting with marked devotion and efficiency.

In 1894 the meeting-house was moved nearer the business center, to its present location, and enlarged at a cost of $2,800. A few years ago, during the service of Harry R. Keates, who succeeded Charles E. Tebbetts as pastor, the meeting-house was rebuilt, at a cost of several thousand dollars, and further enlarged, and is now a most commodious church home, including rooms for socials and modern quarters for Bible school and Christian Endeavor.

Charles F. Weigle followed Harry R. Keates as pastor, and he was succeeded by Dr. Sylvester Newlin, now in his second year of service. Dr. Newlin enjoyed the free life of a Hoosier farm in his boyhood, and, commencing at the age of nineteen, taught school ten years, following which he practiced medicine sixteen years. He was recorded a minister at New London, Indiana, in 1892, and followed Luke Woodard as pastor at Kokomo four years, and next gave four and three years' service, respectively at Westfield and Noblesville, Indiana. Dr. Newlin was a steadfast attender of the Bible institute of Earlham College, and as a close and devout student of the Bible, is well equipped for the arduous duties of his present position. He takes a prominent part in the work of the Ministerial Union of the city, and each alternate week, has charge of a large normal class made up of the intermediate and primary Bible school teachers of the city churches.

For eleven years following 1887 the Bible school here was in charge of Wm. H. Coffin as superintendent. In his notably successful work he has a worthy successor in Mary E. Reynolds, under whose direction the features of organized classes and graded work are maintained at a most creditable standard. The highly successful work of this meeting among the Japanese, under the superintendency of Mary A. White, was presented in a previous article. Pasadena meeting shows a gain from year to year, and now numbers 380 members.

Pasadena is the home of Professor John Chawner, presiding clerk of California Yearly Meeting; Mary H. Lewis, reading clerk; Benjamin S. Coppock, superintendent of missions, and John Henry Douglas, the well-known veteran evangelist.

The attractions of Pasadena as a tourists' resort are widely known. The nearness and massive grandeur of the mountains on the north, the wild and rugged scenic views in the gorge of the Arroyo Secco on the west, and the bird's-eye-view of a valley of marvelous fertility afforded from the heights of the city, carry a charm that lingers long with the newcomer. And to these attractions we must add the scenic railway that scales the heights of Mt. Lowe, and the largest telescopic reflector and one of the best equipped astronomical observatories in the world on Mt. Wilson. Plans are nearly matured for building, at an expense of $200,000, a bridge across the Arroyo Secco, that shall be 1,300 feet in length and that shall stand 150 feet above the bottom of the Arroyo.

Enthusiasm, Wise and Otherwise

BY ISAAC SHARPLESS.

A new and energetic movement is apt to produce enthusiasts as well as sane and devoted advocates. Especially is this true of religious movements, which touch the innermost springs of action of the human heart. The early history of the Society of Friends shows this both in England and in America. We have with some the willing sacrifice of all that men hold dear for the sake of truth, with an undoubting consciousness of divine approval, and with others the unreasoning raptures, the eccentric and distraught actions of James Nayler and his deluded followers, and many another man and woman who stands high in Quaker annals. It is no argument against the truth or the propriety, at the basis of an outburst of religious zeal, that such extreme and unreasoning tendencies should exist, though if they carry away the body, they damage rather than aid it. The remedy is, of course, education and the development of the instincts of decorum. If these ultimately triumph, the wilder elements are in time forgotten. The men and women who braved the rigors of New England laws and penalties were heroic, but not always wise or reasonable. Indeed the early Friendly settlers of America in all the colonies contained a good proportion of godly people whom we would not now welcome in our decorous meetings.

Two Dutchmen, Dankers and Sluyter, traveled down and up the Delaware Valley in 1679-80, on their way between New York and Maryland. It will be remembered that this was prior to the purchase of Pennsylvania by William Penn, but after the settlement of West Jersey at Salem and Burlington by Friends. Burlington then contained a group of Friends, and some of these had migrated over the river to the Pennsylvania side, into what is now Bucks and Philadelphia Counties; and a few Salem Friends had crossed to Upland, now Chester. The other dwellers along the river were Swedes and Dutch. Our travelers seem to have come into contact with Friends first at Burlington. "We went into one of the Quakers' meetings, who went to work very uncere- moniously and loosely. What they uttered was mostly in one tone and the same thing, and so it continued until we were tired out and went away." Outside of meeting they say the Quakers were "the most worldly of men," and as an indication of this they found a copy of Virgil on the preacher's table, and also a copy of Van Helmont* on Medicine. "The most of them are miserably self-minded in physical and religious knowledge."

They found Friends at Tacony and at the site of Philadelphia, and then went down to the island of Tinicum. "In the evening there also arrived three Quakers, of whom one was their great prophetess who travels through the country in order to quake. She lives in Maryland, and forsakes husband and children, plantation and all, and goes off for this purpose. She had been to Boston and had been arrested there by the authorities on account of her quakery." "They sat by the fire, and drank a dram of rum with each other, and in a short time began to shake and groan so that we did not know what had happened, and supposed they were going to preach, but nothing came of it."

Thence they went to Upland. Robert Wade, the pioneer Friend of Pennsylvania, having moved over from Salem in 1675, was the one Quaker of whom they spoke with perfect respect. They found him with the "prophetess," engaged in settling a dispute about land and tobacco between two widows, Friends, whom they describe as "mundane, carnal, covetous and artful."

One of these, Anna Salters, had had an interesting history, which our readers will recognize by this description: "She was one of those who, when a certain person gave himself out as the Lord Jesus and allowed himself to be carried around on an ass, shouted 'Hosanna' as he rode over their garments, for which conduct he was arrested, his tongue bored through with a red-hot iron and his forehead branded with a B, for blasphemer. She was not only one of those, but she anointed his head and feet and wiped them with her hair." This, of course, refers to the James Nayler episode in 1655.

They also found other Friends who declared that they were Mary the Mother of the Lord, Mary Magdalene, Martha, and so on. These Robert Wade

*Van Helmont seems to have had a large place among certain Friends in early times. Our travelers say the Friends claimed him as one of themselves, which of course is impossible, as he died in 1644, before George Fox began to preach. George Keith and some of his followers seem to have adopted his doctrine of the "transmigration of souls."

and his wife "could not endure," and put them out of their house.

It may not be necessary to believe these statements exactly as the Dutchmen give them, though in the main their observations on other subjects are accurate in detail. Still less is it necessary to believe that these were the representative Friends of the pre-colonial times. Probably an undue number of these extreme and erratic people came to the province in these early days. In a little time, however, the saner people, Robert Wade, William Penn and their associates, took charge of the situation and brought the enthusiasts into line. They were the outcroppings of the seething emotions of the times, and their isolation from world currents allowed their phantasies free development.

It is more pleasant to read of the strong wise men of the past, who led public opinion in matters of moral and political reform along safe lines; but the existence of the other elements in the turbulent years of our early history should make us charitable towards such excrescences elsewhere and slow to judge a movement by its discreditable representatives.

We are not likely to have any of this outcropping of misguided zeal among us now. Indeed it might be a good thing if there were enthusiasts who would give their message without fear of man to any that needed it, even if their methods would sometimes shock our conventions. The tattered banners and soiled arms of an effective army are not very pleasing, but they tell more of service than the brilliant colors and burnished metal of the volunteers on dress parade.—The Westonian.

Some Views on Present Day Topics

How I Became Convinced—A Talk on the Ordinances

BY WM. P. SMITH.

The question of observing the so-called ordinances presented itself to my mind very forcibly soon after I consecrated my life to God, and so I decided to prayerfully examine the Scriptures for myself. I began at the first of Matthew and read carefully, noting every reference to the subject, and I believe I examined the New Testament, and occasionally some of the Old, without prejudice, for my only desire was to see the truth and God's will concerning myself. Before I had read through the New Testament, I became convinced that no ceremonial rite was established for perpetual observance in the Church or ever required of the Gentile converts.

I think I see why the Lord wanted a people about two hundred and sixty years ago who could demonstrate that the presence of Christ with His Church is not designed to be by symbol, but in real communion with Himself. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?" Does he not still want such living witnesses, who have been "buried therefore with Him through baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life?"

The heading of Chapter 26 in Matthew's Gospel, Authorized Version (the Revised does not give it), where it says, "Instituteth his holy supper," naturally prepares the mind for instruction along this line, but on reading the chapter, I fail to find anything like a "new institution." Nor do I believe anyone who has never been taught there was a new institution, would think of such a thing; instead they would see only a narrative of the last Passover supper which Jesus ate with His disciples. He had desired to be at that supper with them to give them a lesson on the true meaning of the Paschal lamb, of which He was the antitype, soon to be sacrificed. What an opportune moment to lead their minds from what formerly had been the object of their remembrance to Himself, to His body and blood, which the bread and wine stood for or represented. We turn to Mark and find substantially the same record, with no hint of founding a "new institution," not even a reference to the continuance of the Passover Supper. Luke only refers to that, and then not as instituting anything new. But, knowing that the Jewish disciples would continue observing the supper as well as other Jewish ceremonies, it is not strange the Lord would instruct them as to what they should have in mind when eating the supper, telling them to do it in remembrance of Himself instead of their deliverance from death by the blood of the Paschal lamb, or, as Paul gives it, I Cor. 11: 26, "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come." It would seem, from reading St. John's account, that Jesus with His disciples might have eaten the Passover before the Jews did, for the regular time must have been after the lamb was killed. If Jesus died on the Cross at the hour when the Paschal lambs were slain, as many believe, at about 3 o'clock P. M., or the 9th hour, they must have eaten the Passover Supper some hours before the usual time, and that explains John 13: 1, 2, 29, also 18: 28, which seem to refer to a supper or feast yet to be partaken. John makes no reference to a "new institution," nor does he say anything about continuing the ceremony. After describing how Jesus washed the disciples' feet, he quotes the Master as saying: "Ye also ought to wash one another's feet, for I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you." But very few Christians take that as a new ceremonial institution or think it was meant to be taken thus, although it looks more like a command to observe perpetually than Luke's "do this."

To get the full import of Paul's teaching in I Cor. 11th chapter, one should begin at the first of the letter and read it all, particularly Chapter 2: 14, 17, and Chapter 5: 7-9.

Without doubt the Jewish Christians continued the supper indefinitely, but this should not be confused with "feasts of charity" and Paul's "Lord's Supper," which perhaps were not different from Luke's "breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart."

With reference to water baptism, no doubt it was practiced in New Testament times, but the practice of circumcision or other Jewish rites or requirements for a time is no proof that they were made binding upon all new converts. In the absence of any positive command that converts must be baptized in water, it would seem unwise for the Church to make it obligatory.

I think the difficulty with many is that whenever the words baptize, baptism, baptized, etc., are used in the New Testament, they at once think of water and forget how often the terms are used without reference to water. I think the word baptize and its cognates are given as the words of Jesus 18 times by the four writers of the Gospels, and only once did He mean water, and then He said water, unless water was meant in the great commission. If it was, then they were sent to baptize with water; but Paul says he was sent to do that, and did but little of it, though no doubt his commission was equal to any of these. He seems to have understood the commission to mean no more than Luke expresses:

"That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." The disciples had no power of themselves to baptize with the Holy Ghost, but they were actively instrumental in the work, for "through the laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Spirit was given," and Peter speaks of that power conferred upon them as "the gift of God" (Acts 8:20). It was while Peter was preaching to the Gentiles that "the Holy Spirit fell on them" (see Acts 11:15). "As I began to speak, the Holy Spirit fell on them even as on us at the beginning." Ananias said to Saul: "The Lord even Jesus * * * hath sent me that thou mayest * * * be filled with the Holy Spirit." So it appears that through their God-anointed ministry the baptism came.

I am confident, from what is given in Acts 15, that no outward rites or ceremonies were required of the Gentile converts, nor are necessary for any Christians to practice.

I have not attempted any lengthy argument upon the subject, nor do I claim all I have written to be original, but have only given some of my honest convictions.

The evangelistic meetings recently held at Winchester, Ind., in which Daisy Barr, Muncie, and Leora Bogue, Fairmount, assisted, resulted in about 50 conversions, and 40 applications for membership with Friends. The large meeting-house was crowded at almost every service and no statistics can adequately tell what was done. Six entire families are among those who united with the Church.

Geo. C. Levering, pastor at Winchester, Ind., recently gave a most instructive series of First-day evening lectures, illustrated with beautiful stereopticon views. The large church building was crowded at each lecture and all were enthusiastic in their appreciation of the views and of the lectures. Japan, China, India and Turkey were visited in turn, while two evenings were devoted to the problems of our own land.

A series of meetings was commenced at Northbranch, Kans., Second month 13th, and continued three weeks, which resulted in a number of conversions and a general quickening of the membership. A number of strong men in the middle walks of life were reached.

The meeting was conducted by John C. Griffin, who is serving the meeting very acceptably as pastor, assisted by J. Perry and Martha Hadley and Cora Lamb, Wichita, Kan.

A remarkable revival occurred at Rose Hill, Kan., where Frank E. and William C. Kinsey, Indiana, recently conducted evangelistic meetings. The effort had a wide reaching effect, some coming 15 miles to the meetings. At times the meeting-house could not accommodate the people. Some would wait until the close of the service and come in after part of the congregation had been dismissed. Whole families were converted. There had been no previous awakening in this community for a number of years.

Carmel Quarterly Meeting was held at Carmel, Ind., the 11th and 12th inst. Simon N. Hester, Ridgefarm, Ill., addressed the Quarterly Meeting Christian Endeavor Union and preached an able sermon on First-day. Friends at Noblesville made a special request to have the next quarterly meeting held there. The invitation was accepted, and for the first time in the history of the quarterly meeting it will be held at another point than Carmel. Fred. Cope, the pastor at Noblesville, preached a powerful sermon Seventh-day.

Work in the Friends Meeting at Oakland, Cal., is moving steadily on. The Bible school has an enrollment of 200, with an average attendance of 150. The meetings for worship are well attended. A number who are not members manifest a deep interest, so that a good work is being done and a strong church is developing. Nearly all the members are "new Friends," so that the meeting finds it pleasant to have in attendance those who were "brought up Friends," and often feels that "a visit from a traveling minister" would be very refreshing.

This year, for the first time, the summer school of the University of Pennsylvania will introduce a course on Child Hygiene by Dr. Walter S. Cornell. Lectures will be given daily at 10 A. M. from Seventh month 5th to Eighth month 16th, and will include Anatomy, Physiology, Hygiene and Physical Education. The effects of stimulants and narcotics will be taught, making the instruction valuable to teachers working under the law (in every State) requiring this teaching in connection with lessons on Physiology and Hygiene. Parents, nurses, social workers and others can learn much concerning the scientific reasons for total abstinence, as well as of general health matters.

At Portland Quarterly Meeting, Portland, Ind., held the 11th and 12 inst, Edward E. Hartley, Keystone, preached very helpfully. During the business session on Seventh-day the subject of opening a meeting at Pleasant Valley, in Adams County, near Monroe, Ind., was discussed, and the quarterly meeting appointed a committee to inquire into the situation. An interesting report of the work at Pennville, Ind., where a meeting has been newly established, was given by DeWitt Foster. The Friends there have subscribed nearly $3,000 for a new building, the contract for which is to be let soon. The attendance at this session of the quarterly meeting was the best in its history, and much interest was shown throughout.

A revival effort is in progress in Portland Meeting, conducted by the pastor.

The new college building at Pacific College, Newberg, Oregon, was opened for the use of the student body the 6th inst., but in order to do so it was necessary for the students to lend a helping hand. A holiday was taken in which they did credit to themselves wielding brushes, brooms, and dust cloths. Not only did they hasten the time when they were enabled to use the building, but they saved the management at least $125. At the close of their hard day's work a bountiful supper was served and a social hour followed.

On the 7th inst., the fifth number of their lecture course was given in the auditorium of the new building. Every seat was taken and the thousand new opera chairs were insufficient to accommodate the audience.

The Women's Auxiliary of Pacific College, now numbering nearly 300, is steadily growing and its committees are actively engaged in their various lines of work.

The meeting at Spiceland, Ind., has grown in interest and attendance since Charles Lescault and wife, formerly of Oklahoma, began pastoral work there. They have greatly endeared themselves to the people in their social intercourse among them.

Spiceland Quarterly Meeting was held at Spiceland, Ind., from the 10th to the 12th inst. Credentials were presented for Martilla Cox. Charles Whitely, Ira Johnson and Mearl Wilson were also in attendance and appeared in the ministry. Edna Harvey was recorded a minister of the Gospel, her gift having been duly recognized. Full and interesting reports were received from the Temperance and Peace Committees. Timothy Nicholson, Richmond, Ind., made an able plea for mission classes. Charles Whitely presented the needs of Southland College, and a subscription of $25 was taken to help that institution.

Hesper Quarterly Meeting met in the new meeting-house at Kansas City, Mo., the 11th and 12 inst. Frank W. Dell, Evangelistic Superintendent of Nebraska Yearly Meeting, was present with very helpful service in preaching. During the business session special consideration was given to the subjects, "How Best to Care for Isolated and Small Meetings" and "The Best Method of Utilizing the Sessions of the Quarterly Meeting Other Than Those Devoted to Business and Worship," and Seventh-day evening and First-day afternoon were devoted to the consideration of methods for Bible school work. Several addresses were delivered.

This was the first quarterly meeting held in the new meeting-house, and the modern facilities and arrangements added much to the comfort and pleasure of those present.

Friends in Kansas City are very much alive spiritually, and are at work trying to build up their Bible school, and meet the needs of the community in which they have recently located. They are looking forward with considerable hope to the arrival of Arthur Jones, who will take up pastoral work there in the near future.

New Garden Quarterly Meeting was held at Greensboro, N. C., the 11th and 12th inst. James R. Jones and Leanah Hobson were the visiting ministers in attendance. After some discussion the meeting decided to ask its isolated members to hold meetings for worship in their own homes to which their interested neighbors might be invited; and recommended that the home meetings lend such encouragement and help as they could. From the reports it appeared that cottage prayer meetings are succeeding quite well in different places, and that family devotion is on the increase.

Friends at Greensboro are co-operating with the other denominations in evangelistic work. Pomona Monthly Meeting reported a series of meetings conducted by Amos M. Kenworthy, California, and John S. Kimber, Rhode Island, which resulted in awakening several to a new spiritual life and the accession of 28 to the local meeting. This meeting also reported that all of its members are clear of the use of tobacco.

The growth of the Boy Scout Movement in Greensboro was considered with some misgivings as to its military features, and a committee was appointed to investigate the movement and visit the Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. and the Local Ministerial Association if it was deemed advisable to do so.

A suggestion was sent down to the several local meetings to collect funds for the relief of the famine-stricken districts of China and for missions in British East Africa.

A unique celebration took place at South Windham, Maine, Sixth-day the 10th inst., it being the 101st birthday of Mary Goddard, a member of that meeting. Friends gathered at the meeting-house for an all-day celebration, including a basket dinner. Charles M. Woodman, Portland and E. T. Garland, State Superintendent of the Maine Bible Society, and others appeared on the program. Among them Mary Goddard herself who opened her remarks by saying "this is no funeral service; we are here today to worship God and consider the things of religion," and she spoke vigorously for twenty minutes.

Mary Goddard is the daughter of David and Waite Douglass. Early in life she became identified with a little group of Friends at Durham, Maine. Being a tailoress by trade, she was called from house to house filling engagements, and often living with a family two or three weeks at a time. In this way she became well acquainted with a great many families, and formed many warm friendships which lasted for years. In 1856 she united in marriage with Mark Knight of Windham, but after five years was left a widow. In 1870 she became the wife of Robert Goddard of Brunswick, a devout Friend, and their mutual interests naturally developed in both a very deep and living attachment for the church. She has lived in South Windham for many years, and latterly has been the object of tender care and solicitude on the part of devoted relatives. She is a recognized minister of the Gospel

The new academy building at Northbranch, Kan. (the dedication of which was noted in a recent issue), marks a degree of thrift and prosperity unusual for our older academies in the Middle West. The new plant is the property of the Northbranch Academy Association which has leased it to Friends for ninety-nine years.

In the basement of the building is a gymnasium 30 by 54 feet; an engine room and a room 20 by 20 feet to be fitted up for a laboratory. The main floor is divided into a chapel, the main school room and two class rooms with cloak rooms and halls convenient. These with gallery open into one audience room with seating capacity of 500 persons. Besides these there is an upper room 20 by 50 feet.

The building is steam-heated throughout and equipped with a gasoline light plant. A new 40-inch bell swings in the tower.

Northbranch Academy was founded in 1889 at the instigation of Friends, but is not in a legal sense a denominational school. The citizens generally took hold of it from the start and they are still giving it both moral and financial support.

Only three of the nine members of the Academy board are appointed by Friends, the other members being appointed by the Association.

The work of this school on the whole has been highly satisfactory. The aim is to do all in the way of educating the young that the State schools will do but with an emphasis upon religion and morals sufficient to insure if possible great stability of character with the other accomplishments of refinement. Its graduates and students are numbered among the missionaries and Bible school workers and politicians of a right sort and are scattered nearly all over the world.

Married

DILLON-HADLEY.—Near Northbranch, Kans., Second month 7, 1911, Luther H. Dillon and Jennie Hadley, both members of Northbranch Monthly Meeting.

Died

BINFORD.—At the home of her daughter, Elizabeth Willard, Lanton, Mo., Third month 4, 1911, Rachel Binford, aged eighty-six years. The deceased was a member of Indiana Yearly Meeting, and a recorded minister.

DAVIS.—At her home in Shelby County, Indiana, Twelfth month 29th, 1910, Eliza Ann Davis, daughter of Joseph and Judith Davis, in her eighty-fourth year. She was a birthright Friend, and ever a loyal member.

DILLON.—At her home near Northbranch, Kans., First month 4, 1911. Elizabeth F. Dillon, age sixty-five years. She was a birthright member of Friends and served as an elder many years.

HANKS.—At the home of her son, near Sterling, Kan., Second month 5, 1911, Sarah Jane Hanks, aged nearly seventy-three years. She was a birthright Friend and an elder in Sterling Monthly Meeting at the time of her death.

SECOND QUARTER, LESSON I.

FOURTH MONTH 2, 1911.

ELISHA HEALS NAAMAN.

II KINGS 5: 1-27.

(For Special Study, Verses 1-14.)

GOLDEN TEXT.—Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else. Isa. 45: 22.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Third month 27. Naaman's journey, II Kings 5: 1-7.

Third-day. Naaman's cleansing. II Kings 5: 8-14.

Fourth-day. Gehazi punished. II Kings 5: 15-27.

Fifth-day. Elisha sent only to Naaman. Luke 4: 16-30.

Sixth-day. Leprosy of Miriam. Num. 12: 1-15.

Seventh-day. Leprosy of Uzziah. II Chron. 26: 16-23.

First-day. Healing a leper. Mark 1: 40-45.

Time.—Uncertain; possibly in the reign of Jehoram who reigned B. C. 861-849, or 904-894.

Place.—First, Damascus, then in Israel, and at the Jordan. Damascus was about 110 miles in a direct line from Samaria.

Rulers.—No name is given for either the Israelitish or the Syrian monarch.

The story, which forms the lesson, is one of the most familiar of Bible stories, and is told with charming simplicity and yet force. Innumerable teachings and sermons have been given, based on one or more of the incidents. The lessons are simple, obvious, and graphic. It is one of the Old Testament incidents referred to by Christ, who uses it to illustrate the truth that the love of God extended farther than the limits of the chosen race; that His fatherhood is co-extensive with the whole family of man. (Luke 4: 27.)

The narrative gives a very pleasing impression of the character of Naaman—the fact that the Hebrew captive maid wished for his recovery; the evident friendship of his monarch; the devotion of his servants; the gratitude towards Elisha, all mark out an unusually fine character.

1. The story begins abruptly. "Honorable." Receiving honor. "Victory unto Syria." R. V. It is not said against what foe. "But he was a leper." A terrible "but." He had all earthly success, but he also had an incurable disease. It is clear that lepers were not segregated in Damascus as they were later, at least, in Israel. The disease in Naaman may not have progressed far, or it may have been a kind that does not always spread; but it is evident that he felt, and his friends felt, that a terrible fate was more than possible.

2. "By hands." R. V. Like the Scotch raiders into England in the old days.

3. A beautiful picture of unselfishness. It also teaches what great results may follow from very simple means.

4. Her clear and emphatic story made a great impression, and reached the ears of the king. The Septuagint has a fuller account; it runs: "And she (Naaman's wife) went in and told her Lord, and he told the King and said 'Thus and thus,'" etc.

5. Naturally the King thought that the King of Israel would know all about so great a prophet. The presents were of great value; so much so that it is not unlikely there has been some error in transcription. According to the usual way of reckoning the talent, the total value would be in the neighborhood of $80,000 in addition to the "raiment" which still is a not unusual gift in the East.

6. It is evident that there was no direct mention of Elisha in the letter.

7. "Rent his clothes." As if he had received bad news. He thought that the Syrian King wished to pick a quarrel in asking him to cure a man of an incurable disease.

8. It is evident that Elisha was residing in Samaria, and such an incident as the arrival of Naaman would soon come to his ears. He was jealous for his God.

9. Elisha is pictured as living in his own house, not with the "sons of the prophets." "Chariots." R. V.

10. "Sent a messenger." This was to show that he, personally, had nothing to do with the cure, but that it was the work of Jehovah. He wished to make the cure as different as possible from those of the prophets of other gods who used incantations and much mummery.

11. "Was wrath." This was very natural and Naaman is not to be blamed. Such treatment was wholly contrary to experience. He indicates by his words what would doubtless have been part of the ceremony of other healers. "Strike." Better, as in R. V., "wave." It is hardly likely that one would have touched the leprosy in any case. "Recover." "Cure," an old use of the word.

12. The rivers of Damascus were celebrated for their purity, while the Jordan was muddy.

13. "In a rage." Very human. The Jordan was at least 20 miles distant and to be sent there by a man who would not even come out to see him was a great insult in his estimation. And it was according to the rules and customs then prevailing, even more than it would be now.

13. "My father." An expression of the highest respect. The argument is skilfully put. Of course he would have done almost anything, however great, to rid himself of his trouble. Like many persons at the present day, Naaman thought that a great evil could be eradicated only for what he considered great or impressive means. It may be so, but it is not always so; besides this, our estimates of what is really great and powerful may be mistaken.

14. Naaman showed the real greatness of his character by listening to reason and complying with what seemed to him a trifling command.

15-17. Now Naaman is more than ready to go in and stand before Elisha and call himself Elisha's servant. He was anxious also to show his appreciation of what had been done for him. But as Elisha had refused to do anything which might be construed as taking away the glory from Jehovah, so now he refused to receive any personal reward. He must not be regarded as one who wrought wonders for reward. The sad conclusion to the story—the action of Gehazi—needs little comment; the teaching is clear. In essentials he was an Old Testament Judas.

Two points in Naaman's story may be noted. (1) His asking for some earth of Israel. It was the belief of the times that the deity of a country could only be worshiped in that country; therefore, in order to worship Jehovah in Syria, it was needful for some earth of Israel to be transported there. (2) The request of Naaman to be allowed to bow himself in the house of Rimmon. As is so often the case, we must be careful not to read back into the days of the past ideas which came later. Elisha evidently allowed Naaman to follow his usual custom. He could hardly have expected Naaman to break at once with all his old ideas and education. It was enough that he recognized Jehovah, and he trusted that he would see the futility of a purely external worship. It was something like the saying, "Wear thy sword as long as thou canst."

"How often does your road kill a man?" asked a facetious traveling salesman of a Central Branch conductor the other day.

"Just once," replied the conductor.—Kennebec Journal.

A FOOD STORY.

MAKES A WOMAN OF 70 "ONE IN 10,000."

The widow of one of Ohio's most distinguished newspaper editors and a famous leader in politics in his day, says she is 70 years old and a "stronger woman than you will find in ten thousand," and she credits her fine physical condition to the use of Grape-Nuts:

"Many years ago I had a terrible fall which permanently injured my stomach. For years I lived on a preparation of corn starch and milk, but it grew so repugnant to me that I had to give it up. Then I tried, one after another, a dozen different kinds of cereals, but the process of digestion gave me great pain.

"It was not until I began to use Grape-Nuts food three years ago that I found relief. It has proved, with the dear Lord's blessing, a great boon to me. It brought me health and vigor such as I never expected to again enjoy, and in gratitude I never fail to sound its praises." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a Reason."

Look for it in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," to be found in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

which finds greater application in Europe than in this country; yet it is estimated that we have in this country a permanent, professional army of vagrants numbering some 40,000, who might for the most part be forced to a self-supporting status on tramp farms during such time as they now pass in idleness in jails and work-houses that are nonproductive. As it is they are an economic burden upon the community all the year round as well as a menace to the public peace and security of property.

Of the three thousand trophies which Theodore Roosevelt brought to the Smithsonian Institution from Africa, only one-sixtieth part will be placed on exhibition. Although there is a very large number of specimens, not more than 50 different kinds could be detected among them by an untrained observer. The bulk of the collection, therefore, will be deposited in store rooms where it will be easily accessible to naturalists, or anyone who may be interested in studying the immense number of specimens in detail. It seems that several years will be required to classify the collection properly.

The National Association for the Study of Tuberculosis is sparing no pains in making Fourth month 30th a "tuberculosis day" among the churches of America. Cardinal Gibbons of the Roman Catholic Communion has voiced his approval which practically insures its observance by a large number of our immigrant population who so sadly need instruction along this line. The National Association has prepared an outline for a tuberculosis lecture especially adapted for those who will speak on Tuberculosis Day, and also other literature which will be sent to anyone applying for it at the office of the National Association, 105 East 22d Street, New York City.

Oranges Ripen Earlier as You Go Northward

Owing to climatic conditions, oranges in the extensive orchards about Lindsay, Tulare County, Cal., ripen six weeks earlier than they do in the section about Los Angeles, 240 miles south, thus furnishing to the growers a top-price market.

These climatic conditions also exclude scale pests, saving large annual expense to the grower, and assuring him of clean and desirable fruit.

Olive, grapes, deciduous fruits and alfalfa all grow luxuriantly, and to great profit. The near-by mountains, with their winter mantle of snow in view for 50 miles, furnish an exhaustless supply of water, with electric energy that affords power and light for every home in the valley.

One of the giant Sequoia National Parks is only 40 miles away, affording a delightful summer resort.

A Friends meeting has been established with every prospect of an increasing membership.

The Harp of Truth

Men's lives, if strung to noble purposes,
Thrill to God's finger; and clear notes arise
Which arouse the soul with news of some glad hope:
The Maker sweeps His chords and long mute truth
Bursts into song and wins the hearts of men.

The Harp of Truth hath many messages,—
For heaven hath infinite music,—tones that wake
A nation into freedom, or that strike
With their alarum peal the stainless soul
And call it into battle, other strains,
Swelling or softening as the Master wills,
Which fill the heart with their melodious joy,
Though manifold the music, all is wrought
Through human lives outstretched before their Lord,
Each in the place of service He hath willed
And vibrant to His finger.

Seventh-day. The city cleansed. Zech. 14: 20, 21.

Give one reason why we should vote for temperance.

What means may we employ to cleanse our city?

Give from the newspapers one effect of drunkenness.

The prohibition sentiment is sweeping over the country like a great tidal wave. Since 1903 more States have voted out the saloon than during all the preceding years of the country's history, and during the same period greater gains have been made for controlling the liquor traffic in States that have not as such outlawed the saloon.

* * *

We submit below statements that tell the story of the progress of prohibition from the standpoint of the U. S. Government and the brewers.

Fifty miles of saloons closed in 1908, and the liquor bill less than the year before by $217,000,000.00. In 1909, forty-one saloons closed a day, sixty miles of them in a year, over two million less barrels of whiskey drank, and the estimated drink bill lowered by $412,000,000.00.

Julius Liebman, the head of the United Brewery of the United States, in an address to the brewers in June, 1909, says that the prohibition wave had curtailed the output of beer in the United States over five million barrels in eighteen months' time.

In a private letter to a saloon-keeper friend, one of the largest wholesale wineries in the country lamented that, "Here in Virginia we are fighting for our very existence; if this thing continues much longer we shall all be broke, even if we win." Which may not be an over grammatical sentence but one plain to understand. The writer continues, "In the last year we have lost over $300,000.00 of established trade, legislated out of existence."

* * *

Ex-Governor Glenn of North Carolina makes an argument against the saloon on these two propositions:

"First, nothing that makes the individual in the community poorer adds to the wealth and power of that community; and will any of you dare to say, who goes and looks at the home and property and the person of a drunkard, that the drinking man adds to the value of any nation? Second, nothing that renders men less able to give to their community and to their God their physical and mental and moral powers, can help that community or glorify that God."

Again he quotes figures that tell their own story:

"In Ohio, before it became a local option State, the liquor revenue was $4,100,000 a year. How much did Ohio spend on account of the liquor for added crime, for poverty and insanity, to say nothing of sickness and death? Seven million two hundred thousand dollars; or in other words, the traffic cost Ohio $3,100,000 more than it paid in revenue."

"In 1908, there were 9,350 murders in the United States of America—only three in Maine. In 1908, Governor Hoch of Kansas said that the people of Kansas had $160,000,000 in their banks, and paupers were absolutely an unknown quantity."

* * *

In Nebraska, last November, Wm. J. Bryan broke away from his party because they had nominated as governor a man who was not in favor of advanced temperance legislation. He stumped the State before election, hiring halls at his own expense. The following is a sample of his terrific arraignment of the liquor interests:

"I am not willing to turn the Democratic party over to the brewers and make it the open and avowed champion of the liquor interests. . . . The liquor business is on the defensive; its representatives are, for the most part, lawless themselves and in league with lawlessness. They are in partnership with the gambling hell and the brothel. They are the most corrupt and corrupting influence in politics, and I shall not, by voice or vote, aid them in establishing a reign of terror in this State. . . . I shall contribute whatever assistance I can to the effort which will be made to put an end to the spree upon which our party seems to have embarked. I am not willing that the party shall die of delirium tremens."

* * *

Forty-five millions of the people of the land, one-half of the inhabitants, are living in territory in which the liquor traffic has been forbidden by law. Twenty-five of the thirty millions of the people living in the Southern States have already abolished the saloon by local option or by State prohibitory law.

News in Brief

The Colorado Legislature has ratified the proposed amendment to the General Constitution providing for an income tax.

* * *

The report is again current that David Lloyd George will be compelled by ill-health to resign from his post as chancellor of the exchequer in the British cabinet.

* * *

For a second time the New Hampshire House last week passed a resolution favoring the proposed income tax amendment to the Federal Constitution. Some time ago the House, by a viva voce vote, passed such a resolution, but it was killed in the Senate. It was reintroduced in the House and passed last week by a vote of 249 to 6.

"Moderation in all things, especially moderation in eating, is the main thing to which I attribute my good health," said President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot, of Harvard, the day on which he was seventy-seven years old.

"A man should not retire from active life as long as he is in good health. Exercise has helped toward keeping my health as it is, but the great thing is moderation."

Governor Wilson, in his hard fight for the elections bill which he has been urging in fulfillment of party pledges, found that the Democratic organization was steadily being used against him. He sent for State Chairman Nugent, and the latter proceeded to insult the Governor by declaring that patronage was being used to get votes for the pending bill. Nugent was at once shown the door and the affair was made public. This is precisely the sort of thing that Governor Wilson promised to do. He is for real publicity and work in the open, not for government in dark corners or under a blanket. One cannot help wondering what would happen to Murphy if he lived in New Jersey, or if Woodrow Wilson were Governor at Albany.

On the 20 inst., the State Department gave out an official statement in regard to the "International Conference for the Suppression of the Opium Evil," which is now officially appointed to meet at the Hague Seventh month 12th. This conference is closely related to, but entirely independent of the great battle that is going on in China between the Chinese and the British Governments in regard to the immediate prohibition of opium in that country. Great Britain has insisted on excluding from the Hague conference in Seventh month the main opium question, the forcing of British opium upon China. It is to be hoped that the postponement of this Hague conference from the original date in Fifth month has been made with a view of settling the Chinese issue before the international conference convenes.

"With the Spirit and the Understanding Also."

I heard a sermon recently which has given me much "food for reflection." There was little "food" in the sermon itself, but it set me thinking seriously about the real effect of such ministry. From the beginning to the end there was nothing in the sermon which furnished my mind with a single significant truth that I could lay hold of and appreciate. It consisted of sentences, following one another by a loose association of words; that is to say, a prominent word in one sentence suggested the next sentence to the speaker's mind. No central idea, or thought, or truth, or principle ruled and directed the train of his discourse. It was, too, all given with a powerful intonation, which very quickly became painfully monotonous and hard to endure.

But the thing that impressed me most was not that it was lacking in ideas—for many very good sermons have only a slender stock of ideas—but that it was lacking in spiritual atmosphere and feeling, in a grasp of reality and in a penetration into the meaning of life. It took you nowhere and opened no windows of vision out upon anything. It produced no vague sense even of those realities that are too deep for words. There are times when one listens to a very simple sermon, pitched at the level of the child's mind, and yet one's whole inner being is moved because a feeling of reality is produced, a vision of undiscovered worlds is opened. This the sermon to which I refer failed to do, and there was a distinct sense of relief when its end came. I would not speak unkindly of the good man who preached the sermon. He was not to blame. He has through long years formed a habit which is now beyond his control.

Year after year his manner and habits have unconsciously grown more mechanical, and the persons who have listened to his speaking have failed to give him advice and suggestions which might have corrected his fault and defects until now it is too late. I am referring to it only because there is a powerful lesson involved in the incident. Those of us who are mature and settled and more or less spiritual can easily sit through such preaching without suffering anything further than a slight impatience. But it is not so with the young and immature. They may not revolt; they may not protest; they may not even criticize; but there is a deadening effect upon them which is pitiful. They sag down and endure a lot of words which give them neither food nor vision, and they come away from it with their religious tone and their spiritual appreciation unconsciously lowered. Poor, unilluminated, uncreative preaching does for the spiritual sense what bad-colored supplements in Sunday newspapers do to children's artistic sense. It is possible to stand the flow of associated words—to bear it as an ordeal—but before one knows it, he is in some degree case-hardened, "Gospel-hardened"; the words flow over him, but nothing happens. The bloom of appreciation is gone; the fine bursts of spiritual enthusiasms suffer a chilling frost—and only the virtue of endurance is left.

If someone would make a detailed historical study of some meeting which has been preached to for a generation by a person who has ceased to grow, who pours out the same stock of ideas and phrases as the years go by, and who does not quicken life or open fresh visions, the impression made by the study would be striking. I know of one such meeting—in my childhood it was large and impressive; now it is in the cemetery behind the meeting-house, with no stream of spiritual succession. It was preached first into lethargy, and then into death, and all the time the person who was preaching meant well and gave good, full measure. But a meeting grows only when it is in a current of expanding life. Enthusiasm must be aroused, loyalty must be kindled, appreciation must be awakened, a living group-spirit must be created, and everything that only damps and deadens is serious.

Not only, therefore, for the sake of the preacher himself, but for the sake of the precious flock we must be frank and honest in dealing with these matters and we must give our truest counsel to those who preach, particularly in the early stages of their ministry. It is difficult enough to preach at best, and we owe it to those who are willing to take up the burden to give them all the wisdom we can to help them to find the track of light that opens more and more into the full day and to show them how to avoid manners and habits which will finally become weights and handicaps to their service. Current Events and Comments

Conversion

An unsigned article in the current number of The British Friend enlarges suggestively on the meaning of "conversion." Commenting on the popular meaning of the term, the writer tells how a lecturer at a summer school, who was a preacher and certainly a devout and deeply experienced Christian, told of the trouble he once, in his rash youth, got into in a company of people, by saying "he thanked the Lord he had never been converted." He went on to explain that what he meant was that he could not remember the time when he had not earnestly desired to follow Christ, and that there had been no right-about-face in his religious experience. And that is probably exactly true of a vast number more. We feel instinctively that there is something unreal and hypocritical in trying to profess to have experienced a complete change in our lives just because such profession is expected of us. If "conversion" necessarily means a turning right round from a life of entire and wilful disobedience to or neglect of, God and Christ, we cannot claim to have been "converted," for we never were traveling that road. We should not in the least deny that for some people it is true enough; but it seems to us to make for insincerity and unreality if we demand that everybody, including many who from their earliest years have wished to do right (however often they may have failed to do so), shall profess a total change of life and purpose.

"We do not always remember," so the writer says, "that two things are necessary for a really good life: To see right and to do right." It seems, from the Old Testament record, that the apostle Paul's sense of sin should be attributed to his blindness rather than to his wilful disobedience. "I vainly thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus," so he tells us; and he lived thus with all good conscience toward God until the vision came that opened a new world for him. Thus his "conversion" consisted in gaining a right sense of seeing, rather than the forsaking of sinful practices.

So also with George Fox. The "sense of sin" in his case was not a consciousness of wilful disobedience. "When I came to eleven years of age," he says, "I knew pureness and righteousness; for while a child I was taught how to walk to be kept pure. The Lord taught me to be faithful in all things." What then was the cause of his inward disquiet and despair? It was, above everything, that he could not see. "I looked upon the great professors of the city (London), and I saw all was dark and under the chain of darkness." He tried many "professors," but not one could "speak to his condition." And then at last he found "One, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition." From this time, though troubles and temptations were not wholly removed, he was able to conquer them. He saw that "there was an ocean of darkness and death; but an infinite ocean of light and love, which flowed over the ocean of darkness." Gradually all things became new to him. "All the creation gave another smell unto me than before, beyond what words can utter." * * *

No one surely would deny that the word "conversion" applies to such experiences as those of Paul and Fox. And which of us is there that does not need the opening of our spiritual eyes, that we may see God for ourselves and hear His authentic voice? Just this may be the "conversion" that we need.

Opportunity For Round Table Work in Large Centers

In large cities, especially in educational centers, there are likely to be groups of Friends from various sections of the country. This affords a unique opportunity for discussing the problems of our Society in a very broad way. Probably nothing is better fitted for guiding this discussion than a study of Quaker history.

It is encouraging to find that in a number of instances Quaker circles have been formed. A report from Boston says:

Several students in attendance at Wellesley, Harvard, Radcliffe, Simons and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who are Friends, and the young people of the Friends meeting in Roxbury have conducted for two years a very interesting Quaker Round Table. Special interest has been attached to this because all different branches of the Society of Friends are represented and eight different yearly meetings. The meetings have generally been held in the Friends meeting-house at Roxbury, with supper at 6 o'clock, followed by talks and informal discussions. Two very pleasant diversions to this have been the holding of the group-meeting in one of the chapter houses at Wellesley, by invitation of the Friends students of Wellesley College.

Last year the rise and early progress of the Friends were studied, with T. Edmund Harvey's "Rise of the Quakers" as a basis. This year the discussions have been more on the testimonies of Friends, with the last lesson a study of the different yearly meetings represented. Great interest has been maintained. The average attendance has been about 40.

This work could be extended with profit. Even where there are Quaker schools and colleges, there are those in the meeting not reached by the courses offered. Then, too, there is a personal element and a freedom of discussion possible in a circle which is not found in regular class work.

A New Record in Passenger Aviation

Louis Breguet, a French aviator, made a new record in aerial navigation last week when in his monoplane he carried 11 passengers a distance of two miles. The combined weight of the machine and its occupants was 2,602 pounds. The best previous record was made by Le Martin, in carrying seven passengers for five minutes.

The first aeroplane flights with a passenger aboard were made by the Wright brothers for the purpose of instructing others in the operation of their machines. The first flight with a woman passenger occurred at LeMans, France, in Tenth month, 1908, when Wilbur Wright carried the wife of his European business manager with him in his machine. For this he received a gold medal from the French Aero Club. The next day he had General Baden-Powell as a passenger. Louis Breguet, the aviator who made the above record, was also the first to carry five passengers.

Booker T. Washington Assaulted

While in the corridor of an apartment house in New York, ringing the doorbell of a man with whom the auditor of the Tuskegee Institute was supposed to be stopping, Booker T. Washington, mistaken for a prowler, was assaulted by a white man. In attempting to escape, he encountered a second white man, who struck him with a stick, inflicting a wound on his head and cutting one ear badly. Dr. Washington and his first assailant were both arrested and taken to a police station. The affair has caused no little stir, first, because of the fear that it would reflect unfavorably upon the highly respected and worthy head of Tuskegee Institute; and, second, because of the danger of its augmenting race prejudice among unthinking people.

Nothing has more clearly demonstrated President Taft's readiness to allay prejudice and help a worthy man in need, though he be a negro, than his prompt letter of reassurance to Booker T. Washington. Concluding, he said:

It would be a nation's loss if this untoward incident in any way impaired your great power for good in the solution of one of the most difficult problems before us.

I want you to know that your friends are standing by you in every trial, and that I am proud to subscribe myself as one.

Arizona's New Constitution

Although the enabling acts admitting Arizona as a State have been passed, its constitution must be approved before it can become a full-fledged member of the Union. Accordingly a provisional constitution has been prepared, which is causing no little comment on account of its radical provisions. The most vulnerable point seems to be a provision for the recall of the judiciary. Theodore Roosevelt expressed a very general feeling in his speech at Phoenix last week, when he said:

I admit the melancholy fact that there are States where judges have so acted as to make it justifiable and necessary for the people to adopt measures for retiring all such judges from office. But, speaking generally and as regards most communities under normal conditions, I feel that it is to the interest of decent citizens who want nothing but justice in its broadest and truest sense not to adopt any measure which would make judges timid, which would make them fearful lest deciding rightly in some given case might cause a storm of anger, temporary, but fatal.

The Trials of the Wealthy

The fact that the Lloyds of London have been asked to insure an American baby against kidnapping has started newspaper comment. The identity of the child is unknown, but ingenious reporters have hit upon the $90,000,000 son and only heir of Edward and Evelyn M. McLean, Washington, D. C. The atmosphere of constant dread surrounding this child should make those born in humble circumstances thankful for their position. The published accounts say that three detectives are employed to guard him by day and night, while two trained nurses and several underlings are in attendance all the time. When his father and mother are absent, a third nurse is installed. He takes his air on the gallery of the Walsh home, where he and his parents live in the winter, one nurse and one detective being in constant attendance. While automobiling, his mother or grandmother, nurse and two men are on the machine. His nursery is fitted with flexible iron shutters, which let down on the inside and are indiscernable from the street. These are padlocked at 6 P. M.

Postal Savings Banks

The report of the first two months' operation of the 48 experimental postal savings banks has been issued. Forty-eight offices for savings accounts were opened the first of the year. The total deposits now aggregate $133,869, an average of $36.54 for each depositor. The aggregate population of these 48 towns where the banks were established is 370,000, so that about 1 per cent. of the population has been interested.

The Postmaster-General calculates from this that if the growth of deposits be maintained for a year at the same rate, it will amount to $803,214, and that "if the system should be patronized in the same proportion when it is established at all money-order postoffices," the amount on deposit after one year's operation would be about $200,000,000. These are large "ifs," but in any case it would seem to be in order for the department to extend the system more rapidly than it has.

"These Little Ones That Believe on Me."

BY JOSEPH JOHN MILLS.

Among the tombs of the early Christians in the catacombs of Rome, one is said to have been found bearing this inscription: "To the memory of Aquilla, a faithful servant of Jesus Christ, who died when eighteen months old." What shall we say of such a testimony to the religious character of a mere babe? May it be reasonably accepted without qualification, or shall it be regarded as merely a beautiful fiction born of the idolizing love of bereaved parents?

Religion has been aptly defined as conscious relation between a human soul and God. May little children truly know such a relationship? If so, at how early an age? Is it possible to boys and girls of the infant class in the First-day school, or to the little ones whose names are on the cradle roll? Can there be anything in their experience that can be legitimately called fellowship with Christ? Apparently His first disciples thought not. When a troop of parents in Peraea brought their "infants" to Him to receive His blessing, the Twelve considered the little ones too young to be brought into personal friendship with Him. Doubtless these men believed in the religious education of children, as did every Jew who read Deuteronomy. But early training for religious thinking later in life is one thing; bringing young children into conscious personal fellowship with Jesus is quite another thing. For the latter the disciples had little concern. It had been proper enough, in their opinion, for the people in Galilee to bring needy and helpless adults to Christ, the blind and deaf and crippled, paralytics and those who were held in thrall by demons. But for overzealous fathers and mothers to offer Him "also their babes," that, in the judgment of the Twelve, was a thing to be frowned upon. So they "found fault." Their rebuke of the eager parents did not escape the notice of Jesus. He felt keenly the wrong which their action did not only to the little ones and their parents, but to Himself as well. To Him the winning of the children was a matter of vital consequence in the work of bringing in His kingdom. That anybody should discourage their approach to Him moved Him with indignation, and He took them in His arms and blessed them. If true religion be simply conscious fellowship with Jesus Christ, surely those little Peraean boys and girls experienced it that day. That the lesson might not be lost upon His followers, He turned to them and said: "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in nowise enter therein." The conclusion is obvious. If little children cannot, in a very true and living sense, become Christians, neither can men and women. Whatever is the fundamental element in the fitness which admits adults into fellowship with Christ, that element of fitness may rightly be looked for in children of tenderest years. So much, at least, we know upon the authority of Jesus Himself.

What then is the essential fact in the religion of a little child? What else is it than early childhood's native sense of God? Every normal child is born into the world with the faculty of God-consciousness. Careful students of infancy assert that the word "God" never has to be explained to even the youngest child whose mental development has reached the stage at which the meaning of words is intelligently comprehended. "Nothing in all the world," says a recent writer, "is so reasonable as God to a little child. * * * Long before the age of reason or reflection arrives, almost before the baby has passed the age where its entire consciousness is a craving for the satisfaction of its own appetites, the little soul reaches out for God, and grasps with satisfaction the fact that He exists." Herein, as the same writer points out, lies the universal fondness of little children for Old Testament stories. These stories are, so to speak, "saturated with God." The experience of the infant Moses in the ark of bulrushes, of Samuel hearing the divine voice in the night-time, of Daniel in the lions' den offers nothing incongruous to the child, just because God is the chief actor in them all. It was just this childhood trait of being open-souled to God that Jesus told His disciples they must acquire anew before they could enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

A little child without this responsiveness to God is an abnormal child. It is vital to the healthy development of the life experience of children. A striking illustration of this truth is cited by the author above quoted, from the history of the French republic a generation ago. With the overthrow of the monarchy the atheistical political leaders thought to free the new government from the power of the Romish Church by excluding all religious teaching from the common schools. In place of the Bible a series of textbooks on morals was substituted. From these books, prepared under direction of the government by some of the most brilliant minds of France and of the highest excellence when judged by literary and pedagogic standards alone, the name of God was rigidly excluded. This experiment of absolutely eliminating the thought of God from a nation's policy of elementary education was continued for a period of ten years. The sequel, as revealed by the government census, was an appalling increase of child-crime, especially of child-suicide, among the French people. This alarming prevalence of criminal tendency and pessimism among the children of the nation was made the subject of an investigation by the republic. The official report of this investigation traced the evil to one cause—"the profound soul-discouragement of the child who knew not God." So deep was the impression upon the educational authorities by this report that they removed the restrictions which excluded the name of God from the school textbooks on morals.

The fundamental element in the religious training of a child is the development of its sense of God. No higher obligation rests upon the family or the Church. In child-consciousness religion is not a matter of theological apprehension at all. It is a concrete personal experience which the child-mind is no more capable of formulating into a doctrine than it is of logically explaining its love for its mother.

In terms of early childhood's experience, religion is essentially love to the Heavenly Father, friendship with Jesus, obedience to the gentle voice of God in the whisperings of conscience. "These little ones that believe on me," said Jesus, as He pointed to a child so young that He held it in His arms as an object-lesson while He taught His disciples. Certainly nothing of theological content could have entered into the word "believe" as employed in describing the intimate personal relation existing between His "little ones" and Himself. Certainly He did not mean that they had any comprehension of His divine nature or of the atoning sacrifice which He had come to make upon the Cross, in the efficacy of which they were to be unconscious partakers. But such was the graciousness of His personality as the Friend of little children that when they were brought to Him, they instinctively trusted Him and their hearts responded to His love "as the flowers to the sun."

What Christian Fellowship Means to Me

BY WILFRED T. GRENFELL.

(Written at sea)

Oddly enough, as I take my pen to write "What Christian Fellowship Means to Me," my vessel is passing a small island lying far off shore in the Atlantic. It is early January and the bare, low rocks are coated with white, like a sugared cake. Wherever the heavy breakers have been rushing over the cliff-faces, immense masses of most exquisitely shining ice-crystals cling in fantastic festoons. On this island is one solitary house, from which a large blue flag is fluttering on a long stick, giving us a dumb greeting as we pass. For we are the only neighbors this solitary family will see for many days and even weeks, and we are but as a ship passing in the night.

Formerly quite a number of houses were on the island, the nearness to the fishery ground, the fact that the seal herds skirted the island and the love of the innumerable sea birds for its well-weeded ledges having attracted men to live there. But the loneliness of the long winters, when the island is for months shut off from the land, spurred them to tear down their homes and, like snails, carry them on their backs to the nearest part of the mainland that offered a harbor for their craft.

My Hermit Friend.

My friend, who still clings to the solitude of his island, has had to see his young folks also leave him. Yet if you could land and spend an hour with the old couple, you would find a happy and most hospitable home, and you could only arrive at the conclusion, if you were tempted to moralize, that the fellowship of one's kind is not in every case essential.

In forming an estimate of the value of friendship from our own experience, we are apt to forget that this idiosyncrasy is a fact, and, if so, we may be led into judging unjustly. There, however, you would have to stop. For so long as we human beings are limited by our many finalities, it is undeniable that the association with our fellows is desirable.

So far as work goes, I know of no man who with his own hand has killed more codfish, seals and birds than my hermit friend of the island. He has thus been able to rear a fine family. He has never known what it was to want any of the necessities of life. He has been always able to meet his bills and to afford hospitality to all strangers. His animal life has been a success in his small sphere. Knowing, however, his great capacities, one has a feeling that, had he been associated with other men, he could have done better, even in the tasks to which he devoted his time, and that he might have had a more abundant life. He certainly could have led other men, and the capacity of a life in things physical is increased directly in proportion to the exercise of this faculty. Whether mere increased material accumulation would have really added to his life value is, however, an open question. He certainly is not of a creative nature, and except that he could have imparted more to his employes or associates of what he had himself been taught, humanity as a whole would probably have gained or lost little. But a multiplication of these "littles" makes much, and so I look at the solitary house on the island with a tinge of sorrow, seeing that it typifies, alas, the attitude of many towards the higher responsibilities of life.

The Comradeship of Humble People.

The people among whom my lot has been cast are poor and isolated. Their life is largely physical and their opportunities for association few. They are not blessed with the gift of thoughts and conversation arising from contact with other men's minds through books. In spite of this, it is a fact that where possessions are few, fellowship is more spontaneous and more universal, and this the habits of our people exemplify. For though the conversation may not be pregnant with new truths and terse with epigram, it is free, hearty, and for absence from unkindness it also compares well with much one hears in drawing-rooms; while the hospitality, if unpremeditated, is less discriminating and always sincere.

I have myself arrived in the middle of a winter night with a hungry team of dogs at the tiny cottage of a stranger who was in bed with his wife. Yet his greeting was more than genial. While he fed our dogs in the dark on the snow, his good wife fed us. And when it was time to retire to rest, the bed they themselves commenced the night in had been refurnished for us, while they, for the lack of a second, slept on the floor of the loft. There is not only this superabundant bonhomie among our poor people, which ever makes their water wine, but the same fellowship in service is a more than beautiful characteristic. Thus, Jim's house wants moving, so all hands are "invited" next Wednesday to do it. They come and do it. Jack's schooner wants hauling up, and every man in the harbor will be on time quite freely to lend a hand. My two motor boats want dragging half a mile over the harbor ice for launching. At the hour named, every man and boy in the harbor are handy at the time, and most of the women as well.

Here no one would dream of asking a doctor to pay for being carried to a sick man, or a parson on his rounds. When on one occasion my feet had been incapacitated by frost-burn and some of my dogs lost, every team from north and south went at their own invitation and hauled the balance of my logs home for me. This fellowship of love is an oil for the wheels of life that we are apt to find short-stocked in more highly civilized centers. But it is a jewel that nothing can replace. Possibly the sense of a need of help, of dependence on something beyond ourselves, emphasizes this trait in poor people; and especially in sailors. And so it proves one of God's best compensations, this spur to fellowship.

The Influence of Example.

When as a young man I for the first time heard a speaker call for those who were not ashamed to be called followers of Christ to stand up, I sat glued to my seat. I had made but recently the great decision of my life, that I would accept faith in Jesus Christ, and would try to follow it to its ultimate issue. I would have stood up gladly to make one for a forlorn hope. But in the presence of my college comrades, to stand up and say I was willing to follow Christ, knowing how vague was my vision of what that could involve, was more than I could do. Suddenly from a long row of sailor boys, all dressed alike in the uniform of the naval training ship, one boy stood up. The fellowship of pluck, of what seemed to me real courage, was exactly what I needed. My chains were broken and I got up, a step I never can be sufficiently grateful for, no, not to my dying day. I never knew more of the boy himself. I don't consider that sentimental fellowship is an essential. We neither spoke, nor shook hands, nor wept on one another's necks. We just passed in the night. But the fellowship of the boy's courage had meant everything to me.

A Broad and Deep Reality.

This spiritual fellowship is not kindled by peculiarity of garment, by mere conformity to customs, by orthodoxy of, or even our "doxy" of, intellectual tenets. It is far deeper than man can appreciate. It transcends all grades and ranks of mind, body and estate, so that for myself I have realized more fully and sweetly the meaning of it away among blue-jerseyed fishermen on a schooner's deck, or gathered with them under the shadow of our mighty cliffs in Labrador, than I have amidst the most ornate surroundings of the most regardless-of-expense cathedral at the feet of the most irreproachable theology.

It may be we show our love to the Christ but feebly. It may be with weakness of will we follow Him afar. It may be that, beset with intellectual difficulties, our vision of His personality is at times but faint, but the fellowship of those who do not forget Him is a forceful fact that brings somehow an inspiration of the reality of the living Christ with surprising clearness and with unconscious effort when those who acknowledge Him meet together and speak of Him and His Kingdom. Is this not the real meaning of the communion sacrament, that meeting thus in fellowship in His name, we meet Him?—From the series "A Man's Helper," in The Congregationalist.

Quakerism Beyond the Mississippi

BY RAYNER W. KELSEY.

The Labors of Robert and Sarah Lindsey in Oregon and Washington.

(Concluded.)

After returning to Portland, Robert and Sarah Lindsey traveled by carriage into the neighboring district to the west of the Willamette River. In this journey their friend, Mary Stroud, accompanied them.

"Portland, Fourth-day, 21st. After breakfast, at father's request a portion of Scripture was read; a religious communication followed, at the close of which we took our departure down the river to this place, and again took up our quarters at the Metropolis Hotel. Our friend, Mary Stroud, called upon us, and as the school in which she is engaged as teacher is about to have a week's vacation, she readily accepted the offer of accompanying us into the country to visit some scattered remnants of our Society.

"Fifth-day, 22d. Having hired a covered carriage and driver, we commenced our journey this morning, and soon entered a ravine extending four miles, and only just wide enough for one carriage and a small stream of water. The banks on each side were covered with timber—many trees had fallen, and lay in wild confusion, one upon another. After various inquiries we found the house of Edwin Comfort some time after noon, where we met with a kind reception. The neighborhood was thinly settled, but invitations were sent round for the people to attend a meeting at our friend's house in the evening, which was responded to, and the Lord gave the word and strength to publish it. Blessed be His holy name.

"Sixth-day, 23d. Took leave of our friends this morning and turned our faces towards Tualitan Plains, passing through Hillsboro, the county-seat of Washington, a very small place, containing about 12 houses, three or four stores, a courthouse and blacksmith's shop. After making arrangements for a public meeting to be held on First-day afternoon, we proceeded to the house of William Mills, 10 miles distant. The family came to Oregon about sixteen years ago, and are living in a rude log house, which admits of much fresh air and promised but little comfort. William Mills was from home, but his wife seemed much pleased to see us, and sent for some of their family connections, when it was agreed to hold a public meeting in a schoolroom tomorrow morning.

"Seventh-day, 24th. The meeting was attended by a number of persons, amongst whom I felt to sit as a fool. Father had close and heart-searching service, and I was made willing to cast in my mite. Rode about two miles, chiefly through forests of young balsam pines, which grew on each side of a narrow road, which was only just wide enough to admit our carriage, to the house of Richard Arthur, who married a sister of William Mills, where we dined. They have a family of 10 children around them, and the wife's father and mother. * * * Taking our departure, we had a very romantic ride to Hillsboro. Rain had fallen the previous night, and the trees having become frozen whilst wet, the stems of the leafless shrubs shone with white crystals, and the beautiful young balsam pines, with their dense foliage, were weighed down and met over our heads, and we got well besprinkled in passing through them. Deer and bears are very common here. Richard Arthur said that 100 of the former and 11 of the latter had been killed this season. The bears are black, and not much danger is apprehended from them. On reaching Hillsboro we took up our quarters at the only hotel in the place, where the accommodations were more scanty than usual, and we were obliged to sit in a room common to all persons and a sort of thoroughfare for men of all classes.

"First-day, 25th. Not having a private room, we did not hold our meeting as usual. One in the courthouse in the afternoon was pretty well attended, but sitting for a while in silence seemed irksome to some present, particularly one old man, who made a remark which caused a smile upon many faces. * * * Set out immediately after meeting, and traveled four miles to the comfortable abode of a settler named Bennet, who had given us an invitation to lodge at his house, where we met with a kind reception.

"Second-day, 26th. Took an early departure, but owing to bad roads and the difficulty of finding the right one, it took us five hours to get to Portland, distant 12 miles. Since our arrival in Oregon, the weather has been much like our winter weather in England—settled frost for one week, then two or three days broken with showers, succeeded by frost. The settlers tell us that this is an uncommonly dry winter.

"Third-day, 27th. * * * I was prevented attending the evening meeting appointed to be held in the courthouse. * * * The meeting was much crowded, and through the Lord's help, was a favored time.

"Fourth-day, 28th. At 10 A. M. we had a meeting with six persons, some members, and others connected with our Society. * * * Spent the evening at Mary Stroud's lodgings in company with others.

"Fifth-day, 29th. Went to the State prison, where there are about 40 convicts who are under the care of persons who employ them in a sawmill, also in wagon and sash-making. Their treatment appears to be humane, but the inside of the prison is in an unfinished state, and there seemed to be a want of cleanliness in the cells. It was interesting to find that the prisoners were furnished with Bibles. * * * Having now accomplished the service that seems to have been required in Oregon, we are waiting the arrival of a steamer by which to proceed to Vancouver's Island.

"Seventh-day, 31st. Sleet has been falling most of the day, so we have remained pretty much indoors, and employed the time in writing. * * * A few months ago 17 nuns and some priests came here from Canada, and the Sisters have opened a girls' school in Portland. Our friend, Mary Stroud, called upon them a short time ago and wished to see the school, but was told that no visitors were allowed in the school but the parents of the children.

"First month 1, 1860. On entering upon a new year, how many interesting reflections arise in our minds. Through the unbounded mercy of God, although the old year has closed, we are spared a little longer, and the desire arises in my heart that we may all renewedly devote ourselves unto Him whose service is perfect freedom. * * * Mary Stroud sat down with us this morning to wait upon the Lord, when our souls were fed with a morsel of that bread which nourisheth up the soul unto everlasting life. In the afternoon we had an appointed meeting with the prisoners in the penitentiary, which was a season of divine favor.

* * * * *

"Second day, First month, 2d. A young man named Edward Albright, whose father emigrated to America along with his family from the neighborhood of Lancaster many years since, called upon us today, and said that he was living about 12 miles from Portland. He married a few years ago, and has lately united himself with the Methodists, who have appointed him to the office of exhorter. * * * About noon we were informed that the steamer by which we were expecting to proceed to Vancouver's Island had arrived at St. Helens, but was not able to proceed up the Columbia River on account of the ice. The Portland passengers were forwarded by a small steamboat down another channel.

"Third-day, 3d. Went on board the small steamboat at noon, and arrived at St. Helens in time to get settled in the 'Pacific' before dark, where we lay at anchor all night.

"Fourth-day, 4th. Owing to a heavy fog, we make slow progress, and have sometimes to come to a dead stand. At 4 P. M. came in sight of the sandbar at the junction of the Columbia River with the Pacific Ocean. The tide being low, we had a view of an island of sand in the midst of the river, and the pilot pronounced it unsafe to cross, so we turned into a friendly bay, on one side of which was the solitary dwelling of the keeper of the lighthouse, where we found a safe harbor for the night."

* * * * *

The portion of the journey relating to the labors in British Columbia is omitted, and we follow our friends in their voyage from that country southward to what was then Washington Territory.

Only in very recent years has a permanent work of Friends been established in Washington. But it is interesting to know that fifty years ago there were those living in that country who had been connected with Friends, and that the Friendly message was spoken there by the two faithful pilgrims from the home of Quakerism in England.

"First-day, 22d. About 7.30 A. M. our boat was again upon its way. * * * Passed Smith's and Whidbeg Island and the harbor of Dungenes, Arrived at Port Townsend before noon, where we left mailbags and stayed an hour. We thought there were as many Indians as white men standing upon the wharf. Some of the former were well dressed, and their faces were besmeared with crimson paint. * * * Continuing our voyage southward down Puget Sound, we stopped a short time at Port Ludlow, a small settlement of about 20 houses, with Indian huts around. Our next calling place was Port Gambill.

* * * * *

"Olympia, Washington Territory, Second-day, 23d. Reached this our place of destination before daylight. Although the population is only from 400 to 500, it is the chief town and the seat of legislature for this territory, the members of which are now sitting. One of this class called upon us this afternoon, and said he was brought up a Friend, but left the Society on the anti-slavery question. * * * Another individual named Evans, a lawyer by profession, and also connected with our Society, has been very kind and attentive, undertaking to circulate notice of a public meeting to be held in the town tomorrow.

* * * * *

"Third-day, 24th. Called at the public school, and left some little books with the children. Dined and spent some hours at Elwood Evans', and in the evening attended the appointed meeting. The room was about filled, and although an exercising time, I trust it ended well. Father spoke from the parable of the lost sheep. * * *

"Fourth-day, 25th. Taking leave of our friends, we hired a wagon this morning and proceeded 25 miles through the forest, from which we several times emerged into fine, open prairies. Passed one of the Hudson Bay Co's forts. * * * Arrived at Steilacoom, a small town situated on one of the bays on Puget Sound, about 2 P. M., where we found comfortable quarters at a hotel. Spent some hours in company with the Methodist minister and his wife, agreeable persons, and somewhat acquainted with our relatives, the Hoyles.

"Fifth-day, 26th. Walked one and one-half miles through the wood to the garrison, which stands upon a fine, sandy plain. Here about 400 soldiers are stationed, under the command of Colonel Casey. * * * On father proposing to hold a meeting on the premises, the colonel at once expressed his willingness, provided the resident chaplain had no objection, and as he put no obstruction in the way, a meeting was appointed for 11 o'clock tomorrow. Returning to our quarters, arrangements were made for a public meeting to be held in the Methodist Church this evening. Visited the public school and called upon a family named Meeker, the female head of which was the daughter of a Friend. * * * The evening meeting was largely attended, and the Lord was mouth and wisdom, tongue and utterance to His dependent children. Near the close of the meeting a young man arose from his seat and exclaimed, "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," and expressed his satisfaction with what had been delivered.

"Steilacoom, Sixth-day, 26th. Walked to the garrison and called upon the chaplain and his wife, interesting young persons, who have only been about four months in these parts. At 11 A. M., accompanied by our young friends, the colonel and family, several officers and other persons, together with a number of soldiers, we entered the room which had been prepared for our reception. The occasion was one of deep humiliation to my mind, but father was strengthened to approach the Throne of grace with the voice of supplication, and afterwards to address the company on subjects concerned with our present and eternal happiness. * * * Dined at the colonel's, where we were introduced to Captain Hunt, who is now stationed on the Island of San Juan, at the head of 800 men, ready to defend it from the claims of the English.

* * * * *

"Victoria, Second-day, First month 30th. Left Steilacoom on Seventh-day by the mail steamer "Panama," and arrived here this morning.

It is fitting at this time to note that the element of expectancy is a potent factor in determining the form of religious experience. So generally is this recognized that we have come to speak of the Methodist or the Presbyterian type of conversion with little thought of defining their terms. Everyone who takes the trouble to observe, knows that certain forms of religious experience are confined largely to certain groups. This in the main is due to the element of expectancy.

The Christian laborer will not despair even of spiritually poor fields while God says: "Reap for me there with your battered little scythe!" There is a divine promise even for the hard fields, the imperfect instruments and the discouraged workers. Many men are required to work with poor tools to great ends, and to labor in almost barren tracts, upheld by the promise that God will some day turn the wilderness into a garden. It is the duty of men to work, and it is the pleasure of God finally, in some way that seems best to him, bountifully to reward all faithful laborers.—The New York Observer.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

The new building for a minister's home at Rich Square, N. C., is now nearing completion. It is to be occupied by David Coppock and wife who are located there for the present.

* * *

In Bear Creek meeting belonging to Farmland Monthly Meeting, Fred. Tormohlen, assisted the pastor, Luther Addington, in a revival in which many were converted, more than 20 uniting with Friends.

* * *

Eastern Quarterly Meeting was held at Rich Square, N. C., in Second month. Albert Peele from New Garden Monthly Meeting was in attendance. There was no business of special importance.

* * *

In a recent issue we noted the death of the three-year-old daughter of Wm. T. and Bertha Pinkham Dixon, missionaries to China. The death of their son, notice of which appears in this issue, leaves them childless in that land of strangers.

* * *

Dr. J. J. Mills, wife and daughter Gertrude, of Whittier, Cal., are spending some time at their old home at Richmond and other points in Indiana. When Dr. Mills arranges some business interests now engaging his attention, he will return with his family to the Pacific Coast.

* * *

The board of Pacific College has elected to the presidency of that institution, Levi T. Pennington, now pastor of South Eighth Street Friends meeting, Richmond, Ind. His work at Pacific, will begin as soon after Seventh month as a pastor can be secured by the meeting he is now serving.

* * *

The meeting at Farmland, Ind., held a very successful revival in Second month under the direction of the pastor, Mary McVicker, resulting in 42 conversions and renewals; 23 uniting with Friends. The membership was greatly strengthened by the faithful ministry of the pastor.

* * *

The following week-end lectures were given at Oakwood Seminary, Union Springs, N. Y., in Third month: "Amos, the Shepherd Prophet," and "Early Hebrew Songs," by Eleanor D. Wood, A. M., of Wellesley College; "Japan" (illustrated), by L. Hollingsworth Wood, New York.

* * *

A fifteen-days revival meeting was recently held at South Wabash, Ind., under the leadership of John Kittrell and Leora Bogue. About 90 professed conversion and 17 persons will become members with Friends. John Kittrell and Leora Bogue are now engaged in a revival at Pennville, Ind.

* * *

At the invitation of the local Christian Endeavor Union in Worcester, Mass., Earle J. Harold, the pastor in the Friends meeting there, has been delivering a series of Monday evening lectures on the "Minor Prophets." The course will close next Second-day the 3d prox., when the eighth lecture will be delivered.

* * *

Westfield Quarterly Meeting of Indiana Yearly Meeting, was held at West Elkton, the 16th, 17th and 18th inst. Ira Johnson, Quarterly meeting Superintendent, and Fred Smith were in attendance. Each was favored with helpful messages. On Seventh-day following the business session, Fred Smith spoke of the work of Southland College.

The Friends Christian Endeavor Society, Worcester, Mass., was the banner society of the yearly meeting last year in giving to foreign missions—the average gift being $2.55 per member, with $200 as the year's offering.

The local meeting at Worcester also stands well in its contributions to the benevolences of the yearly meeting, the total for the year being $292.75.

* * *

L. Oscar Moon, Field Secretary of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has been at Black Creek in Southampton Co., Va., most of the time for the past six weeks. Friends there expect soon to have money in sight for a new meeting-house at Sedley on the Virginian Railroad in which case the old location at Black Creek where the "May Meetings" have been held for a century and a half will be abandoned. Sedley is a growing village one and one-half miles away.

* * *

Arthur Dann's recovery from his late illness has been more rapid than was expected. He preached First-day morning the 12th inst., at Whittier Cal., and several times participated in the meetings there, being conducted by Charles Replogle. Arthur and Eliza Dann left Whittier the 16th inst., for San Jose, expecting, if health permits, to do service for a time within the limits of Berkeley Quarterly Meeting, and later in Oregon. Following this they will spend some time with their two sons, resident there.

* * *

An enlarged interest in Bible study has lately arisen among the girls of Whittier College. Each of the seven young lady seniors has a class of college girls, which once a week she leads in a study in the Parables of Christ. Before entering upon the duties of the class hour, the seven teachers have a normal session, in which President Newlin outlines the lesson under consideration, so that the same line of thought is pursued by the different sections.

* * *

The pastor's Bible class of First Friends Church, Indianapolis, Ind., held a very pleasant banquet at the Y. M. C. A., on the 15th inst. There were present 24 of the class, the teacher and six guests.

Following the dinner a business session was held.

The standing committees gave very interesting reports. The following officers were chosen for the coming year: President, Lenna Lewis; vice-president, Jessie Thompson; secretary, Lois Henley; treasurer, Elizabeth Shirley. Following the business session Mary Miars Harold gave a helpful and interesting address on "One's Unconscious Influence."

The meeting closed with prayer by the teacher of the class, Morton C. Pearson.

* * *

From Pasadena, Cal.: After a month of self-denial and special consideration of the subject of "Giving," the Friends of Pasadena meeting on the 5th inst. contributed more than $1,500 to the treasury of the meeting, making it possible for the treasurer to meet promptly a large bill for street paving, and other unusual expenses.

John Henry Douglas is recovering from his recent severe illness.

George Outland and wife and Edwin Stanton and family, Wichita, Kan., have recently located in Pasadena.

Charles E. Tebbetts attended Pasadena meeting on the 12th inst., and gave the last of a series of three addresses on the missionary problem.

* * *

Francena Mott, whose obituary appears in this issue, was born in Glens Falls, N. Y., Fourth month 6, 1842, and married William Penn Angell when twenty-two years of age. About two years later she joined the Society of Friends. In all the pastorates of her husband in Glens Falls Quarterly Meeting, Muncie and New Castle, Indiana and Minneapolis, of which meeting he is now resident minister, she was greatly loved and her gentle influence upon all toward the highest and best in Christian character was recognized.

Five children were born of her marriage, all of whom are living.

The funeral services were held Third month 14th. Beautiful and worthy tributes were paid her memory by A. Edward Kelsey, pastor of Minneapolis meeting, and by Dr. J. Harlan Stuart. She was laid to rest in Lakewood cemetery in Minneapolis.

* * *

A meeting to organize a Young Women's Auxiliary to the Foreign Missionary Association of Friends of Philadelphia was held by invitation from Julia Cope Collins, chairman of a small committee, at the College Club, 1524 Locust Street, on Third month 22d. After an address by Sophia W. Harris on the power possessed by young women to further any cause undertaken by them and methods in use in other organizations, Julia C. Collins sketched the work of Friends in Japan, Syria, and India, adding hints on what advance work is specially important. A few of those present spoke in favor of an auxiliary and a vote being taken, it was decided to form one as soon as possible. A preliminary committee consisting of 12 was appointed to call a meeting of the organization; tea being then served, the meeting ended with much pleasant chat.

* * *

The meeting at Muncie, Ind., is making excellent progress. Daisy Barr began her work as pastor in the meeting last Tenth month. In First month, assisted by Leora Bogue, she conducted a two weeks series of special meetings, which resulted in many conversions and accessions to the church. During the past four months 76 have been added to the membership among which were nine entire families. The Bible school shows quite an increase in attendance and effectiveness. One very encouraging feature is the large number of earnest young people who are taking part in the work of the meeting. The First-day services and the mid-week prayer meeting are well attended.

On the first First-day in Second month, the anniversary of the occupancy of the new building, the free-will offering amounted to over $1,000. Utmost love and harmony prevails throughout the meeting.

Martha E. Elliott, Spiceland, Ind., expresses warm appreciation for THE AMERICAN FRIEND and continues: "I greatly enjoy Quakerism Beyond the Mississippi, by Rayner W. Kelsey, also the Early Life of John Henry Douglas, by his daughter. We have known so much here of his work in the first great revivals in our denomination . . . The California Field, by Hermon D. Williams, is also very interesting to me, since I know many Friends who have gone from these western yearly meetings and several from our quarterly and particular meetings. I would like to mention especially Mary White and her mother whose faces were so familiar to me in the picture recently published in the paper. They went from here, and I was glad to know that the younger was in the home missionary work in Pasadena. . . I never feel my Bible school lesson is complete until I see what your lesson notes say."

* * *

A series of meetings at Whittier, Cal., continuing seventeen days, under the lead of Charles Replogle, assisted by his wife, closed on the 22d inst. Arthur and Eliza Dann participated most acceptably in several of the sessions before going north. The claims of the Gospel, under the leading of the Spirit, were presented with earnestness and clearness, without the employment of conventional methods or "altar service." There was an absence of the usual urgency in the matter of "speaking," and little time was consumed with stereotyped testimonies, though opportunity was open to all for confession, prayer, or the expression of any convictions of truth resting upon their hearts. There was a sustained and reverent interest throughout, with evidences that a goodly number entered into covenant relations with God. It was also felt by all, that in a strengthening of the faith of the membership, and in an enlarged and clearer view of Christian doctrine and its requirements, the meetings were attended with substantial results that will be permanent.

One of the pioneer members of Kansas Yearly Meeting is Abigail C. Morgan, who is at present living with her daughter at Dunlap, Kan. She is now in her eighty-second year, enjoys her second eyesight, reads THE AMERICAN FRIEND with pleasure, and spends many hours over her needle work. She is the mother of 13 children, 11 of whom are still living. She has 40 grand children living and 10 deceased, and 12 great grand-children.

Last Seventh month on the occasion of her eighty-first birthday, 42 of her relatives gathered at the home of her daughter (Mrs. J. B. Lamb) and celebrated the event. The day was happily spent. Those of the family who were unable to be present, sent gifts and greetings.

Abigail C. Morgan was born in Guilford County, N. C., where aside from a short term at New Garden Boarding School, she spent her early life. In 1851 she became the wife of John B. Morgan. They continued to live in North Carolina for sometime, then moved to Tennessee, and finally to Kansas in 1861. Her husband died in 1879.

Through a bequest of the late Mary E. Smith, Wayne County, Ind., has come into possession of property valued at $13,250 to care for the county orphans. Since the sum is so limited and White's Manual Labor Institute, under the control of Friends, takes care of practically all of this work for the county, the trustees of the fund have decided to turn over the income from the bequest to that institution.

White's Manual Institute recently appropriated $1,000 for the equipment of its laundry. It is the intention to install a new engine with enough capacity to run, in addition to the laundry, a feed grinder, to pump water for the institution and to run a dynamo if it is thought advisable to install one at any time.

The institute is located near Wabash, Ind., and is managed by a board of trustees appointed by the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends. The home farm, which is comprised of about 600 acres, is for dependent and orphan children. A number of children are sent from the Wayne Juvenile Court to this school, where they are educated and kept until homes are found for them. There are at present fourteen children in the school from Wayne County.

The institution is considered to be in the best condition, it has been in for some time. There is a total enrollment of 156 children. In Second month, 21 were admitted and 10, were placed in homes. Considerable improvements have been made in the buildings during the past year. A new cattle barn has just been completed which was built at an expense of $3,000.

James Moorman and wife, who have acted as superintendent and matron for the past four years, retired in Second month. They were succeeded by Llewlyn Harkness and wife. L. Harkness is the son of John U. Harkness, former superintendent of the institution, and at one time superintendent of Earlham College.

The Christian Globe, of London, in its issue of First month 26th, has the following to say of George A. Barton's recent book, "The Heart of the Christian Message":

"This is just the book over which we could grow enthusiastic. It is difficult to avoid terms of praise which would seem excessive. Dr. Barton gave a certain number of lectures for the Friends Summer School, and here they are. There is quite a beautiful combination of scholarship, insight and lucidity. He begins with the Heart of the Message of Jesus. What was it? It is the Fatherhood of God . . . The heart of Paul's message Dr. Barton shows to have been the doctrine of the mystic union of Christ and the believer. He says that Paul's Rabbinism was misunderstood by Augustine and other theologians, and in a remarkably fine piece of exposition he unfolds the great message of the apostle. But of these seven lectures the one that has interested us most is that entitled, 'The Christian Message According to the Early Friends.' Rome said, 'The Supreme Authority is the Church.' Protestantism said, 'Even in its Episcopal form in England, the Supreme Authority is the Scriptures.' The Friends said, 'The Supreme Authority is the Spirit.' Many of the Quaker practices, such as the refusal of the oath, the use of 'thou' for 'you,' the rejection of the Sacraments are all shown to have been the natural outcome of the doctrine of the inner light. Then comes this interesting criticism: 'They reached men in the seventeenth century, because they spoke the language of that century . . . We have failed to continue the work of the early Friends because we have continued to repeat their phrases instead of translating their central truth into the language of each succeeding century.'

"We can hardly think of any better service anyone could do than to circulate this book by the thousand. We shall look out for more work of this quality from the same author."

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Inquiries received from time to time as to progress with the proposed Allen Jay Memorial building at Earlham College seem to warrant a public statement. The committee has almost completed the canvass of the West Richmond Friends and as a result have about $10,000 in sight. Plans are now under way for soliciting funds from Friends generally, but it is the purpose of the committee not to canvass in Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings until later, in order to give Earlham College a free field in its effort to raise funds to pay off its debt. Interest in the proposed memorial is very general. A Friend has volunteered to raise funds for it in North Carolina. One Eastern Friend has made a subscription of $500. A man who was a student of Friends Boarding School, when Allen Jay was there, has sent a subscription, although he is no longer a Friend, and one has been received from Ireland. Several English Friends are giving the movement public and private support.

"THEY HAVE TAKEN MY LORD AWAY."

To His empty tomb the woman
Steals forth at the dawn of day,
And the cry is wrung from her breaking heart,
"They have taken my Lord away."
In sorrow she turns, but—"Mary"—
Uplifting her drooping head,
At the spoken word of her living Lord
She knows that Death is dead.

In the dawn of faith I seek Him
'Mid the learned of earth, but they,
With subtle logic and sophist's guile
Have taken my Lord away.
Then, stooping to lift a brother
O'erburdened with toil and strife,
In the glowing morn of hope newborn
I walk with the Lord of Life.

—By Lawrence W. Neff, in the S. S. Times.

God nothing does,—
Nor suffers to be done,
But thou thyself wouldst do
If thou couldst see
The end of all events
As well as He.

Second-day, Fourth month 3d. Elisha's defenders. 2 Kings 6:8-23.

Third-day. Prophecy of plenty. 2 Kings 6:24; 7:2.

Fourth-day. Prophecy fulfilled. 2 Kings 7:3-20.

Fifth-day. Deliverance through Jehovah. 1 Sam. 11:1-13.

Sixth-day. Hezekiah's trust. 2 Chron. 32:1-13.

Seventh-day. Daniel's trust. Dan. 6:1-27.

First-day. Angel of Jehovah. Psa. 34:1-22.

Time.—Probably in the reign of Jehoram, King of Israel, who reigned 861-849 B. C. or 904-894 B. C.

Place.—Dothan, a small town about 10 miles north of Samaria. It was placed upon a hill; also Samaria.

Monarchs.—Jehoram, King of Israel; Jehoshaphat, King of Judah.

Parallel Account.—None.

The present lesson is another selection from incidents in the life of Elisha. It is not possible to give exact dates or definitely the names of Kings. Possibly it was in the reign of Jehoram, King of Israel, and one of the Benhadads of Syria, or of Hazael. There was frequent war between the two countries. Elisha, unlike Elijah, was again and again "mixed up with the political and military affairs of his country." It appears to have been a time when the Syrians made frequent raids upon Israel, much to the discomfort and loss of the country. Elisha is related to have aided the King of Israel by revealing the plans of the Syrians, much to the annoyance of their King. This is the setting for the beautiful lesson illustrating the watchfulness of God over His faithful children.

8. "King of Syria." Probably one of the Benhadads.

9-10. Elisha warns and so protects the Israelites.

11-12. Naturally the King of Syria felt that there must be some treachery among his men to cause such constant failure. His servants tell him that his plans are revealed by the supernatural power of Elisha, the prophet of Israel.

13. "Dothan." Where Elisha now appears to have been living. The Syrian now planned to secure Elisha and so put an end to further disclosures. Dothan was on the route northward from Samaria, and from its position was a place of some importance as a defensive outpost.

14-15. The Syrians carry out the plan secretly and invest the little fortress with a strong force, stronger than the garrison. "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" A cry that has been gone up many a time since—in times of pain, sorrow, and distress.

16. "Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." The young man saw what was obvious—the immediate present danger, but he had not that spiritual vision which the prophet possessed, who could trust in God and see beyond the surrounding peril.

17. Elisha desired that the young man should realize the protecting arm of the Lord. In answer to his prayer, the eyes of the young man were opened so that he saw "the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha." Fire is, all through the Bible, used as a symbol of God's power and presence. See Exod. 3:2; Ps. 104:4; Rev. 1:14; 19:12; Isa. 29:6, etc.

18. "Blindness." In the original a word used only here and in Gen. 19:11. It does not mean physical blindness, but blindness or confusion of mind. "And they came down to him." This is not clear. The Syriac version reads, "And when they (Elisha and his servant) came down to them (the Syrians)."

19. It does not seem to have been considered wrong in those days to deceive an enemy, but, as the sequel shows, it was Elisha's purpose to give them a lesson, not to injure them.

21. "My father." This shows the good terms upon which the King and Elisha must have been.

22. Elisha asks the King whether he would have killed the Syrians had they been taken in battle. The presumption is that he would not, but would have kept them as slaves. Then the prophet commands the King to give them refreshment. "Bread and water" is not to be understood literally; it means a set meal.

23. The King did as Elisha told him, and the result was a cessation of raids. It is this last statement which makes it doubtful whether the incident took place in the reign of Benhadad, for it is pretty certain that there was warfare till the end of that reign. Hence some students refer the incident to the reign of Hazael, who followed Benhadad. As no names are mentioned in the text and there is no parallel account, it is not possible to speak with certainty.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

There are very many promises of protection and safety in the Bible. What is their meaning? History and experience have abundantly shown that God's saints have not been and are not saved from trouble, danger, anguish, defeat, or from apparently hopeless and final failure, or even death. "Where, then have been those horses and chariots of fire?"

In the first place it would be hard to point out an instance, where one of God's children has not been able to carry out the work assigned him to perform. Men are not always the best judges of success, or where each one's work had best end. To human eyes the removal of Abraham Lincoln was a calamity from which this country is still suffering; but how do we know that he was the one best fitted to carry on reconstruction? He was taken in the moment of victory, and his fame is enduring; it might not have been, had he lived longer.

Again, the chariots and horses of fire are just as truly present as in the days of Elisha, but they "are there to work a deliverance yet greater and more eternal. Their office is not to deliver the perishing body, but to carry into God's glory the immortal soul." God does support the trusting soul and guide and keep the loving heart even unto death. Psa. 48:14.

Wisely concluding that practical knowledge is preferable to theoretical, the first party of American business men ever to make a tour of Europe for the purpose of studying business and economic conditions will sail from Boston, Sixth month 12th, on the Cunarder "Ivernia," for a seventy-days' trip through England, France, Germany, Belgium, Austria-Hungary and Switzerland. The trip will end in Paris, Eighth month 15th. Although conducted by the Boston Chamber of Commerce, this tour will not be strictly confined to New England men. The party of one hundred will include not only many of the leading business men of the New England States, but also delegations from the commercial organizations and municipal governments of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cleveland, Detroit, Pittsburg, St. Paul and other cities. It is also expected that officials representing the United States Government and various States will accompany the party.

Notices

A call has been issued for an international conference on the Negro, to be held at Tuskegee Institute, Fourth month 17 to 19, 1911. A circular letter from Booker T. Washington states:

"The object of calling this conference at Tuskegee Institute is to afford an opportunity for studying the methods employed in helping the Negro people of the United States, with a view of deciding to what extent Tuskegee and Hampton methods may be applied to conditions in this country, as well as to conditions in Africa.

It is hoped that numbers of people representing the different interests in Africa and the West Indies, as well as representatives from the United States, and the countries of South America, will decide to attend the conference. Especially is it urged that missionary and other workers in these various countries be present and take an active part in the deliberations of the conference.

The Winona Summer School of Missions meets at Winona Lake, Ind., Sixth month 22 to 29, 1911. The school is under the auspices of the Interdenominational Committees of the Central West, representing Women's Boards of Foreign and Home Missions.

The committees announce courses of lecture studies on the 1911 text books for home and foreign Mission Study, to be given by Mrs. D. B. Wells and Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, and a course of Bible studies. Conferences concerning methods, both for women's and young people's work, will be conducted by trained leaders, and on several evenings there will be public addresses by some of the most inspiring of our missionary speakers.

In addition to the regular work of the school, there will be frequent opportunity for helpful social intercourse with workers at home and in foreign lands. The women of this territory will also find here a very unusual opportunity for informal conference and discussion with their own denominational officers.

JUST THIS MINUTE.

If we're thoughtful just this minute,
In whate'er we say or do;
If we put a purpose in it
That is honest, thorough and through.
We shall gladden life and give it
Grace to make it all sublime;
For, though life is long, we live it
Just this minute at a time.

Just this minute we are going
Toward the right or toward the wrong;
Just this minute we are sowing
Seeds of sorrow or of song.
Just this minute we are thinking
On the ways that lead to God,
Or in idle dreams are sinking
To the level of the clod.

Yesterday is gone, tomorrow
Never comes within our grasp;
Just this minute's joy or sorrow—
That is all our hands may clasp.
Just this minute! Let us take it
As a pearl of precious price,
And with high endeavor make it
Fit to shine in paradise.

A college professor is said to have derived "Italy" from Latium, as follows: "You cut off the 'um,' and have 'Lati' left: read this backward, add 'y,' and there you are."

"Tea or coffee?" demanded the bustling waitress.

He smiled benignly. "Don't tell me; let me guess," he whispered.—Brooklyn Life.

WHERE ART THOU, GOD?

"Where art Thou, God?" The universal cry
That echoes down from Eden brings no light.

The greatest minds have searched the Cosmos, to Return in doubt, disheartened and alone.

As some seabird made blind by too much light

Against the lantern globe beats out its life,

Soul after soul makes shipwreck of itself

By striving blindly with its finite mind
To grasp the Infinite. Unaided by
The Holy Spirit's light no mortal man
Has ever reached that goal, nor ever will!

"No man by searching hath discovered God,"

For Christ reveals Him to the seeking soul,

Not in deep thought or meditative gaze,
But by the Spirit's touch transforming Him;

For this is Truth we "must be born again."

No man, by man's own power, can raise the man

Oh! Grant us then the Spirit's power to pierce

Right through the heart of things and find Thee, God,

Throughout the universe that Thou hast made!

For Thou are not far off beyond our ken,

But here beside us in this world of ours;
But we made blind by folly, sin or self,
Can never see Thee with unaided eyes.
Baptized by fire, and by the Spirit's touch

Transformed into the likeness of Thy Son,

The new-born soul may see Thee as Thou art,

And grow into Thy image, grace for grace,

And then this whole great universe will be

Embodied light; the light of love divine,
For Thou art Love. In Thee is peace and rest.

And joy unspeakable, and full of Hope.

The late Duke of Wellington got a letter once from a lady, saying she was soliciting subscriptions for a certain church, and had taken the liberty to put his name down for $1,000, and hoped he would promptly send her a check for that amount. He forthwith replied that he would respond to the call; but he, too, was interested in a certain church which needed subscriptions, and, counting upon his correspondent's well-known liberality, he had put her down for $1,000. NEWS IN BRIEF210

Blow, Summer South Wind, Blow!

Blow, summer south wind, blow!
Call to the flowers and banish the snow!
Lady Hepatica, out in the wood,
Hasn't unfastened her furry gray hood;
Tell her the vines are beginning to show
Trailing arbutus buds under the snow;
Gay little Crocus, as though it were fun,
Saucily smiles at the faint-hearted sun;
Whisper the word in her listening ear,
Winter is over and springtime is here.
Blow, summer south wind, blow!

Blow, summer south wind, blow!
Out of the South, where the orange trees grow,
Daintily clad in their delicate dress;
Linger a moment to steal a caress;
Speak to the robin and bluebird of spring;
Tell them it's time they were both on the wing;
Waken the brook to its chatter and song,
Laughing in glee as it hurries along;
Bring to the violet, sleeping all day,
Blossom-pink dreams of the oncoming May.
Blow, summer south wind, blow!

Blow, summer south wind, blow!
Into my heart with its mantle of snow.
Blow from the fields where the white lilies nod,
Stately and tall, by the river of God;
Bear me their sweetness and grace on your wings,
Fragrant with promise of heavenly springs;
Call to the sunbeams that lurk in a smile
All the wee blossoms of hope to beguile;
Winter and sorrow shall vanish away,
Springtime and gladness rejoice as the May.
Blow, summer south wind, blow!

THE SPIRIT OF THE RESURRECTION.

ROM. 6: 1-14.

(Easter Meeting.)

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fourth month 10th. A spirit of power. Eph.

1: 19, 20.

Third-day. A spirit of promise. 1 Pet. 1: 3-5.

Fourth-day. A spirit of life. Rom. 8: 9-11.

Fifth-day. A spirit of sonship. Rom. 8: 14-17.

Sixth-day. A spirit of holiness. Rom. 1: 4.

Seventh-day. A spirit of love. Gal. 5: 22-26.

Quote passages that speak of our spiritual resurrection.

What do you understand by "the new life"?

How have you realized the Spirit's influence?

"Tomb, thou shalt not hold Him longer;
Death is strong, but life is stronger;
Stronger than the dark, the night;
Faith and hope triumphant say,
'Christ will rise on Easter day.'"

* * *

The spirit of the Resurrection is the spirit of power. The power that rolled the stone away, the power that shook the earth, the power that overcame the keepers, the power that raised Christ from the dead is the power which raises, strengthens, ennoble, spiritualizes human life. We believe that power raised Christ and we glory in it. Do we know that same power as the means of raising us above the assaults of a quick temper, an un-Christian disposition, and an unruly tongue? He, the living Christ, conquers in great things, let Him triumph in little things. Most battles that make character are fought on the field of little things. Here is where souls are captured or crowned.

* * *

"The Incarnation, the Atonement and the Resurrection are the mountain level truths of revelation and history. There are two courses open to us. One is to pull these truths down to the dead level of the common human mind. This is the method of a shriveled faith. There is no more melancholy spectacle than the retreat of a fading faith from the mountain-level truths of revelation. The other course is to rise from the level of the common human mind to the high altitude-truths just as the steamboat moves mountainward. It enters the lock and water which moves down from the sunbathed peaks, lifts the boat to the next level and so by successive calls from the heights, the high levels are gained. Thus faith lifts the gateway to God, and from the heaven-bathed summits the waters of life lift to the very mountain peaks of supernatural revelation."

* * *

The spirit of the Resurrection is the spirit of the more abundant life. The Resurrection opens a doorway into a new and brighter world for humanity. Celestial glory like sunlight pours in through the open door. By this man learns he is a creature of two worlds; he is in time but belongs to eternity; his feet are on earth, his head in heaven; he is a finite being with infinite possibilities. Thus he is torn between two worlds; the material and the spiritual struggle for mastery. Which shall win depends on the reality of his faith in the risen and living Christ.

* * *

Paul said that Jesus brought immortality to light through the Gospel, yet Jesus had very little to say about immortality. He lived immortality day by day; words on the subject were superfluous. "Immortality will come to such as are fit for it, and he who would be a great soul in future, must be a great soul now."

"Thou wilt not leave us in the dust;
Thou madest man, he knows not why;
He thinks he was not made to die;
And Thou hast made him: Thou art just."

The spirit of the Resurrection is the spirit of immortality which crowns the life of man as naturally as the blossom crowns the plant. Immortality is an inherent part of normal life.

* * *

The "Practice of Immortality" is a great phrase; it is a greater task, and well worth the heroic effort of noble souls. Practicing immortality takes the sordidness out of daily living. Immortality has been preached as a future reward; it should be preached as a present experience. A soul does not become immortal after death; it is immortal now.

* * *

IMMORTALITY.

"They say I am only mortal
Like others I am born to die.
In the mighty will of the spirit
I answer, 'Death I defy.'"

"And I feel a power uprising
Like the power of an embryo god
With a glorious wall it surrounds me,
And lifts me up from the sod.

"I am born to die? Ah, never
This spirit is all of me.
I stand in the great forever,
O God, I am one with Thee.

"I think of this birthright immortal,
And my being expands like a rose,
As an odorous cloud of incense
Around and above me flows.

"O the glory and joy of living!
To know we are one with God:—
'Tis an armor of light to the spirit.
'Tis a blossom that crowns the sod.

"Thus I stand in the Great Forever,
With Thee as eternities roll.
Thy Spirit forsaketh me never,
Thy love is the Home of my soul."

Faith As A Way Of Life

Some persons think of faith as a mark of weakness. To their minds it is a form, or relic, of superstition—a diet of "milk" to be discarded for the "strong meat" of knowledge as soon as one is full-grown. There are many grown-up boys and girls who pride themselves on having outgrown the need of this old-fashioned article. "When I was a child," they grandly say, "I thought as a child, but when I reached the age of manhood I put away childish things. I mean to accept nothing now which I cannot know."

That general program, however, turns out to be very absurd. It will not work for a minute. Instead of bringing emancipation, it makes life a poor rope of sand, with no power whatever to it. A little thought and insight would show this person, who is so eager to graduate from his childhood stage, that all his knowledge and all his activities are penetrated through and through with faith. He cannot move a step without it; he cannot even start to think without it. He must trust the evidence of his senses. He must have faith that there is a world which corresponds to his impressions of sight and touch, of taste and smell. He must assume and believe that what is outside and beyond his mind fits what is inside. Who can ever "prove" to him that the world actually is precisely the way it looks? Nobody. That is a mighty venture of faith which we all must make. We must live in the belief that the world outside the mind and inside the mind make together one whole and coherent world.

Science, too, involves faith at every point of its structure. All the tools, the instruments, the machinery of science must be taken as a venture of faith. The greatest tool it uses is the principle of cause—everything in the universe must have a cause and must be explained by its cause. But that universal principle of science never has been "proved," and, from the nature of the case, never can be "proved." It is assumed as a working principle and used on a venture of faith. There is no doubt that it works very well but it is nevertheless faith applied to science. The "laws" of the universe which science spells out are never seen with the eye or touched with the hand. They are not material "things." They are as invisible and intangible as God Himself is. They are in the sphere of faith rather than in the sphere of knowledge. We have no way of "knowing" that the laws of nature will always remain uniform, will always work as they do now, will always be reliable and trustworthy. No amount of experience could ever "prove" that. We make the great venture of faith that it is so and act upon it and it works well, and on the basis of it we predict future events.

Faith is still more evident as a working energy in the practical matters of life. Society could not exist an hour on a bare "knowledge" basis. All banks would suspend, all laws would become invalid, the world would be turned into a vast insane asylum, each individual living in solitary isolation in the whirl of his own ideas. Marriage and home building are beautiful instances of faith. No one ever "knows," or can "know," that in the stress of years, in the give and take of life, in the lights and shadows of this world of mutability, the friend of his youthful fancy will grow dearer and truer, more inwardly beautiful and indispensable to him and that their two individual lives and wills will merge into an indivisible union. Marriage is of necessity a venture of faith, as is friendship of every sort. That does not mean that it is a mere hazard, a blind guess. It too often is so, no doubt, but that is because the persons marrying make a hazard and are not guided by real faith.

Real faith—faith which carries in itself a constructive energy—always builds on solid foundations and can test its building as it builds. Marriage is always a hazard, a chance, to use the current society word it is "a gamble," unless the two persons who are to marry have already a sufficient experience of love and friendship with each other to warrant the faith that their intended future will increase in worth and joy. If marriages are made for money or for beauty or social standing, there is of course very little ground for faith in a happy future union which will grow truer and deeper as the years go. But if the two lives have already found each other and are united in common interests, in genuine friendship, in happy personal fellowship, if their love has its roots in moral character and not in surface traits the step is still a venture of faith, but it is a faith guaranteed and tested by experience. Faith in this case is merely building out upon the solid pillars of experience. It is the power to see and to appreciate and to trust what still remains hidden from us in the life we have already proved. It is a well-grounded belief that the future will bring out and fulfil what the life we have come to know promises and prophecies. We trust the unseen to complete the seen, and we make our venture.

Religious faith in its highest and best sense is of this type. It is not blind groping, hap-hazard believing. It is building out upon the solid pillars of the soul's experience. It is the soul's power to see what fits and fulfils and completes what is already here. Our very finite nature calls for a world of infinite reality to fulfil it. Our hunger and thirst of soul reveal something in us which no earthly supplies can satisfy. Our sins and failures and frailties call for the help and healing of a Divine Saviour. We are made so that we cannot live without streams of spiritual energy, without the incoming of saving grace and transforming power. We cannot be victorious and triumphant without a heavenly Friend, a Divine Companion. And in our need, in our stress, He offers Himself to us. He comes with His help and healing. He seems completely to fit our need. But only a venture of faith can settle the matter for us. He has saved others. He has enabled others to more than conquer. It is a safe venture and it stands and vindicates every test.

A Crisis

Never before has the financial struggle of a Friends College been so acute as that of Penn College, Iowa, at the present time. In addition to the difficulties encountered by our other educational institutions, Penn is forced to meet the exacting requirement of the State Board of Education that an "A" class college in Iowa shall have an endowment of $200,000. The time is rapidly approaching when this condition must be met. An additional $100,000 must be secured for Penn College by Sixth month 1, 1911. Between $60,000 and $70,000 only have been raised at this writing. Available sources have been and are being appealed to in the strongest possible manner. It will take considerable co-operation from outside sources to complete the $100,000 within the time limit. Any one desiring to contribute or obtain additional information should address David M. Edwards, President of Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa.

The fate of Iowa Yearly Meeting is in the balance, as its prosperity is dependent upon that of Penn College. Failure to raise this additional $100,000 endowment will result in the discontinuance of the college; success in this enterprise will usher in an era of unprecedented prosperity. The failure of Penn College would be an unspeakable calamity to American Quakerism; while its success augurs much for the future of our Society.

Third National Peace Congress

On the afternoon of Fifth month 3d, President Taft will open the Third National Peace Congress in Baltimore. A splendid array of talent appears on the program—Cardinal Gibbons, Lyman Abbott, John W. Foster, Theodore E. Burton, Andrew Carnegie, Baron d'Estournelles de Constant and others will speak. The congress will deal with the two leading lines of peace work, namely, (1) the awakening of the public conscience by addresses directed against the folly and the injustice which flow from war, together with the economic waste of universal armaments, and (2) the practical means of making war difficult by establishing institutions which will take away the excuse for war.

While a representative attendance from all sections of the country is expected, the fact that the congress is held in Baltimore makes it especially accessible to the South. The first congress was held in New York City, 1907, and the second in Chicago, 1909. Opportunity is now given to extend enthusiasm into a new field where the interest is growing.

It seems especially fitting, also, that Maryland is to be favored with the congress at this time since the American Peace Society has recently decided to make Washington, D. C., its headquarters. Senator Burton has been elected president, and the secretary, Benjamin F. Trueblood, will go with his family to the capitol city. While this move should widen the society's influence throughout the nation, it also means that a large and new constituency of loyal and liberal supporters must be found in the above-named State. The Peace Congress should aid in the work.

Getting Under The Burden of Things

The editor of The Nebraska Friend touches a tender spot when he comments on the indifference of many Friends to the larger work of the church:

We have been much exercised, as we have visited every meeting in our Yearly Meeting, that our membership should get under the burden of things. There are so many to whom church work seems but a secondary consideration, indeed with some it seems to be almost an incidental. When every member of our yearly meeting is willing to assume a task, then and only then will God equip us for work in an ever-increasing field of usefulness. * * * At a recent gathering of the Men and Religion Forward Movement held in Kansas City, Mo., a well-known minister related the following incident, which will we think bear repetition here: A man who had been out of touch with the church for thirty-five years applied to him to be reinstated into church fellowship. His reasons in brief were as follows: He had thought he could be a Christian without any church associations, and had prayed every day for thirty-five years, "Lord, help me!" Whilst on his knees the day before, he had seemed to hear the Lord say to him: "You old good-for-nothing, you don't need any help from me to do what you are doing." I wonder to how many members of Nebraska Yearly Meeting the Lord might speak thus with equal truth.

This "getting under the burden of things" is the secret of religious growth and it is along this line that denominational literature and especially a denominational paper can be most helpful.

The Late Justus C. Strawbridge

"He is almost the last of the old-fashioned Quaker merchants that helped to give Philadelphia its mercantile reputation. Quiet, unobtrusive, earnest, he was a man who did things and talked but little about them. For a long time toward the end of his active business life his public spirit was proven by his devotion to almost every civic work going on in Philadelphia. He was a type of this old city's best citizenship."

These are the words of John Wanamaker concerning the late Justus C. Strawbridge, founder and for many years head of the firm of Strawbridge and Clothier.

Among those who attended the funeral was the man who started him in business. A little more than fifty years ago, Justus C. Strawbridge began as a dry goods clerk. His employer Joshua L. Bailey soon discovered his superior ability and encouraged him to go into business for himself; furnishing him with the necessary capital. He began in a small way at the corner of 8th and Market Streets, where part of the large store now stands. Later he formed a partnership with Isaac H. Clothier which was the beginning of the great firm of Strawbridge and Clothier. Through the years of expansion which followed, Justus C. Strawbridge remained faithful to his high ideals, and his life is a shining example of a true Christian and a successful business man.

Improvvidence A Modern Moloch

While the employees of a shirtwaist factory occupying the three upper floors of a ten-story building in Washington Place, New York, were receiving their weekly pay last Seventh-day week, a fire broke out and spread with alarming rapidity. Though the building was fire-proof, the floors were piled with highly combustible materials which were consumed within thirty minutes. The door to the roof was locked, and those to the two stairways opened on the inside, so that egress became next to impossible, and 142 out of 600 employes lost their lives. Of this number at least 125 were mere girls. Inadequate means of escape seems to be the only reason for this horrible catastrophe.

Some comfort is derived from the thought that this needless sacrifice of 142 human lives is not in vain. New York has been deeply stirred and steps are being taken to guard against a repetition of the disaster. Stricter laws and greater administrative precaution will doubtless result; but what an awful price to pay for this spur to duty.

New York State Library Destroyed

Within four days of the Washington Place disaster the west wing of the New York State Capitol Building was destroyed by fire. Many rare books and documents were wiped out of existence. The librarian of Columbia University is quoted as regarding it as "the greatest library disaster in history." It is estimated that upwards of $4,000,000 will be required to repair the damage to the building alone; while no amount of money can restore many of the books and papers. The fire was discovered early, when a few buckets of water or a hand extinguisher would have smothered the flames. Nothing of the kind seems to have been at hand. The night watchman had to run all the way down stairs before he could sound an alarm, there being no alarms in the building. Here again the lack of fore-handedness seems to have been little less than criminal.

Strong Words From Sir Oliver Lodge

The outstanding feature of the recent meeting of the National Free Church Council of England was an address by the great scientist, Sir Oliver Lodge. He spoke on "Christian Revelation from a Scientific Point of View" and emphasised the fact that life is simpler than science and religion than philosophy. In this connection he said:

Often in the history of science, reality has proved simpler than our attempted conception of it. The sun is a glorious object full of mystery and unknown forces, but the sunshine is a friendly, homely thing. The sunshine is not the sun, but it is the human and terrestrial aspect of the sun. This represents the Christian conception of God. Christ is sunshine—that fraction of the transcendental cosmic Deity which suffices for the earth.

How a Beautiful Girl Became a Queen and Saved Her People

BY RUFUS M. JONES.

Esther was a little girl whose home was in the city of Shushan. She had no father nor mother, for they were both dead, and she lived with her good cousin Mordecai, who took her as his own daughter and loved her very much. He used to tell her beautiful stories of a land far away which had once been the home of her people. It was, he thought, the fairest land in all the world. It had high mountains with long valleys full of brooks and flowers, and on the sides of the hills there were vineyards and orchards and above them on the higher hills the sheep and the goats, the kids and the little lambs climbed for the tender grass. He told her of one hill which he loved more than all others. It had once had a glorious city upon it, with a high wall all about it, a holy temple in it, a shining palace where the king lived and long streets full of happy homes. This was Jerusalem. But a king with a great army of soldiers had come and burnt the city down. He had destroyed the holy temple and broken the wall to pieces and he had carried the people far away to live in a land which was not their own.

Esther would feel the tears run down her cheeks as she listened to the story of that loved city on the hill and how it had gone to ashes and how her people had been carried far away to a new country where there was no temple and no homes like the ones they had left in the land of hills and flowers; and she would say to herself "when I grow up I shall always love that old city where my people used to live and I shall love my own people and perhaps God will let me do something to help them. How I should like to make them free and happy again!" and then she would sing a beautiful song about the land her people loved, until she could almost see how it looked under its clear blue sky. She thought so much about beautiful things and she kept so pure and sweet and happy that her face grew very beautiful and every year she was more beautiful than she had been the year before. She never thought about her own beautiful face herself and she hardly knew that her eyes and hair and nose and cheeks and mouth were perfect, but everybody who saw her knew it, and turned to look at her again. Just when Esther was full grown and had reached the height of her beauty, the king who had a palace in Shushan, the greatest king in all the world then, wanted someone to be his queen. He told his servants to go out and find the loveliest person in all the world and bring her to his palace and, if he loved her, he would choose her as his queen. When they saw Esther they thought they had never seen anyone else so beautiful and they took her to the king, and he loved her above all women he had ever seen in the world, and he put the royal crown upon her head and made her his queen, and gave her a palace to live in. Her room was hung with beautiful colors. The floor was made of marble in many tints. Her bed was of gold and silver and all the dishes she used were of gold, and she could have whatever she wished.

You would expect that all this new and wonderful life in the palace would spoil Esther and make her proud. But it did not. She was as simple and good as she had been when she lived in the little house with her cousin Mordecai, and she kept hoping that the time would come when she could do some fine and noble thing for the people she loved—her own people. And the time did come.

There was in Shushan a very bad and wicked man named Haman. He was a great prince and everybody bowed down to him when he went by. But Esther's cousin, Mordecai, knew that Haman was a wicked man and he would not bow down to him. He sat straight upright, with his hat on his head, whenever Haman went by him. This made Haman very angry indeed and he said to himself, "I will have him killed and all his people, for I hate them." Then he went to the great king and he said: "Oh king, live forever. There are some people in this country who came here from Jerusalem. They are not like us. They do not keep our laws. We should be better off if they were out of the way. I think they all ought to be killed."

I am afraid the king did not stop to think much about it. He probably had something else on his mind, and he said to Haman, "Well, go ahead and do what you like," and he put a ring on Haman's hand as a sign of his power. That was exactly what Haman wanted. He was so sure now that he could kill Mordecai, who would not bow to him, that he went and built a great high frame work called a gallows, as high as the tallest trees, to hang him on and then he went home to tell his wife how happy he was. But Mordecai when he heard the news that he and all his people were to be killed went and told the beautiful queen Esther that the time had now come, which she had always longed for, when she could do a noble thing for the people she loved, and that if she did not save them, cruel Haman would have them all put to death. Esther knew that if she went to the king's palace without being invited, the king might put her to death, for that was the law of that land, but she said, "I will risk my life and go tomorrow; perhaps the king will be kind and will hold out his golden sceptre to me and then I can ask what I will."

That night the king could not sleep. He tossed upon his golden bed and wished he was a child again so that he could fall asleep. Then he asked one of his servants to read a book to him, and the servant read about the time when some wicked men had tried to kill the king, but Mordecai had heard what they were going to do and told the king and had saved his life. When the king heard this he said, "What have we ever done to reward Mordecai for this great thing he did?" and the king's servants said, "Nothing has ever been done to reward him."

Now while the king was thinking what he would do to reward the good Mordecai, Haman came into the palace and the king called him to his room, and said to him, "I want to honor a man who has done a great thing for me, what do you think I had better do to honor and reward him?" Haman was a very selfish man and he thought to himself, "Of course I must be the man whom the king is going to honor and reward." So he said to the king, "I think the best thing to do for the man you want to honor would be to dress him in the king's robes and put him on the king's horse, and set the king's crown on his head and have the king's most noble prince lead the horse through the city—that would be a wonderful honor." Then the king said: "We will do that. The man whom I want to honor is Mordecai and you shall lead the horse." You can imagine how poor old wicked Haman felt, leading the horse through the city while the man he wanted to hang was sitting on the king's splendid horse, clothed in cloth of gold, with a golden crown upon his head.

The time had now come for Esther to go to the king to see if she could save her people. She put on the most beautiful clothes she had and her crown on her head, and stood by the great king's door. She was afraid he might be very angry because she had come without an invitation. But when he saw her, he smiled and held out his golden sceptre, and said, "What is thy request, my queen? Thou shalt have anything to the half of my kingdom." Esther was very happy and said: "Oh king, I am going to have a banquet and I want you and Haman to come to it tomorrow, and the king said, "It shall be so, we will come."

The banquet was a splendid feast. They had the most rare and wonderful things to eat and to drink, all served in golden dishes, and the king was very much pleased. Then he said again to Esther: "My queen thou mayest ask for anything and I will give it to thee, even to half of my kingdom."

Then Esther said, "Oh king, I love my people. But a wicked man is trying to have them all killed, and if you do not stop him we must all perish. Oh king, save my people." And the king said: "Who is this wicked man? Where is there a man who dares to be so bad." Esther grew very bold and brave and answered: "There he is sitting there. It is this man Haman. He wants to kill my cousin Mordecai and me and all my people." The king was very angry against Haman when he heard this, and he ordered his servants to seize him, and they took him out and hanged him on the very gallows which he had built for Mordecai, and Esther and all her people were saved.

The English Bible

BY W. O. TRUEBLOOD.

The Bishops' Bible.

Cranmer sent a copy of Matthew's Bible to Cromwell, 1537, with the request that he should use his influence to get Henry VIII, to license it until the bishops should send forth a better version, at the same time expressing the view that a better translation would not be until "a day after doomsday." However, the bishops did produce a version in 1568 known as the Bishops' Bible. It was by no means a better version than 1537, but according to competent authority, in a "hoste of important respects vastly inferior."

In typography and illustration this is perhaps the most sumptuous in the long series of folio English Bibles. We learn that the price at which this edition sold in 1571, was equivalent to about $80 today. As might be expected, courtly influence is very evident. On the first title which contains in a border the simple words, "the Holie Bible Conteyning the Olde Testament and the Newe" is a large portrait of Elizabeth herself.

It is evident from the outset that the Bishops' Bible was edited and printed for the ecclesiastical and ruling classes, and was intended to supersede the Geneva version that was becoming so popular among the nonconformists in general. But the Bible does not lend itself readily to the purposes of selfish and ignoble men, and notwithstanding the high episcopal sanction and supervision with which this Bible was favored, it is the most unsatisfactory and useless of all the old translations.

The Rheims Testament.

In 1582, at Rheims, the Roman Catholic scholars issued the first version of the New Testament published in English by that church. This version was inspired by a desire to win England back to the fold of Rome, and to counteract the influence of the various translations that had gone before. However, being made by Roman Catholics for the express purpose of combatting the influence of various Protestant English Bibles and "specially for discoverie of the corruption of divers translations," it never takes rank among the splendid labors of such self-sacrificing and devout scholars as Tyndale and Coverdale. We should be loath indeed to accept such translations as the following:

"From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, 'Doe penance for the kingdom of God is at hand.'

"Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after justice; for they shall have their fill."

It was twenty-seven years after the publication of the Rheims Testament before the Roman Catholics completed their version of the Bible by issuing the Old Testament portion.

The Authorized Version.

Even the casual reader will notice the controversial element that clusters around the three last named versions.

The Catholic translation was too full of Romish terms and foot notes to allow it any considerable place among the people of England. The Bishops' Version, a very inferior production, neither commanded the respect of scholars nor suited the wants of the people. The Genevan was the favorite version of the people in general, the most accurate translation then printed, but some of the men concerned in the Geneva Bible had strong leanings towards non-conformity and had made it, through the Puritan character of its notes, quite the Bible of a party. There was, therefore, a need for a new version which, accepted by all, should form a bond of union between the contending classes.

James I, on his accession to the throne of England found the Protestant Church divided into two rival parties—the Conformists and the Puritans. The latter hailed the occasion of James' coming with peculiar pleasure since he had publicly subscribed to Presbyterianism and had openly declared his disapproval of the English Church liturgy. A petition was presented to the king requesting that certain concessions should be made to the Nonconformists.

The king, who was fond of theological controversy, soon arranged that a public conference should be held between the Conformists and Puritans at Hampton Court. Over this famous assembly, held in January 1604, the theological monarch presided in person, and took no small interest in debate. It was during this conference that a request was made, which resulted in the issuing of our present Authorized Version of the Scriptures.

On the second day of the convention John

Reynolds, President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the leader of the Puritan party suggested to the king the need of a new version of the Bible. He briefly instanced from the versions then extant, some renderings which did not correspond with the original. The Bishop of London immediately opposed such a plan, saying, "If every man's humour should be followed there would be no end of translating."

But the suggestion of Dr. Reynolds pleased the king. A Bible translation made under his auspices would greatly add to the glory of his reign, besides which, to a man whose learning was really considerable, and who was specially fond of displaying it in theological matters, the direction of such a work would be very congenial. A still further motive might have been found in the dislike which he had for the popular Geneva Bible. The whole tone of its politics and theology, as exhibited in the marginal notes, was utterly distasteful to James. He commanded the new translators that no notes should be added, saying, "I have found in those which were annexed to the Geneva translation, some notes very partial, untrue, seditious, and savouring too much of dangerous and traitorous conceits."

Whatever may have been the motive promoting James to undertake the new translation, no one can doubt the wisdom of the arrangements for carrying out the work.

"Fifty-four learned men were selected impartially from High Churchmen and Puritans, as well as from those who, like Saville and Boys, represented scholarship totally unconnected with any party. And in addition to this band of revisers the king also designed to secure the co-operation of every Biblical scholar of note in the kingdom."

An admirable set of fourteen rules was drawn up for the instruction of the revisers, directing amongst other things that any competent scholar might be consulted about special difficulties; that differences of opinion should be settled at a general meeting; and last, but by no means least, that there should be no marginal notes except for the explanation of Hebrew and Greek words. This simple rule did more perhaps than anything else to make the Authorized Version the Bible of all classes in England, binding them together with a bond of affection, which theological disputes and political differences cannot sever. Had a different policy been pursued, we might have had today, instead of the one Bible a number of versions, translated to suit the whims of contending parties.

"Never," says Smyth, "had such labour and care been expended on the English Bible. The revisers used every aid accessible to make their work a success. They carefully studied the Greek and Hebrew; they used the best commentaries of European scholars; the Bibles in Spanish, Italian, French, and German were examined for any help they might afford in arriving at the exact sense of each passage; and when the sense was found, no pains were spared to express it in clear, vigorous, idiomatic English.

All the excellencies of the previous versions were noted for the purpose of incorporating them in the work, and even the Rhemish translation was laid under contribution for some expressive phrases which it contained. . . . Nor did the revisers disdain to revise that which they had done, and to bring back to the anvil that which they had hammered, fearing no reproach for slowness nor coveting praise for expedition."

At last, after seven years of unremitting toil the task was completed and the version of "elegance and flowing beauty" was given to the public. It was sent from the press early in 1611 to win its way over all rivals and at last through sheer merit and not by any official decree, to be accepted as the Authorized Version.

The following are striking words when we remember that they were penned by one who was an avowed enemy of the Protestant Bible. "Who will say," writes Father Faber, "that the uncommon beauty and marvelous English of the Protestant Bible is not the great stronghold of heresy in this country? It lives on the ear like a music that can never be forgotten, like the sound of church bells, which the convert scarcely knows how he can forego: Its felicities seem often to be almost things rather than words. It is part of the national mind, and the anchor of the national seriousness. Nay, it is worshipped with a positive idolatry, in extenuation of whose fanaticism its intrinsic beauty pleads availingly with the scholar. The memory of the dead passes into it. The potent traditions of childhood are stereotyped in its verses. It is the representative of a man's best moments; all there has been about him of soft, and gentle, and pure, and penitent, and good, speaks to him forever out of his English Bible. It is his sacred thing, which doubt never dimmed and controversy never soiled; and in the length and breadth of the land there is not a Protestant with one spark of religiousness about him whose spiritual biography is not in his English Bible."

(To be concluded.)

The Stranger's Message

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

The pastor was surprised when the treasurer of the monthly meeting came to him as the congregation was gathering First-day morning, and asked the privilege of presenting the financial needs of the meeting at the close of the service, because he himself had felt it laid upon his heart to preach on "The Duty of Giving." The sermon was delivered most effectively, and the hearers were evidently impressed anew with the sacredness of the stewardship.

The treasurer was then given an opportunity. He began by asking for $5 subscriptions, but was interrupted by a stranger in the audience who subscribed $10, and asked the privilege of saying a few words. He stated that he was a Presbyterian business man from a distant city and that about a year previous his wife and daughter, while sojourning near this meeting, had attended. They immediately wrote home, telling him how impressive was the simple service, and how helpful the earnest, spiritual sermon. Being in the city for the day, he had felt desirous of worshiping where his wife and daughter had been blessed, and so sought out this church among the many places of worship. He had long practiced tithing his income, with great blessing to himself, temporally and spiritually, and he felt it a privilege to help in the emergency of the day, and to increase his contribution if necessary.

Following the remarks of the stranger, several $10 subscriptions were taken although the treasurer had hesitated to ask for more than half that amount to begin with. Many smaller contributions were subscribed and the needed amount was quickly secured. As the members exchanged quiet glances at the strange turn of affairs, there was a mutual recognition of God's hand in the ordering of the meeting, and a happy realization of the truth that it is better to give than to receive.

Lest the reader should think this a quotation from a tract, it may be well to state that the event occurred Third month 19th, in the Friends meeting at Los Angeles. The pastor who preached on giving was Wallace E. Gill and the happy treasurer was Enos Coppock. The minister whose sermon was so helpful to the visiting lady and her daughter, and which proved the means of blessing and assistance to the church a year later, was H. Edwin McGrew. "In the morning sow the seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not whether it will prosper, this or that, or whether both shall prove alike good."

Does Mexico Exist?

BY A BIT OF WISDOM, JR.

[The following pictures the plight of one who rejects all "faith" and proceeds exclusively on the "knowledge" basis as outlined in the leading editorial.—ED.]

In the midst of all this talk about a revolution in Mexico, I have been wondering whether after all there really is such a country as Mexico. To be sure, I have an idea that most of the people I know think there is, I know that the newspapers assume there is, and I even know a few men who firmly believe that they have been in Mexico. But I doubt whether any of those men who think they have been there could prove it. It is true, I have not asked anyone to prove it, but I can imagine what his arguments would be.

I suppose somebody told him that a certain town was in Mexico—or perhaps he read in some book, or saw on some map, that that town was in Mexico. And without further investigation he believed it. He bought a railroad ticket which had on it the name of that town, he got on a train which was said to be going to Mexico, and when the conductor—a man whom he had never seen before—said that he had reached his destination he left the train and believed that he was in Mexico! A beautiful argument, is it not?

Of course my friend might tell me something more convincing. He might tell me all sorts of interesting things about life in Mexico—about the people, their customs, their dress, their food, how they feel about this revolution, and a hundred other things. He might even show me some curios that he brought back with him. But what an argument! He may have been in the Fiji Islands, for all I know. The customs of which he tells me may not be at all those of this hypothetical Mexico. And the little grass basket that he brought back may have been made by the Indians in Colorado or Wyoming. Not that I think my friend would lie to me, but he may be quite mistaken.

In short, I imagine that most of my friends who believe they have been in Mexico have merely taken somebody's word for it and have not seriously attempted to prove it. And that is why I have been wondering whether there really is a Mexico or not. If there really is a Mexico, men who have been there are certainly the ones who ought to be able to prove that there is. And if they cannot prove it, what am I to believe?

I suppose there are men who with transits and chronometers and table of logarithms can determine their position on the earth. But even they are depending on the accuracy of their instruments and their tables, and on lines of reasoning which may perhaps be faulty. And even if they really have been in latitude $25^{\circ} 17' N.$ and longitude $104^{\circ} 49' W.$ how am I to know that a Mexico is there?

I imagine that if I were to ask my friends for help in this matter I should find that they really know no more about it than I do. And perhaps they would laugh at me and not appreciate the real seriousness of the question. But since I cannot prove that a Mexico exists I am beginning to lose faith in it.

Whitherward?

BY H. DOUGLAS C. PEPLER.

They shall ask the way to Zion
With their faces thitherward.

In the far distance shines the city of our desire; high on a hill is it set; the roofs, windows and walls glisten as the earth glistens on a morning of frost in the early sun.

There are great banners at the four corners of the city; by them we know which way the wind cometh. The Spirit of God moves in the amazing turbulence of their flappings. Were they still, we should see the Cross upon them, broadly marked, the symbol of the Christ, but, by the breath of God, the banners so bend and fling themselves in the sky that even the Cross seems to be swallowed up in victory. It is for this that "My song is there in the open air; and I must sing with the banner and pennant a-flapping."

We see that the city is in the west, shining in the first light of dawn. The sun is as yet low on the horizon, so that our long shadows break on the trees below. There are many trees. Through a dark forest we have been wandering, and it would appear that we have to walk there for many days to come.

Days, years, or centuries? We wonder, but we are not troubled—do we not see the city?

We have achieved a little hill from which we look over the forest. Behold! the trees are beginning to break bud. It must be spring! We see the way we have come, zig-zag from the cold North towards the warm, easy South; not from the East to the West, as the sun would have guided us had we seen the sun. Nevertheless, now are we on the hill. Perhaps by no other way should we have reached this place of vision.

Look back at the turns and twists of our goings. Not far behind still stands the rough temple in which we rested for so long. It was not a temple, though we pretended otherwise. I forget how long we lived in that pretence. But after many nights, suddenly we realized that the great beams of the roof in which we gloried had shut us from the stars; that the walls were cracked and discolored; that what we had supposed to be a crucifix was the big, lifeless body of a bat. But in the horror of that gloom began the prayer which led us here.

"O God, show us the city. Forgive the lonely blindness of our unfaithful hearts; forgive the pretence of all our prayers, the belief that this place, separated from man and fashioned for our own poor delight, could have held Thee. Because we have sinned, because we are sick, because we have been tempted and have fallen, because we have denied Thee, therefore take heed, O compassionate God, and show us the city."

So we came to this hill and have seen the city—a great way off, but it is there—there, shining before us; and the sun, too, has risen upon us—our way at last thitherwards.

* * * * *

How many trees, how much underbrush, how many pitfalls there seem! But we know now that every step through them, every tree felled to the ground and overcome, brings us nearer. For some strange reason we rejoice in having to fight our way; it appears better service than the easy march along the open road. It is good even to feel this kind of tiredness.

We remember, some of us, the old days when, like camp followers, we kept behind the crowd, picking up what we could, lazily enjoying ourselves. It is better to be pioneers. We feel that God is glad of pioneers.

We enjoy this thought for awhile—God's pioneers are we. How splendid! Then we begin to observe that our path is clearing somewhat; the trees are not old, but young and new grown, though there are many old logs about. We fall sharply over one while we are congratulating ourselves on being pioneers—God's pioneers.

We discover that ours is not a new path. Men of might had passed this way before; giants, to judge by the trees they had hewn down. For a time we do not like to look at one another in the face. Pioneers—we? And then we laugh, a great shout of laughter; it is well so to be rid of conceit! We ask of him who is wisest amongst us to say whose track we have found in the forest, in the steps of what pioneers are we going? He tells us the names of many who have passed this way. "And," says he, "they followed in the footsteps of Another who came alone, carrying a Cross."

So we learn the way.

* * * * *

Did He see the city from the hill behind us; was He weary of the way; was the cross heavy and at times almost unbearable; or was He glad?

* * * * *

The sun will set behind the city; against the live red of the west will be the deep black-purple of its walls and towers. For a moment, before the lights blaze in the darkness, we shall be afraid; the banners, black against the sunset, will look like death.

But shall we not hear the pealing of the bells?—Friends Fellowship Papers.

Brotherly Love

BY P. J. CAMPBELL.

The greatest thing in the practical world is human service; and brotherly love is the only final evidence of practical Christianity. For "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" (I John 4:20).

Hate is a grievous thing, a cruel, violent and bitter savagery. It is born of weakness, not strength, for it is generated by fear, and fear is a confession of weakness. The strong, brave heart does not hate, because it does not fear. It mourns the evil, oppression and wrong in life, but it loves the humanity that struggles for the right.

Love is a wondrous thing, the most beautiful and potential manifestation in life. Love conquers where hate is halted; love succeeds where force fails; love aspires where all else falls. Part of the workshop of God is the love of our fellow-man, his children. If we would show our love for our Maker, we must show it in our love for His children, our brethren.

Religion that does not affect the everyday life is false. It deceives no one—certainly it does not deceive God. The measure of your love for God is taken by your love for your brother-man. When you are kind, considerate and helpful, when your heart goes out to humanity, when you strive to make the world a happier and better place to live in, when you feel the joys and sorrows, the hopes and aspirations of the race, when the spirit of brotherly love pervades your life, then, and only then, do you love God in spirit and in truth.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

Part of last week's issue was very poorly printed, and was mailed before the fact came to our notice. Clear copies will be sent to those who apply for them.—Editor.

James Wood, Mt. Kisco, N. Y., recently gave his lecture on "The Authorized Version of the Bible and Other Translations" in the Poughkeepsie Meeting. It was enjoyed by the members and many of the citizens.

* * *

Harry R. Keates, Des Moines, Iowa, recently spent ten days with Friends at New Providence, Iowa, in an evangelistic effort which resulted in a general quickening of the membership and in a number of decisions for Christ.

* * *

The meeting at Miami, Okla., has recently received an addition of 64 new members, the result of a revival held by Elwood Bulgin, Fort Worth, Tex., and G. L. Rose and wife, gifted singers. Jeremiah Hubbard is doing the pastoral work in Miami Meeting.

At the late County Sunday-School Convention, held at Pasadena, Cal., the "Friends Fellowship Class," of Friends Bible school in Los Angeles, composed of young men and young women, was awarded a very fine silk banner, in competition with like classes of the entire county for having present at the convention the largest percentage of its membership.

The students and faculty of Fairmount Academy, Ind., enjoyed a vacation Third month from 17th to 27th. The school will close Sixth month 2d.

The committee managing the Bible department, together with the trustees of the academy, recently visited the school. Dinner was served in the Biblical room to about 25 students and guests. The present and future of the department were topics of discussion. A committee on advertising and course of study was appointed.

The meetings at Antioch Chapel, Prodigal Home, and Mount Pleasant, Ohio, known as the Van Wert Circuit, have each been revived by evangelistic efforts. In the first-named place, Parvin W. Bond, the pastor, was ably assisted by Leora Bogue, Fairmount, Ind.; at Prodigal Home, Margaret Craig, a minister from Van Wert, and Ada Aicher, a gospel worker and singer, from Rockport, Ohio, were in charge, while at Mount Pleasant Anstice M. Harvey led in the effort. Fourteen out of thirty-five who confessed conversion have united with Friends. Others will probably follow.

In Twelfth month, a Christian Workers' Association was organized at Friendswood, Texas, by several Friends, who felt the need of a deeper knowledge of the Bible, and of the doctrine and history of Friends. Any questions of importance to the Church and its advancement are considered proper for discussion. The meetings are held on the first and third First-day of each month at 3.00 P. M. The membership numbers 25, with increasing interest and attendance.

The programs given have been well prepared, and the committee having the work in charge is planning a systematic study of the Discipline in the immediate future.

Charles Replogle, pastor in the meeting at Everett, Wash., holds the unique distinction of being the head of the Sitka tribe of the Klingit Indian Nation of Alaska, this tribe having chosen him their high chief some time ago, upon the death of their native ruler. This is by no means an empty honor, as the newly-chosen high chief of Anglo-Saxon blood is entitled to go to Alaska and rule over 12,000 natives in all their tribal affairs. As he probably has no thought of taking this step, a sub-chief will rule, according to native usage. This action of the tribe was in appreciation of the work of Charles Replogle and wife among them as missionaries from Kansas Yearly Meeting some years ago, and it is certainly significant of the impress left by the labors of these Friends in the far North.

Southern Quarterly Meeting, held at Back Creek, N. C., the 24th to 26th ult., was favored with the presence and service of Albert Peelle and Milner A. Cox. A lively discussion took place in the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight on the proper pastoral care of congregations. The "one man" pastoral system was generally disapproved. Elders were exhorted to aid ministers in their work.

At the regular business meeting, Frances P. Hubbard, Farmer, N. C., was appointed Missionary Superintendent for the quarter. A committee was also appointed to extend care over the delinquent monthly meetings, some of them not having met their proportionate share of the quarterly meeting budget.

Michael A. Farlow conducted the review of the lesson at the Bible school on First-day. Albert Peelle took the leading part in the meeting for worship. It was a good quarterly meeting.

Bryn Mawr College has published a list of the ten Seniors receiving the highest averages. Seven of them were prepared by public schools, and three by private schools. Helen Tredway, Dubuque, Iowa, heads the list with an average of 91.62. This is the highest grade yet won by any Bryn Mawr graduate since 1901, when the average was first published.

The European Fellowships have also been awarded, Helen Tredway receiving the college fellowship; Mary Edith Pinney, Wilson, Kan., the President's Fellowship; Margaret Elizabeth Brusstar, Philadelphia, the Mary E. Garrett Fellowship, and Adah Blanche Roe, Omaha, Neb., the Anna Ottendorfer Memorial.

It is interesting to note that three of the four girls receiving Fellowships were from Western States.

The Friends Temperance Association of Philadelphia pursues its calling along several lines, the most recent one adopted being that of school visiting. Two exceptionally qualified women, Clara P. H. Stilwell and Sarah S. Hildebrand win their way in every school by their kindly tact and sympathetic manner of approach.

School laws in all States require the teaching in every grade of the effects of alcohol and tobacco on the body, but some indifferent and untrained teachers present the subject unwisely or consider it very difficult.

These visitors aim to show the teachers of the lower grades, especially, how to present the hygiene lessons in a simple and pleasant yet effective manner. The teachers welcome the suggestions offered, and see the value of the charts, diagrams and memory gems shown to them. Some leaflets, an outline course of study, etc., always given to teachers are gladly used. The best books are often loaned and various helps recommended. Large numbers of children are writing essays on different phases of the subject.

The principals constantly invite these visitors to address teachers' meetings and gatherings of parents, as well as the children themselves.

The opportunities are so great that it seems desirable to train helpers to enter the open door.

The late Justus C. Strawbridge, whose obituary appears in this issue, was a prominent Philadelphia merchant, he with Isaac H. Clothier having founded the firm of Strawbridge & Clothier in 1862. The firm prospered from the first, and has grown to be one of the principal department stores in the city. In 1900 he retired, leaving his sons, Edward R. (now deceased), Frederick H., Robert E. and Francis R., to go on with his part of the business. One other son, William J., and his widow also survive him.

He was active in many lines of public work. He was one of the most enthusiastic members of the "Committee of 100," and later a member of the "Committee of 50," organizations influential in securing better city government. In 1897 he presented the city of Philadelphia with a statue of Benjamin Franklin, which now stands in front of the post-office on Chestnut Street. He was a director of the National Export Exposition, which was held in Philadelphia in the fall of 1899. He was a member of the board of archaeological managers of the University of Pennsylvania for many years, serving as president for a number of terms. He was a director of the Provident Life and Trust Co., the Delaware Insurance Co., Haverford College, Bryn Mawr College, the Germantown Saving Fund and other well-known corporations and institutions. For many years he was the president of the City Bridge Co. He was a member of the Union League, Art and Manufacturers' Clubs.

Fairmount Quarterly Meeting was held at Fairmount, Ind., the 17th to 19th ult., and was a memorable and blessed occasion. Visiting ministers present were Jehiel Bond, Webster; Emma G. Randolph, Amboy; George W. Bird, Knightstown, and Ephraim O. Allen, South Union, all of Indiana Yearly Meeting.

On Seventh-day morning, by previous arrangement, the subject of missions was discussed. Ella Winslow, Quarterly Meeting Superintendent, in a most interesting way presented the work in Mexico and Cuba. Richard Hawthorn, pastor in the Fairmount Meeting, spoke on "Animism." Milo S. Hinckle, pastor in the Jonesboro Meeting, spoke on the "Work of the Laymen" as reflected in the Chicago congress of last year. After these had spoken three of the visiting ministers spoke briefly on the general subject of Foreign Missions. George Bird said "I am glad to have the privilege of attending one quarterly meeting where we have met with definite object and specific end in view. Too often we simply meet in the capacity of a quarterly meeting with probably no positive message for the people who attend."

In the business part of the meeting privilege was granted the Board of Trustees of Fairmount Academy to repair and remodel the present building and build an addition, the whole to cost about $10,000, most of which has been subscribed. It is expected that work will begin on the addition before the close of the school year, so that all the buildings will be in readiness for the opening of the next school year.

It was also decided to hold three days' meetings in each of the thirteen meetings of the quarter, for the especial purpose of developing the spiritual gifts of beginners throughout the quarterly meeting. These meetings will be held under the general direction of the quarterly meeting's superintendent, and Evangelistic Committee. Young workers in the various departments of church work will be used in the meetings.

The quarterly meeting concurred in recording two young men ministers of the Gospel. The Quarterly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight favorably considered the names of two young women for the ministry.

Friends at Seattle, Wash., made Third month 12th a rally day. A special service for the children was held at the Bible school hour, when W. A. Hillis, formerly a national Sunday-school worker and brother of Newell Dwight Hillis, presented some striking object lessons with a magnet.

During the hour of worship the pastor, J. Edgar Williams, preached a very strong sermon on "The Home," and the Meyers Male Quartet sang twice very acceptably.

A basket dinner was thoroughly enjoyed by all at the noon hour. At 2.45 a conference "just among ourselves" was held, at which Anna W. Williams spoke on "Nothing Short of Our Best for This Work." Mary C. Sutton read a good paper on "Young People's Work," making reference to the first meeting for young Friends held at Richmond, Ind., which was spoken of in a recent article in THE AMERICAN FRIEND. Mary T. Wilson stated that she was present at that first meeting and will never forget it.

Joseph Shippen, a "peace" man of the city, spoke forcibly in favor of international peace and urged all present to be sure and hear the eminent French statesman, Baron D'Estournelles De Constant, who will speak in Seattle sometime in Fourth month.

Later in the afternoon Dr. M. A. Matthews, of the First Presbyterian Church; Dr. H. C. Mason, of University Congregational Church, and Joseph L. Garvin, of the First Christian Church, all made strong addresses.

Beginning that evening, the pastor held a week's meetings, assisted by Elmer Eckart, a Gospel singer. The meetings were times of great blessing.

Friends have taken an active part in the recent campaigns for righteousness in Seattle and in philanthropic movements.

Women in Washington now have the right to vote, and by the proper exercise of their franchise greatly aided in the "recall" of Mayor Gill and the election of Mayor Dilling, and later in placing nine good men on the city council.

It is also a matter for local pride that the Seattle Commercial Club issued the first call for aid for the present suffering in China, and all help thus far sent officially by the people of the United States has been sent from this port and through the above-named club.

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

Not in recent years has there been such a need for workers in Jamaica, the mission field of Iowa Yearly Meeting, as at the present time. The death of Arthur Swift left a vacancy that is hard to fill. Elam and Elda Henderson have been forced to return because of physical reasons. Three workers are to have furloughs this summer. A new school among the East Indians has been assigned to us by the Government. The ranks of workers are depleted, the needs and opportunities are increasing. The demand for help is imperative. Who is ready to go? Who will say like Isaiah, "Here am I, send me."

ZENO H. DOAN, Pres. Mission Board.

New Providence, Iowa.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

It was my privilege to pilot a group of visitors to the opening meeting of the Woman's National Foreign Missionary Jubilee, Third month 28, 1911.

Thinking of the many readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND who would have gladly been present, I feel constrained to give them a brief view of this great gathering.

In the Bible school rooms of the spacious Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church was a fine display of all the various missionary publications. Friends had a somewhat meagre display, but they were in line in this great movement, and very properly, for Geo. Fox was a foreign missionary in the early days of our Society.

The body of the church was filled with women. Only a few, very few venturesome men like myself appeared.

The programs were printed on white with gold embossed lettering.

Young women in white waists acted as ushers. Jubilee hymn sheets were in the pews.

Others will write more and better about this epoch making Jubilee and I will not attempt to review the program.

All the missionaries in the audience were invited to rise and assemble about the altar in front of the church. There were scores of earnest-faced, devoted workers who responded. I saw the veteran return from the civil war and again the broken, wounded men from the Spanish-American war, but this scene affected me more profoundly, as these consecrated women, who had broken their alabaster boxes of service upon the head of Christ, came forward and all joined in singing "Blest be the tie that binds."

Then in a clear, ringing voice their representative said, "We are here as Christ's representatives and your substitutes. Many of us went into the field when all doors were closed. You who remained at home were constant in prayer that these doors be opened. Now they stand wide open to every nation. Mothers give us your daughters. We ask for the sake of the hopeless, Christless women of the Mission fields. We do not need your pity. We need your co-operation; will you not give your best for Him who gave His best for you?"

Silent prayer was followed by singing "All hail the power of Jesus' name."

SECOND QUARTER, LESSON III.

FOURTH MONTH 16, 1911.

JOASH, THE BOY KING CROWNED IN JUDAH.

2 KINGS 11: 1-20.

(For Special Study, Verses 9-20.)

GOLDEN TEXT.—Blessed are they that keep his testimonies, and that seek him with the whole heart. Psa. 119: 2.

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fourth month 10th. Athaliah queen. 2 Kings 11: 1-12.

Third-day. Joash crowned. 2 Kings 11: 13-20.

Fourth-day. Another account. 2 Chron. 22: 10-23; 8.

Fifth-day. Another account. 2 Chron. 23: 9-15.

Sixth-day. Saving of Moses. Ex. 2: 1-10.

Seventh-day. Coronation of Solomon. 1 Kings 1: 33-40.

First-day. Josiah's reformation. 2 Kings 23: 4-14.

Time.—Athaliah came to the throne in B. C. 849 or 893; Joash, 843 or 887.

Place.—Jerusalem.

Monarchs.—The contemporaries of Joash were Jehu in Israel; Hazael in Syria; Shalmanezar II in Assyria.

Parallel accounts.—2 Chron. 22: 10-23; 15.

The lessons now take up the history of Judah. As has been seen the geographical position of Judah was such as to make her history less eventful than that of Israel, to protect her to a great extent from foreign hurtful influences. The dynasty founded by David continued on the throne, and there were no great political crises as in the northern kingdom nor such inroads of idolatry as to call forth prophets like Elijah. There is no doubt also that the presence of Solomon's beautiful temple exercised a strong conservative influence.

With the accession of Jehoshaphat (878 B. C.) the old enmity between Israel and Judah was ended, and as a matter of friendly policy, the son of Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, married Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. The result of this marriage is briefly, but emphatically told—"He (Jehoram) walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab: for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife." (2 Kings 8: 18). Athaliah was a true daughter of Jezebel in ability, cruelty and wickedness. Her husband, Jehoram, died as the result of a terrible reign, unexampled in Judah for cruelty, the details of which are given in 2 Chronicles more fully than in Kings. He was succeeded by his son, Ahaziah. Ahaziah, after a brief reign of a year, perished as a result of Jehu's rebellion in Israel. This death left Athaliah, the queen mother, in power over Judah. She had been the actual ruler, she was her son's actual "counsellor" to do wickedly. At her son's death she had no desire to give up her power, but determined to rule and to fasten the worship of Baal upon Judah. As a necessary means to this end she attempted to destroy all the males of the royal family, so there should be no legal claimant. This she did, so far as she knew, and reigned for six years. But, unknown to her, Jehoshaphat (Joash), an infant son of Ahaziah had been saved, and was kept in hiding in the temple enclosure under the protection of his aunt, Jehosheba, a sister of Ahaziah, and her husband Jehoiada, the chief priest. After six years, either because concealment became more difficult or because he thought the time ripe for a revolution, Jehoiada laid his plans to depose Athaliah and set the boy Joash on the throne. These plans are given in the opening verses of chapter 2.

The parallel account in 2 Chronicles should be read. Wicked as Athaliah was, she must be judged by the standards of her age and not by twentieth century standards. Her deeds have been matched by deeds in Turkish history, besides she was a heathen.

9, 11. "Carrying out of the plans."

12. "God save the king." Literally "Let the king live!" "The testimony." The testimony was probably a document in the nature of a charter declaring the ancient customs of the kingdom. Compare Exod. 28: 29, 36-38; Job 31: 35-36.

13, 14. A most graphic account of Athaliah's surprise. "By the pillar." Compare 2 Kings 23: 3. Possibly a pillar by the side of which a new king took his coronation oath or something like it. The word in the original is uncertain. "People rejoiced." There can be little doubt that the people of Judah were only too glad to see the heathen foreigner put down.

15, 16. "Without the ranges." Better "between the ranks." R. V. "Have her first." To put to death inside the temple enclosure would pollute the holy place. "Made way for her." R. V. The troops opened to let her and those who had her in charge pass through.

17. Jehoiada, as the guardian of the king, made a double covenant: (1) a religious relation between Jehovah and the people and the king; (2) a political relation between the king and the people. Compare 2 Kings 23: 3.

18. "The people of the land." That is the people of their own motion, without orders from the government. From this verse it is clear that Baal worship had been allowed openly in Jerusalem, though we have no record of its establishment. It was doubtless set up when Athaliah came to reside in Judah. Compare 2 Kings 8: 18; 8: 27.

This is the only recorded revolution in the history of Judah for though there was murder and violence, the Davidic heir to the throne retained his inheritance.

THE BALTIMORE PEACE CONGRESS.

The Third National Peace Congress, which is to meet in Baltimore on the 3d, 4th, and 5th of next May, promises to be an occasion of great interest and importance and we hope that as many Friends as possible from all parts of the country will attend it.

The Peace Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting are desirous of doing what they can to help in this and they are hoping to arrange for a special re-union of our own workers at some time during the sessions of the Congress. Such a re-union was held at Chicago and proved both pleasant and helpful.

We invite all Friends expecting to attend to communicate with our Chairman, Anna B. Thomas, 1718 Jolin St., Baltimore, who will gladly assist in finding boarding places.

By direction of the Committee,

JOSEPHINE GRAVE, Sec.

COFFEE HEART.

VERY PLAIN IN SOME PEOPLE.

A great many people go on suffering from annoying ailments for a long time before they can get their own consent to give up the indulgence from which their trouble arises.

A gentleman in Brooklyn describes his experience as follows:

"I became satisfied some months ago that I owed the palpitation of the heart from which I suffered almost daily, to the use of coffee, (I had been a coffee drinker for 30 years) but I found it very hard to give up the beverage.

"One day I ran across a very sensible and straightforward presentation of the claims of Postum, and was so impressed thereby that I concluded to give it a trial.

"My experience with it was unsatisfactory till I learned how it ought to be prepared—by thorough boiling for not less than 15 or 20 minutes. After I learned that lesson there was no trouble.

"Postum proved to be a most palatable and satisfactory hot beverage, and I have used it ever since.

"The effect on my health has been most salutary. The heart palpitation from which I used to suffer so much, particularly after breakfast, has disappeared and I never have a return of it except when I dine or lunch away from home and drink the old kind of coffee because Postum is not served. I find that Postum cheers and invigorates while it produces no harmful stimulation." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days' trial proves an eye opener to many.

finer $10,000 each. They are merchants with a world-wide reputation, with places of business in London, Paris and New York. For nearly half a century they have made a specialty of pictures, porcelains, and works of art; and it is estimated they have defrauded the government out of at least five million dollars worth of revenue.

News has reached London that Captain Scott, the British explorer, who is seeking the South Pole, has a rival in the race in the person of Amundsen, a Norwegian, whose past record makes him a doughty rival. The plan of the British expedition is to separate into two parties, which will go south toward the pole by different routes. Thus there is every prospect of a race southwards of the two British and one Norwegian party. This new development adds enormously to the excitement attending Captain Scott's enterprise.

The Harvard college corporation has acted wisely in offering to the city of Cambridge to open the college athletic fields as free playgrounds for children during the summer months, in providing free of cost to the city whatever expert assistance in municipal affairs the college faculty is competent to give, in admitting Cambridge teachers to the summer school at reduced fees, and in allowing all boys from the Cambridge high schools to receive the first year's instruction in the college without payment of tuition. Concessions like these, and others that might be considered fair, would do much to quiet the chronic agitation in Cambridge for the taxation of the college real estate.

THE HERITAGE.

[Suggested by the 213th Annual Session of North Carolina Yearly Meeting.]

For more than twice one hundred years,
Though oft assailed by doubts and fears,
Yet trusting Him, whose word is sure,
Whose truth forever shall endure,
The Friends have come by dale and hill
To worship God, and work His will.

From Randolph's woods and Guilford's plains,
From Surrey's rugged mountain chains,
From busy city marts of trade,
From farm house hid in oaken shade,
With purpose firm, with one accord,
To serve the church and serve the Lord.

Sometimes the country bleeding lay,
Beneath war's grim and awful sway;
Sometimes dissession's cruel breath
Was like the bitterness of death.
But unafraid of aught save sin
Though tempest raged, without, within,
The Quaker of the olden time
Kept steadfast heart, and faith sublime.

Oh, Friends! a goodly heritage
Is yours today; the present age,
With peace and smiling plenty fraught Doth crown the work the fathers wrought.

And still the message ringeth clear,
"Go ye," that all the world may hear.
No fear the future doth portend,
"Lo, I am with you till the end."

Hymn of Joy

Joyful, joyful, we adore Thee,
God of glory, Lord of love;
Hearts unfold like flowers before Thee,
Hail Thee as the sun above,
Melt the clouds of sin and sadness;
Drive the dark of doubt away;
Giver of immortal gladness,
Fill us with the light of day!

All Thy works with joy surround Thee,
Earth and heaven reflect Thy rays,
Stars and angels sing around Thee,
Center of unbroken praise:
Field and forest, vale and mountain,
Blossoming meadow, flashing sea,
Chanting bird and flowing fountain,
Call us to rejoice in Thee.

Thou art giving and forgiving,
Ever blessing, ever blest,
Well-spring of the joy of living,
Ocean-depth of happy rest!
Thou our Father, Christ our Brother,—
All who live in love are Thine;
Teach us how to love each other,
Lift us to the Joy Divine.

Mortals join the mighty chorus,
Which the morning stars began;
Father-love is reigning o'er us,
Brother-love binds man to man.
Ever singing march we onward,
Victors in the midst of strife;
Joyful music lifts us sunward
In the triumph song of life.

* * *

We read "In six days Jehovah made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore Jehovah blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it. The seven day are seven ages, the length of which we do not know. The seventh day in which we now live is in the poetic language of scripture a day of rest for God, a day of rest from the creation of the physical universe. The seventh day or the present age is dedicated to the creation, education, and consummation of man's soul, that it may shine in all the glory of its divine potentialities. The Bible devotes two chapters to the story of the creation of the physical universe. The remaining portion of the Bible with its sixty-six books, its Old and New Testament is occupied with the creative, the educational, and consummating work of God in his effort to save man's soul and fit it for eternal fellowship with Himself. How fitting when God dedicated one age in seven to soul development that we should consecrate one day in seven to this His crowning work.

* * *

The Christian Sabbaths constitute a glorious chain of days, more precious than a chain of gold, which link us in an unbroken line to the empty tomb of Jesus, the glorious truth of the resurrection, and the vision and reality of eternal life.

* * *

The Sabbath has a two-fold function in human life, one is physical, the other is spiritual. Its purpose is to give rest and afford opportunity for worship. He who really rests and genuinely worships on the Sabbath day will not come far short of keeping the Fourth Commandment.

* * *

The diver works under water in an element he was not made to live in. He must occasionally come to the surface for air, then renewed and refreshed descend again to his work. The social conditions under which we live necessitate activity under conditions that are abnormal for the soul. The Sabbath is that day when we give the soul a chance to rise to the levels of its own true life, and to breathe deep of the heavenly atmosphere, that it may live nobly in surroundings that are severe and most uncongenial.

* * *

The miner works in the depths of the earth. Had he no opportunity to come to the surface his eyesight would become impaired and he would become unfitted to appreciate the glories of the earth flooded with sunshine. Animals that live continually in the mines are blind. The Sabbath is man's opportunity to use his spiritual eyesight. If he does not use it he will lose it. The Sabbath is the soul's sight preserver.

* * *

Our lives are like an eight-day clock. They need a spiritual wind-up one day in seven. The Sabbath is the key day of our lives. It fits the triple lock of body, mind and soul. We can no more get the true conception of life when we are "most run down" than we can when half asleep. Any Christian who neglects to use the Sabbath key to his life will some day surely stop ticking, and then men cannot any longer look to him as life's regulator.

* * *

The Sabbath is the soul's window. It sheds light into the room of daily routine and drudgery. Without it life is dark, sombre, gloomy, the only light is artificial. The weekly Sabbath sheds light both ways, back into the week preceding, to nullify its disappointments, forward into the week following to illuminate its prospects and give poise to life.

News in Brief

The Massachusetts Assembly has rejected Woman Suffrage, the vote standing 96 for to 161 against. Evidently anti-suffrage sentiment is growing in that State, the vote last year on the same proposition being 47 for to 148 against.

* * *

Esther Davis, a New York woman, who for a number of years conducted a candy stand in Hester Street, died last week in her 117th year. Asked recently how she accounted for her long life, she replied: "I have faith in God."

Alabama has substituted County option for State-wide prohibition. The new law provides that 45 per cent. of the voters of a county may petition for an election to determine whether liquor shall be sold in that county, either by saloons, dispensary or otherwise. Each county is thereby given full power to regulate its liquor traffic.

* * *

The House of Commons is in the midst of turmoil over the veto bill. It is reported that more than one thousand amendments have been offered. These are bound to result in heated discussions and protracted sittings. It is the avowed intention of the government to send the measure to the Upper Chamber by the middle of next month. Veteran members of Parliament, however, doubt the possibility of this.

* * *

It is amusing to review what various editors attribute to the votes of women. "In Milwaukee, where the Socialists lost, the women did it, and in Flint, where the Socialists won, the women did it, and in Oregon, where the age of consent has been raised from fourteen years to eighteen, the women did it, and in Utah, where polygamy persists, the women are doing it. Furthermore, it has been shown that in towns and counties that have gone for prohibition the women did it, and that in towns and counties which have gone "wet," it was the women that did it."

* * *

A scarcity of Easter lilies this season will doubtless make such of these beautiful flowers as will be available almost prohibitive in price. One of the causes of this condition of the market is the practical failure of the Bermuda crop of lilies owing to the worn-out soil, it is asserted by wholesale florists in this city. Probably not more than 10,000 lilies will be imported, it is said at the office of the Bermuda Steamship Company, which imports lilies to this city from Bermuda. Last year during the Easter week more than 500,000 lily plants were imported. W. Stuart Allen, a wholesale florist, says he feels that not until more scientific methods of growing the lilies are used will the supply equal the demand. Easter lilies for church decorations are in larger demand than ever before, and there is not one-third of the crop marketed last year in view.

The wonderful possibilities of wireless telegraphy have been further indicated by notable achievements reported from San Francisco a few days ago by a party that conducted experiments in receiving messages with the aid of high flying kites. The investigators claim to have heard distinctly calls from San Juan, Porto Rico; Washington, D. C.; Key West, Fla.; the New York Navy Yard, Colon, Guantanamo, Cuba, and the station at Otchishi, Japan, which is 4,000 miles distant. They also detected an indistinct Marconi spark, which they believe was sent from Cornwall, England, a distance of 6,500 miles. The receiving aerials were strung between two pairs of sixteen foot kites, which rose to a height estimated at 1,500 feet. Reports of the experiments are being prepared for transmission to the War Department.

Practical Sacrifices

It is much easier to make sacrifices in general than it is to make a particular sacrifice which involves giving up our own way in some definite matter, and yet it is this latter kind of sacrifice which really counts. The same thing is true about loving—loving neighbors and enemies and difficult people generally. It is much easier to love them in the abstract than it is to love a particular trying neighbor who annoys us. But we never make any progress until we get out of the region of the abstract and general and begin to apply our principles in particular cases. It was not man that Christ loved; it was actual, particular men, such as Simon and John and Zaccheus. It was not sacrifice in general to which He was devoted; He accepted the definite cross which presented itself before Him.

I am going now to call attention to a special kind of sacrifice which is very much needed today. We have in almost all our meetings some one important person who gives more to the causes of the Church than anybody else, who has a larger reach of influence than anybody else in the group and who gradually gets looked to more or less as the leader of affairs. Sometimes there may be several such persons in one meeting. Persons of this type are called upon to make many sacrifices. They give of their money to everything that comes forward with claims. They make large sacrifices of their valuable time. They cut off other engagements for the sake of the Church. They deserve the love of the membership, and if they are wise and tactful, they get it. But there is one danger to which such persons are always liable. They are liable to get stiff and opinionated and to expect their likes and preferences to have unusual weight. And no doubt they have a right to expect this. But it is just this "right" to have their own way which needs to be sacrificed.

The person who gives the large amount toward the building of the new church edifice often feels that he has a right to dictate the kind of building or the place of location. But as a true Christian man, he must exercise no such right. His gift should be a gift, not a purchase of special privilege and influence. The building is being built and located for the group, not for one family; for the future, and not for the present merely; and everybody's interest should be considered. What could be more Christlike than to give liberally and then to sacrifice with the gift all right to dictate. What is true in a case of church-building is true of all Church affairs. The best sacrifice to make is just this sacrifice of right or of claim to direct because of liberality or because of large previous service. Such a sacrifice is worth incomparably more than any money gift can be, for it sets the meeting a fine spiritual example. To give money or to lend the weight of personal influence may make the other members jealous; to give money and have influence and yet to sacrifice the rights that go with these, and to take a humble place as one among others, can only provoke the rest to a like spiritual activity.

I have recently heard of a man of wealth and position in a certain town who for forty years had been a prominent member of a certain church. He loved it, had given largely to it, and greatly enjoyed and appreciated the ministry to which he listened. A small and struggling branch of the church was to be started in a less attractive part of the town. The locality was inconvenient, the building was poor, the preaching was crude, but, when a call was made in the large church for volunteers to ally themselves with the little branch, this prominent member was the first to go. He went not because he preferred to, for the sacrifice was very hard, but because he wanted to advance the cause and help the truth to spread. He sacrificed more than money. He gave up his preference, his likings, his intellectual enjoyment, and no sacrifice could have counted more.

Friends are rather weak in such sacrifices. Our individual opinions, our peculiar rights, are very sacred things with us, and we are apt to hold to them with considerable tenacity. Might it not be well for us to ask the question: "What would happen if I sacrificed my right and made a burnt offering of my important opinion?"

The greatest church-builder that ever lived, the most efficient leader, says that he learned to count his claims and rights and grounds for boasting, "loss" for Christ; to treat them as of no importance; to leave them behind and to seek only the will of Christ. "I have a right to enjoin," he once said, "but for love's sake I rather beseech." Let us learn to make this kind of a sacrifice.

Current Events and Comments

Dealing With the New Australian Defense Law

As the new Defense Law in Australia requires parents to report as eligible for "cadet" training all boys between fourteen and seventeen years of age, Friends have decided to fill up the registration form as directed and to enclose therewith a statement to the following effect: Being a member of the Society of Friends, I conscientiously object to the placing of my son under any kind of training in connection with the Defense Force. Kindly see the memorandum sent herewith.

This memorandum was not uniform in all cases. Some Friends omitted the second and some the third paragraph, while others sent the entire communication, as follows:

Referring to my conscientious objection to the military training of my son, as set out in the attached form, I wish to point out that such compulsion of Quakers (as we are commonly designated) is opposed to the spirit of the following words in the Commonwealth Constitution Act: "The commonwealth shall not make any law * * * for prohibiting the free exercise of any religion." The literature of the Society of Friends is conclusive evidence that, from its rise until now, the contradiction of military service to Christian obligation has been a prominent feature of its religious belief.

On the other hand, I do sincerely desire to prepare my son for effectively carrying out every citizen duty which shall not conflict with my religious convictions; and therefore I will undertake that he shall receive lessons in physical drill, first aid to injured, fire brigade work (any or all these as instruction may be available and free from military control), occupying in some such way the same number of hours as the Legislature has set apart for military training.

I wish also to state that I do not overlook my citizen duties, as regards the vital interests of the commonwealth in external affairs. But I strongly feel that right relationships with our neighbors may be more surely attained by taking steps to promote mutual trust than by military preparations, which arise from and, in their turn, promote suspicion and illwill. One of the first means to this end would be the discouragement of all insults to neighboring nations and the recognition of China and Japan on terms of national equality. This would open the way for the realization of our ideals by friendly treaty instead of by methods which to them appear derogatory and dishonoring.

There has been some apprehension lest the penalties of the new law should be immediately enforced upon Friends for non-conformity with its requirements, but there seems to be little immediate danger.

We are now assured, by those who know the minds of the federal ministers, that it is not their desire to harass conscientious objectors.

The Sixty-second Congress Opens

The Capitol was crowded with visitors Third-day last to witness the opening of the Sixty-second Congress. Interest centered especially in the hall of Representatives, where the Democrats assumed control for the first time in sixteen years. Among the visitors was William Jennings Bryan, who was welcomed with great enthusiasm. Champ Clark, Missouri, was promptly elected Speaker and the work of organization began. The new rules substitute the election of committees instead of their appointment by the Speaker. The membership of several of them is enlarged and six old committees are discontinued. The principal change is a rule which permits germane legislation on an appropriation bill when it tends to retrench expenditures. Oscar W. Underwood succeeds Clark as Democratic floor leader, while the Republican forces are marshalled under James R. Mann.

The Senate, being a continuous body, soon had its new members installed and proceeded to the reorganization of its committees. The progressive Republicans are to have proportionate representation on the various committees along with the regular Republicans and Democrats.

The President's message dealt exclusively with Canadian Reciprocity, and, though couched in few words, the ground of the appeal was broad. "I am constrained," so he declared, "in deference to popular sentiment and with a realizing sense of my duty to the great masses of our people whose welfare is involved, to urge upon your consideration early action on this agreement."

The Second Ruling on the Commodities Clause

The decision handed down by the Supreme Court last week, interpreting the "commodities clause" in the Hepburn Rate Law, reveals a peculiar function of the courts. In a previous decision the clause was pronounced constitutional, and railroad and other transportation companies were forbidden to traffic in commodities of which they were the interstate carriers. The Lehigh Coal Co., however, which is owned entirely by the Lehigh Valley Railroad, continued to do business, and it became necessary to decide whether this business was an infraction of the law. This question was decided last week. It appeared from the evidence that the Lehigh Coal Co. was nothing more nor less than the agent of the Lehigh Valley Railroad and consequently could not do business under the provisions of the law. The court was careful to say that the law must not be construed as forbidding railroads and other interstate carriers from owning stock in commercial concerns whose goods they transport, but it does mean that the transportation and commercial companies must be in fact, as well as in name, independent concerns, independently managed. Thus the Supreme Court decides not only on the constitutionality of a law, but on the scope of its application as well.

Lorimer to Be Retried

New evidence of corruption in the election of Senator Lorimer has come to light through investigations now being made by a committee of the Illinois State Senate. It appears that no less a person than Clarence S. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Co., was approached for a contribution of $10,000 "to reimburse certain men who had put up a $100,000 'slush' fund to elect Wm. Lorimer to the United States Senate."

With this new evidence in hand, Senator La Follette has asked that the Lorimer case be re-opened. His resolution, which has been tabled for a few days, calls for the appointment of a new investigating committee, and is likely to be called up and passed at an early date.

Merriam Defeated in Chicago

The mayoralty contest in Chicago has resulted in a victory for those who favor a "wide-open town." Carter H. Harrison, who has already served four terms as Mayor, was elected by a majority of 17,000 over his young opponent, Prof. Merriam, of the University of Chicago. Harrison made his appeal on a platform committed to 70-cent gas, the initiative and referendum control of corporations and the like, but it was his past unsavory record that elected him. The old-timers who wanted machine rule and its perquisites gave him their loyal support. Prof. Merriam, who stood for efficient, progressive and businesslike methods in municipal affairs, found the machine too well entrenched to be dislodged in one campaign, although his attack was able and fearless and the issue clear-cut. Nothing could be more true than his after-election comment: "The battle must be fought not once, but many times, and in the long run it will prove successful." Only by persistent and strenuous effort can we expect to advance in civic and public uprightness.

Mexican Reforms

The widespread discontent in Mexico, of which the Madero revolution is but a symptom, has finally moved the government to inaugurate a policy of reform. First, the old cabinet has resigned and a new cabinet of younger men has been formed, with Francisco de la Barra, former minister to the United States, as Secretary of Foreign affairs and Jose Y. Limanitor as Secretary of Finance. Second, at the opening of the National Congress last week, President Diaz recommended a number of measures enlarging the liberties of the lower classes. Probably the most far-reaching was the proposed opening of large tracts of land for homesteads. These tracts are at present in the hands of wealthy speculators, but it is proposed to buy them up, sub-divide them into small farms and sell them at a nominal cost, payments to be made in small annual installments covering a period of years, with easy terms of extension when crops fail.

The President's program also includes a revision of the franchise law, which, however, does not mean an unrestricted electorate, since a large proportion of the population is ignorant and shiftless—quite unfit for self-government. It is hoped that these and other reforms which are to be inaugurated will allay the discontent and ultimately check the revolution now in progress.

The Climax of the Woman's Jubilee

It is most fitting that the Woman's Jubilee should reach its climax and close in New York, because it was in that city that [Mrs.] T. C. Doremus started the epoch-making Women's Union Missionary Society in 1860. The program included many of the excellent features previously presented in the other celebrations throughout the country, and the corps of brilliant speakers, led by Helen Barrett Montgomery, were never more enthusiastic and inspiring.

The features of the occasion were the pageant and the luncheon. The pageant was given in the Metropolitan Opera House on the opening evening and 1,000 young women and girls took part. Every seat was taken weeks before the event. The luncheon, on the third and last day of the jubilee, surpassed all expectations. It was originally intended to occupy only the dining-hall of the Astor, but it grew until it filled five great banquet-rooms in three of the most famous New York hotels—Astor, Plaza and Waldorf-Astoria. Fully 6,000 women sat down to tables in these five gatherings, completely overshadowing the boasted New York dinner of the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

Dr. Jowett Begins Work in America

Much interest has been shown on both sides of the Atlantic in the call to the pastorate of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, of Dr. J. H. Jowett, an eminent English Congregational minister, who began work in his new field the first of the month. He is said to be the most effective preacher in the pulpit today, the special characteristic of his sermons being their impassioned eloquence. Two years ago Dr. Jowett visited this country, preached in the church to which he has now been called, and made a deep impression upon the congregation. In fact, wherever he spoke during his American visit he proved an eminently acceptable preacher. Last year he was elected president of the Free Church Council, one of the most important positions open to a non-conformist minister in England. He was born in Yorkshire, and educated at the University of Edinburgh and at Mansfield College, Oxford, a Congregational institution.

War Time Reminiscences

A Journey from North Carolina to Indiana.

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS

Numerous Friends will recognize in the cut in this issue the faces of Mary A. Elliott, Carthage, Ind.; Margaret F. Binford, Wichita, Kan.; Sarah J. Bundy, Whittier, Cal., and Rhoda M. Hare, Long Beach, Cal., daughters of Micajah and Sarah J. Hill. Their first reunion for twenty-five years, recently held at Whittier, revived memories of the war time experiences of the Hill family and others at their homes at Deep River, North Carolina, and in their farewell journey from the land of oppression.

MARY A. ELLIOTT,
RHODA M. HARE,

MARGARET F. BINFORD,
SARAH J. BUNDY.

The hearing of some of these echoes from the past, led the writer to glean the salient facts involved, as probably of interest to the readers of THE AMERICAN FRIEND not only because a multitude of Friends have North Carolina antecedents, but also because it is seldom that time spares a quartet of sisters to recount together events in which they were active fifty years in the past.

Uncompromising in his opposition to slavery, Micajah Hill shared the dangers that increasingly menaced Friends in North Carolina as the clouds of civil war thickened about them. One case in his experience will illustrate this insecurity. The assessor having called at the home saw upon the table a copy of "Helper's Compendium of the Impending Crisis," and reporting the matter to the officials, Micajah Hill was arrested and taken to Greensboro on a charge of possessing and circulating this anti-slavery book. His explanation that the book was loaned to him by a pro-slavery physician who had attended him in a late illness, cleared up the charge and he was liberated. In an atmosphere now surcharged with suspicion, like events were constantly occurring.

Micajah Hill and wife were highly valued Friends, she a minister who had repeatedly visited "in the love of the gospel" Friends in Tennessee and elsewhere. Deeply concerned for the welfare of their children under the gathering omens of ill in the South, and with the liability of their sons, James and Daniel, being forced into the Confederate army, they decided to seek a home in Indiana. Their sons preceded them in going, but military operations soon closed railway traffic with the North, leaving them the wagon train as the only means of exit. Neighbors joined them in the prospect until the company numbered about 60 persons. Those who were Friends included Micajah Hill, David W. Elliott, Charles Pidgeon and Wm. Stanton with their families, Maria Pope and son, Isaac Stanley, Tilman Couch, and Marmaduke Lewis. Stephen White and David Connor and families were permitted to join on condition that they should take no weapons of any kind, terms imposed by Micajah Hill, the recognized leader of the expedition. As to the daughters of the Hill family appearing in the accompanying picture, Mary A. was then the wife of David W. Elliott, Margaret F. and Sarah J. were care-free girls in their major teens, and Rhoda M. was a sprightly lass of twelve summers. Advancing years have not weighed heavily upon them, but time has wrought its changes. The husband of Margaret F., Josiah Binford, shared in the pleasures of the reunion at Whittier, while the companions of the other sisters have all passed beyond the mortal shore.

Distrust of banking facilities necessitated resort to primitive methods of carrying money on the contemplated journey to Indiana. Fifty dollars in coin collected by Micajah Hill for Mahlon Hockett, who had preceded him to Indiana, was inserted under the rawhide covering of an ancient hair trunk, and safely reached its owner in the Hoosier State. Gold coin in considerable amounts, with small chunks of bullion, then current in the gold mining sections of the Carolinas, were quilted into the belts of the daughters of the Hill family, and carried on their travels, with never a suspicion by mountaineers or Confederate foragers that walking deposit vaults were within easy reach when these Maud Mullers of Carolina passed them on the highway.

The company, with an outfit of one carriage and nine covered wagons of the old circle-bed style, with tar-buckets dangling at the axles, started on the journey one September morning in 1861. The parting with gathered friends was tearful, for uncertainty was written on the war clouds, both for those going and those remaining. One youth of eighteen years, reluctant at the parting, accompanied the caravan far down the lane, and gave the sisters of the Hill family a lingering farewell as his cousins and childhood associates. They did not read his future as a few minutes later they waved adieu to his receding form, but in the light of this memory they read with pathetic interest a few weeks ago of the decease, with garnered honors, of Dr. A. M. Elliott of Johns Hopkins University. Dr. Elliott was that youth, who in pursuit of high ideals in education won degrees at Haverford, Harvard, and several of the leading universities of Europe, and made researches on original lines that constitute a large and valuable addition to the domain of human knowledge.

One of the touching features of the departure of the Hill family, was the leaving of the eldest daughter in her North Carolina home, her estimable husband being a man of Southern proclivities and sympathies, while she retained her warm love for the Union. He was later enrolled with the Confederate forces, and lost his life in battle in the Shenandoah Valley. She also passed away during the war, but owing to suspended communication, tidings of her decease did not reach the family in Indiana until a year later.

The camp life of the journey, before the area of army operations was reached, was much enjoyed. The changing scenes, the pitching of tents by brook or river and the blazing camp-fire in front of each, the prattle of children and "the merry laugh of youth," gave unfailing zest to each day's experiences. Sharpened appetites were ever ready for the steaming products of the "spider" on the glowing coals, and there was equal relish for a ration from the four bushels of hard round biscuits prepared by the foresight of Mother Hill in advance of the journey, one of which was shown in the Elliott home five years later as a proof of its keeping qualities.

The peaceful camping scene was one day disturbed by the discharge of a gun, and it was found that one of the company, untrue to his pledge, had secreted a loaded rifle in his wagon, and in rumaging among his effects had discharged it, severely wounding one of his horses, and teaching him a wholesome lesson in fidelity to promises. More successful was the requirement that there should be no traveling on First-day, and the quiet of a weekly Sabbath rest was enjoyed.

As the mountains were approached, Mary A. Elliott's baby boy Micajah, fell seriously ill of "thrash," as known in the parlance of the time, and a grandmother among the mountaineers in a cabin near by prescribed goose grease, thoroughly rubbed on the child's head. With no doctor available none dare scorn a dernier resort, and a goose from the flock on the premises was purchased. But so starved and emaciated was the bird, that with hours of rendering less than a spoonful of lubricator was extracted; but none have been found to question its concentrated virtues, since Baby Micajah survived, and is now a business man in Chicago.

After entering Virginia, at the end of about ten days travel, the Pidgeon family, having the fastest horses of the outfit, parted company with the majority, under mutual good will, and pushed on for the North by a different route.

The main company, continuing westward, saw little military activity until Abingdon, Va., was reached; but thence southward to Elizabethton, and westward in Tennessee, the bustle of the recruiting station, the hurried movements of squads of soldiery, with sentinels dotting the roadway, gave everywhere an oppressive sense of war's unrest and alarms. The strange convoy of Quakers with their train of wagons running this gauntlet of dangers attracted no little attention, and occasionally they were called to an accounting on the picket line; but being unarmed, and transparently candid in their answers, and able to show by a letter from Governor Moorehead of North Carolina, given to Micajah Hill as a personal friend, that they were neither spies or plotters against the Confederacy, they were allowed to proceed.

One stormy evening they camped near the premises of a slaveholder of apparent wealth and position, who plied them next morning with queries as to their makeup and prospects, and failing to enlist any enthusiasm for the Confederate cause, gruffly ordered them to move on. This they did through drenching rain, and over flooded and almost impassable roads, until they found shelter in the afternoon in a deserted cabin, where forty of the chilled and bedraggled wayfarers huddled together in a single small room, presented a typical picture of physical discomfort. A fire on the vacated hearth soon ameliorated conditions, and the residue found shelter in the wagons till morning.

Another day's travel, now on a northward line, brought them to the swollen Clinch River, and here they were approaching the crisis of their journey. The main Confederate line was only 50 miles ahead, and a conflict with the Federal forces was impending. Loth to ferry the angry stream with their heavy wagons with the liability of having to return, Micajah Hill, Stephen White and Wm. Stanley crossed and started on horseback for the army lines to see if exit northward was possible. Their return was awaited with solicitude by the campers, and the murmurings of the surging stream seemed to be keeping time to their emotions of mingled hope and fear, although Mother Hill was not alone in her calm and implicit faith that God's hand would be in their experience, whatever the tidings.

The Captain and Perfecter of Faith

Therefore let us also, since we are circled round with so great cloud of witnesses, lay aside every weight, and the sin which so easily hems us round, and run with patience the race that lies before us, looking away to Jesus the captain and perfecter of faith,—who, for the joy that lay before him, endured a cross, despising shame, and sat down on the right hand of the throne of God (Heb. xii. 1, 2).

Both the Authorized and the Revised Versions of the New Testament spoil the significance of this passage by inserting an unnecessary pronoun where the Greek has none. Jesus is not here described as "the author and finisher of our faith," but as faith's supreme Example. He is not, in this passage, whatever He may be elsewhere, the object of faith, but its subject; the One who perfectly exhibits what faith is; the Captain of the army of the faithful ones, whose imperfect faith is to be strengthened by thinking of His perfect faith..

The passage follows, as we all remember, the muster-roll of the saints and worthies of the past, who lived and wrought by faith, having constantly before them "the substance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen." They were those who, impeded at every step by the entanglements of the things they saw, yet "endured as seeing Him who is invisible." And now, having won that which they hoped for, they are seated round us like the crowds that fill the amphitheatre, while we, the combatants, wrestle and race for the prize. Our part is to follow them in their faith, laying aside every needless garment that clings around us and impedes the free movement of our limbs, devoting our whole, unhindered energy to achieving the task that is set us.

And we have this great advantage over them—that we have a Captain who has trodden the arena before us and has won, without flinching, a far heavier conflict. We can "lay aside the weights" that hinder us by "looking away" to Him—away from the dust and heat, the breathless fatigue, the nervous self-consciousness, the discouragement of slips and falls, to the Captain who endured it all and won—the "Captain of our salvation," who was made "perfect through suffering."* He was the perfect Example of the faith that holds on, at the cost of pain and effort, to the invisible reality; "for the joy that was set before Him"—the joy of seeing His work achieved and His Father's will accomplished—He "endured even a cross, despising shame"; and now, from the chief seats of the amphitheater, He watches and cheers on His followers.

That is the picture the writer draws to cheer and hearten his fellow-Christians in a time of sore trial and persecution. Different as our conditions are from theirs, we can take His message to ourselves and find in it the help and stimulus we sorely need. Discouragement assails us from many sides—from our own feebleness and incapacity, our frequent failures, our dimness of sight, our fainting courage,—as well as from the things that are without us: the ineffectiveness of our best endeavors, the unresponsiveness of others, the power over them of the "Prince of this world." We need to "lift up the hands that hang down, and the palsied knees," to "make straight paths for our feet," by looking steadfastly at our goal, "lest that which is lame should be turned out of the way" instead of being healed as it might be. And for us, as for those early Christians, there is nothing better than to forget ourselves and think of those who have endured a worse conflict before us, whether in ancient or in modern days. Let their courage and their victory nerve our souls to new endeavors.

And, most of all, let us "look away" from all our discouragements to the Captain and Perfecter of faith, whose whole career, culminating in His absolute self-devotion on the Cross, was a perfect exhibition of human trust in God.

He (says Bishop Westcott) exhibited faith in its highest form from first to last, and placing Himself as it were at the head of the great army of heroes of faith, He carried faith, the source of their strength, to its most complete perfection and to its loftiest triumph.

Did He do more than that? Yes, truly; there are heights and depths in His redemptive work for men that Paul fathomed more fully than the unknown author of this epistle. But there are stages in our spiritual experience when we may be helped most of all by this thought of a Captain who has shared the bitterness of our struggle, bearing, with patient courage, far greater hardships, and has turned them into means of victory by the power of conquering faith in God.—Edward Grubb, in The British Friend.

The Heart of the Gospel

When we say that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin, we state in the strongest terms the great truth that, by His coming into the world, by His saintly life and by His voluntary death, He shows mankind how to live in order to avoid sin.

But this truth contains another which is even deeper and sweeter. It is that Christ was not obliged to come. He came because He loved us. The most vital part of His example is that, as He loved us and sacrificed Himself for us, so we must love men and sacrifice ourselves for them.

And it means still more. It means that not only did Christ suffer and die for us, but He left with us "the Comforter, which is the Holy Spirit."

And the Spirit cries aloud in the soul of every man in every Christian land, reminding him of the shed blood and the promised remission of sins.

Some heed the voice and seize the freely offered salvation. Others are indifferent. Still others reject the gift with scorn. The situation is well described in the parable of the sower and the seed.

"Life was sweet to this young Man of thirty-three years," says the eloquent Alfred Wesley Wishart. "He loved the beautiful world. He loved His fellow-men. It was no easy task to face an awful death and to endure bitter hatred. Inscrutable mystery, that the progress of civilization has ever been purchased by the blood of the brave and holy! Christ had no doubts about the subject. He never wavered in His confidence in the goodness of God. To do His will was His mission, His joy, His life.

"Has not history justified His superb confidence? Has not history proved that love is the mightiest force in the world and that the man who loves God is the real power among men? Take Jesus at His word. Try to live as He lived."

It is the love expressed in Christ's immeasurable sacrifice which should most appeal to us. It is the love in that shed blood which most whitens the souls cleansed with it.

* The word archegos, here translated "author," is "captain" in Heb. ii. 10. The same word in Acts iii. 15, v. 31, is translated "Prince." It means literally "chief leader."

"Bear in mind," said Henry Ward Beecher, "that the ruling influence in time and for eternity is God's love.

"Bear in mind that, whatever may be the long delays, the equity that springs from love, and the intellectual developments that spring from genial love, are to rule.

"Let each one of us re-fashion his heart upon the great doctrine of God's love. Let every one reconstruct his household on it. Let love administer correction, censure, criticism. Let every one of us undertake to develop the true spirit of love in his business. Thus we shall have our hand upon the wheel, and in every place where it turns slowly, we can give it impulse.

"And when once you shall have beheld that loving, adorable face, though you had suffered on the cross, though you had been broken on the rack, one look will be more, a thousand times more, than all the suffering." But the way to this bliss is paved with thorns. To walk by love and follow the pattern set for us on Calvary are no child's play. Dr. Parkhurst wisely reminds us that no man has such terrific enemies to fight as he who wants to be holy. We have not the courage and the constructive purpose needed for the winning of so immense a victory. It was the Lord's consummate achievement that He could be a man, born of human flesh, and still be holy.

It is only through His help that we can tread the straight path that leads to His perfection.—Selected.

Through Discipline to Strength

BY BISHOP MANN.

A trained life is a disciplined life; and a disciplined life is the only kind of a life that gives out force which counts for the things worth while. The athlete must come under the discipline of regular hours, diet and field practice; mental acuteness is won through study, through the intellectual processes of mind discipline; moral soundness is built up by standing on the rigid rock of principle; spiritual strength is gained through disciplining struggle with which all life is shot through. The higher the ascent in the scale of life the more intensely exacting is the necessity of discipline. Discipline means strength—potential power massed into reality. It is as necessary for the perfecting of the intricate nervous machinery of the brain cell as for the muscles of the fingers, and as exacting in relation to the quickening of spiritual forces as for the discovering of the powers of brain personality. Adjustment of life is a process dependent upon disciplinary training.

The training of life so that the best, the fullest character be evolved is a serious concern.

It is clear that discipline is a necessity of human life, and that without its beneficent exercise growth in physical, mental, moral or spiritual tone ceases. Discipline is the price of strength. The best strength is character-strength. Character is made strong by repairing its weak parts so that in its wholeness there be developed poise and harmony. Discipline means the strengthening of the weak links in the chain of character. There can be no intelligent self-discipline save as the weak links in the character-chain are discovered, then the work of repair can be wisely directed and the weak places mended.—Selected.

Some Views on Present Day Topics

"Traditions and Old Wives Fables"

BY DAVID BUFFUM.

A minister, referring recently to a certain class of members of our Society, said: "They are Quakers because their fathers and grandfathers were, not because they have been converted. Their interest in the Church is founded on tradition and old wives fables. It is Christianity that we want, not Quakerism. As far as any evangelical progress of our Society is concerned, it would be better off without them."

There would seem to be, in this arraignment, just a faint lack of that "true moderation" which used to be incorporated in our queries, and which is one of those very traditions to which our brother referred. As I know him, however, to be an earnest Christian worker, who doubtless felt exactly as he expressed himself, it behooves us, I think, to look back a little at these traditions (I think we may pass over the "old wives fables" as not meant literally, but used only to round out the phrase into a rather fuller and more relishing mouthful) and see whether they are, after all, such a poor foundation upon which to base one's interest in Quakerism.

"Our forefathers," said Lincoln, "brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." So we, paraphrasing this famous utterance, can say that our forefathers brought forth a new faith, a new standard of living, conceived in liberty of conscience and dedicated to the proposition that all men are equal in the sight of God. As an unavoidable part of this proposition comes the denial of all priestly power and of the necessity for any priestly intervention between man and his Maker. The non-use of symbols and needless ceremonies naturally follows. Our forefathers did not believe that water could wash away sin or that a full-grown intellect needed the symbolism of a wafer and a sip of wine.

Now a body like this, where all were equal and all were brothers and "friends," cannot be otherwise than essentially democratic. The Quaker was a democrat of democrats. He took off his hat to no one. And yet the fact that he himself must avoid the pride of place and all vain pomp and display showed how different was his democracy from that which so often passes under the name.

If we reckon back from the time of its disuse, this "wearing of the hat" is perhaps one of the oldest of the traditions of Friends and one at which, at the present day, we would be most inclined to smile.

But, though its exhibition at the present time is not called for, what it stood for is a tradition that needs to be cherished now as much as ever. For the spirit that lay back of it was the spirit of the most splendid democracy the world has ever seen. It was the democracy that treated all men, high and low, with equal courtesy, but none with slavish adulation—the democracy that could "Talk with crowds and keep its virtue

Or walk with Kings, nor lose the common touch."

Plainness of speech and apparel had back of them the same fundamental idea. The use of the singular pronoun was to avoid the flattery, then believed to be fulsome, of addressing a person as more than one; and the plain clothes, that the wearer might himself be free from vanity and self-aggrandizement.

One of the most conspicuous features of the earlier Quakerism was the censorship that the meeting exercised over the lives and conduct of its members, and this had to do with some of our best traditions. No other sect ever paid no much attention to personal conduct. Friends were required to be "punctual to their promises and just in the payment of their debts and careful to live within the bounds of their circumstances." They were required to live in "love and unity" and to refrain from slander and defamation of character. They must attend to their poor; those to whom fortune had been less kind were not to be condemned as failures, but helped as brothers. They must educate their children. They must observe "true moderation in all things." They must guard against "the love of ease and self-indulgence" and be careful, at all times, to maintain the distinctive testimonies of Friends. The censorship in these matters was so rigid that, among our old records, plenty of cases can be found where very prominent and influential Friends were examined concerning some lapse, often very trivial, from the close observance of the Discipline.

Now the standard set by such requirements and censorship, notwithstanding the fact that it undoubtedly did often fall below its purposes and the spirit become forgotten in the letter, was a high one. It laid stress upon honor, upon courage, upon tenderness for one's family, upon charity for one's fellow-men, upon self-control and self-denial, upon faith in God. In all that it stood for, there is more than a passing resemblance to the standard that King Arthur, when he essayed to form

"A glorious company, the flower of men
To serve as model for the mighty world."

laid upon his Knights of the Round Table.

"I made them lay their hands in mine and swear
To reverence . . . their conscience as their King;
To break the heathen and uphold the Christ;
To ride abroad redressing human wrongs;
To speak no slander, no, nor listen to it;
To lead sweet lives in purest chastity;
To love one maiden only; cleave to her
And worship her by years of noble deeds."

Of all the traditions of Quakerism, probably none is so often regarded by present-day Friends as founded upon blind and unreasoning prejudice as the opposition to music. But, if examined carefully and critically, this, too, will be found to have a very substantial basis of reason; not, it is true, a reason which would seem to us of today enough to warrant the prohibition of its use, but which, in days when it was felt that all must avoid those things which, however innocuous to the majority, might prove a stumbling-block and means of offense to the few, was deemed quite sufficient for it. That a great many whose opportunities for observing human life lay mainly within the limits of our Society never clearly perceived this primary reason, and that in them the opposition to music did become a mere prejudice, must, I think, be freely admitted.

The power of music to sway the mind to different feelings and emotions has been known and recognized since the dawn of history. It was clearly understood by the ancient chronicler who tells us how David played upon his harp to soothe the turbulent spirit of King Saul. Dryden, in his "Alexander's Feast," makes it the theme of his story. Who does not recall the beautifully-flowing lines in which he tells how the king, having by the power of music been brought to a warlike state of mind, was by the same means soothed and made peaceful; or the final comparison of the musicians, in which he says:

"He raised a mortal to the skies,
She drew an angel down."

Now it is not strange that a power that, figuratively speaking, could "raise a mortal to the skies," to say nothing of "drawing an angel down," could, upon some temperaments and under certain conditions, work spells that might be very dangerous in their results. Tolstoy, in his terrible story, "The Kreutzen Sonata," describes just such a happening, and expresses himself concerning the dangers of music far more strongly than any Quaker that I ever heard. The story represents an extreme phase of the subject; it would be hard to suppose such cases otherwise than extremely rare.

There are a great many people, however, who are affected by music to a degree that those of us whose liking for it is more moderate and normal, can hardly understand. I have known a woman, whose nature was intensely musical, to be so intoxicated (I use her own term) by music of the kind that appealed to her that frequently, after hearing some especially fine performance, she would lie awake all night in a state of musical exaltation, if I may so term it. Of course, after such a tax on the nervous system, a reaction would follow and she would be half-ill the whole of the next day.

But it is upon men that the worst effects of too much music are to be seen; women seem to stand it better. I was once asked by a certain siren (in view of her musical and other qualifications I am using the term advisedly) to escort her to an evening reception where she said I would meet some of the most distinguished musicians in New York. The bait was not particularly alluring, as I never cared much for celebrities, but I went. What she had told me was true; some of those who were present were famous on two continents. But, taking the male portion of the assembly as a whole, I have never seen such effeminacy or such a general evidence of that mental unbalance which seeks expression in eccentricities and bizarre effects. They ran inordinately to hair; some of them wore low rolling collars and soft ties with their evening clothes; almost all seemed to have gone wrong in some way or other. I had seen enough of human folly and human wrongdoing not to be very easily shocked, but this musical degeneracy was new to me and gave me a feeling of revulsion that was sickening. I sought my companion (who surely did not regard the company with the feelings that I did, for she was practicing her blandishments upon one of the worst of the long-haired gentry) and made my escape. I have not since cared to see any famous musicians at short range.

Now I am not telling these things to show that the old-time Quaker viewpoint concerning music would be desirable now, but simply to show, as well as I can, that there was a reason for it. For without any doubt whatever there were Friends in George Fox's time who had seen at least as much of these matters as I have, and very likely some who had seen even as much as Tolstoy. And this would be enough, in those days, to cause the prohibition of all music, all being ready to forego it for the sake of those upon whom it might work harm.

In the great majority of men and women the love of music is natural and its gratification in any reasonable degree does no harm. I believe that it ought to be in every home as a source of entirely innocent enjoyment and a means of making home more attractive. But the boy who shows a talent and love for it that are distinctly beyond the ordinary ought not to be encouraged to cultivate it too much, for the simple reason that its overindulgence has a tendency to take the manhood out of him—and nothing worse than that could befall him.

"Traditions and"—no, not "old wives fables!" There is not room in a letter like this to thresh out all of them—or perhaps any of them as fully as they deserve. But there is one more which, as it has of latter years often been spoken of slightly, merits, I think, a few words, and that is birthright membership.

Those of us who believe in birthright membership hold the view that the children of Friends are usually better qualified for making useful members than others are, and that it is therefore worth while to keep them by making them feel that they have literally, as well as figuratively, a birthright in the Society. Others, like the Friend whose views I quoted at the beginning of this article, believe that this policy is undesirable. They argue that neither Christianity nor Quakerism can be inherited and that therefore the fact that a man is born of Quaker parents gives him no right to membership. Let us see just how much or how little there may be in these arguments.

To suppose that a man born of Quaker lineage, if removed in infancy to a totally different environment, where he would never so much as hear of Quakers or Quakerism, would develop into a full-fledged Quaker, just as a lamb grows into a sheep, or a colt into a horse, is, of course, the height of absurdity. Personally I must plead "not guilty" to the charge of ever having held such original and picturesque views. But that he might inherit from such an ancestry the qualities of mind and heart which would make him best adapted to Quakerism is not only possible, but it is a fact. Blood that has run long in the same channel and mated with its own kind is always prepotent. And if, as is the case with most of our birthright members, he grows up in the environment in which he was born, he is sure, during the most formative period of his life, to be pretty well imbued with Quaker traditions and points of view; he takes them in, as it were, with his mother's milk.

And so, whenever I hear birthright membership slightly spoken of, I am very apt to think of the inheritance that, through nature's own laws, must always come to those who are born of a long line of upright and honorable and God-fearing ancestry. It is true that the heir of such an inheritance may fail to live up to it and that his feet may wander very far from the path that was trodden by his forefathers. But its tendency—and an inherited tendency can never be left out of the reckoning—is always to better things; sometimes to say, if he strays too far, "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further," and always to incline him, even though unconsciously, to a sane viewpoint and to clean and honorable living. The "tradition" of birthright membership was not founded without reason or understanding. Nor did one of the greatest of English poets—whose sorrowful but fruitful life always bore witness of the "traditions" that he cherished—boast of any light or unimportant thing, when he wrote:

"My boast is not that I deduce my birth
From loins enthroned and rulers of the earth;
But higher far my proud pretensions rise,
The son of parents passed into the skies."

Providence Island, R. I.

"What is my next duty? What is the thing that lies nearest to me?" "That belongs to your everyday history. No one can answer that question but yourself. Your next duty is just to determine what your next duty is. Is there nothing you neglect? Is there nothing you know you ought not to do? You would know your duty, if you thought in earnest about it and were not ambitious of great things." "Ah, then," responded she, "I suppose it is something very commonplace, which will make life more dreary than ever. That cannot help me." "It will, if it be as dreary as reading the newspapers to an old, deaf aunt. It will soon lead you to something more. Your duty will begin to comfort you at once, but will at length open the unknown fountain of life in your heart."—George MacDonald.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

Owing to a recent change of street name and numbering, the address of the Central Offices, Institute, Library, etc., of Friends in England is now Devonshire House, 136 Bishopsgate, London, E. C.

Thomas E. Jones and Leora Bogue, Fairmount, Ind., just closed one of the most successful revivals ever held at Dunreith, Ind. Thomas Jones is doing excellent work here as pastor. His messages are strong and convincing.

At the recent session of Farmridge Monthly Meeting, held the 1st inst., at the meeting place near Elk City, Kan., three new members were received. These additions were the result of a revival held during Third month by Frank K. Smith, a minister from Leon, Kan.

Chas. Lescault, Friends pastor at Spiceland, Ind., has given a number of special First-day evening talks. Lincoln's Birthday was observed, the subject being "A Man Sent From God." Washington's Birthday was the occasion of a talk on "My Country," while Neal Davis' Birthday called forth a discourse on "Obedience to the Heavenly Vision." Special music was prepared and the services were attended by large and appreciative congregations.

A Friend writes concerning the "closing of meeting" and objects to what he calls "a pastoral benediction or prayer." He says: "To my mind the overshadowing of ancient goodness often vouchsafed at this particular moment of silent waiting is worth more than a thousand pastoral benedictions." He would prefer to "break meeting" by shaking hands. There is food for reflection in his observation. There are other denominations which close many of their services with a silent prayer.

President Robert L. Kelly, of Earlham College, visited friends at Haverford, Pa., Fourth month 1st to 3d, and on the evening of the 1st met with the members of the Philadelphia Earlham Club at the Friends Institute, Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. He gave a most inspiring account of the achievements of Earlham College and also stated the present need in connection with the effort to raise the debt of the college. The members present made subscriptions to the fund and heartily pledged their allegiance anew to their Alma Mater.

A revival effort began in the meeting at Centreville, Ind., the 19th of Second month. The pastor, Pearl Williams, was assisted in the beginning by Willis Bond, Carmel, Ind., but he was called home at the end of the first week on account of several deaths in his meeting. During the remainder of the meeting, which continued eighteen days longer, a number of local ministers assisted in the work. Thirty professed conversion and twenty-one joined the meeting. A Junior Christian Endeavor Society has been organized by the pastor with a membership of ten.

Peter Wistar and wife celebrated their sixty-fifth wedding anniversary at the Preston Reading Room, Haverford, Pa., the 5th inst. The reception was arranged by the Haverford College Y. M. C. A., and a committee representing the various activities of the reading room assisted in receiving. Peter Wistar was born in Lancaster in 1824, and his wife in Philadelphia in 1827. They were married in 1846, and first lived in the northeastern part of the city. Later they moved to West Philadelphia, and for many years have been members of the Northminster Presbyterian Church.

Third month 27, 1861, Josiah Unthank and Susan B. Hunt stood up in meeting in old Spiceland Meeting-house and according to the beautiful custom of Friends declared their marriage vow, and Third month 22, 1911, a large number of their friends gathered to help them celebrate their "golden wedding" at their home in Spiceland, Ind. The house was beautifully decorated with white and gold and flowers. A splendid program was much enjoyed by all. The old vow was renewed in the presence of the company after which Chas. Lescault, pastor in the meeting, repeated the beautiful "golden wedding" service specially prepared for such services. After refreshments were served the company departed leaving numerous tokens of love and appreciation. Both these dear Friends are loyal members of Spiceland Monthly Meeting and have a large place in the affections of all.

Isaac T. Gibson, now residing at Bigheart, Okla., is in his eightieth year, and has figured out that he has attended Bible school about 3,900 First-days, which is equivalent to the average number of days required for a college man to get his education—beginning at five and graduating at twenty. In answering the question, "At what age should people graduate from Bible school?" before the Bigheart Union Sunday-school, Isaac T. Gibson gave it as his opinion that eighty was not too young. He said: "I have made it a rule through life when going on a journey to place my Sunday-School Quarterly (since they have been published) in my pocket, and in city or country on Sunday to find a Sunday-school on that day, and where possible to attend it. When young it is nearly as easy to acquire a good habit as a bad one, so begin in early life to attend Sunday-school every Sabbath, also a place of worship twice each Sunday. Be in earnest to get the best and most out of each service, and that will create a manly Christian character in your heart."

Friends in the First Friends Church, Indianapolis, contributed for all purposes last year $9,536.92, according to the local church monthly, The Silent Evangel. From 250 to 300 members are now contributors.

A large and representative committee of 100 ministers and laymen have been selected to have the supervision of the coming movement known as "The Men and Religion Forward Movement." This is to be a campaign for men and boys beginning next September and continuing through the winter. It is proposed that every brotherhood, men's Bible class and all men's organizations shall be vitalized and awakened to the responsibility of winning men and boys to Christ and the church. It will be a far-reaching movement if undertaken in the spirit and the power of the Master. Our representatives on that committee are Morton C. Pearson, John H. Furnas, Alvin T. Coate, Thomas L. Scott and Enos D. Pray.

The Quaker Round Table is creating a fine interest among our members. Elbert Russell's address was one of the finest to which our people ever listened. Other addresses are being prepared with great care, and the entire membership of the church is urged to avail themselves of this splendid opportunity to acquaint themselves with our early church history. The meetings will be held each First-day evening during Third and Fourth months, at 7 o'clock.

The Women's Foreign Missionary Society, of Alamitos, Cal., held its annual meeting the 30th ult. At 10 o'clock work and business of a local nature were considered with deep interest. A generous luncheon was provided for the noon hour. At 2 P. M. the foreign work was presented in an able address by Benjamin Coppock, Missionary Superintendent of California Yearly Meeting, who enforced his remarks with charts and figures. He tried to impress three things. First, that there must be much prayer, second; regular weekly giving, and third, individual canvas. Each individual in the church should give to this great work in a systematic way.

John T. Hadley, the pastor at this place, said: "A church has no right or reason to exist that is not first and always a missionary church." Another said: "A spirit of self-denial needs to be understood and practiced at home that missionary work may be more rapidly done."

George Taylor, former pastor, and his wife, Lillian, were present and warmly welcomed.

The meeting was well attended, and one of profit as well as interest.

Samuel Weeks and wife, who during the last twelve years have been making their home with their son-in-law, Jerry Haworth, Carthage, Mo., recently celebrated their sixty-fifth anniversary. The immediate members of the family, including a number of children and grandchildren, dined together at the mid-day meal. Several telegrams and letters of congratulation were received from absent members of the family and friends.

During the afternoon the home of Jerry Haworth was the scene of a pleasant social concourse. About fifty friends called to pay their respects and congratulate the aged couple, who enjoyed the occasion as much as their visitors and the younger people. Time after time the sturdy couple told of their interesting experiences in by-gone days.

Samuel Weeks, the husband, was born on the Island of Nantucket eighty-seven years ago. He came of sturdy Quaker stock. His wife also was a birthright Friend who was born in Vermilion County, Ill., eighty-one years ago. It was in her Vermilion County home that they were united in marriage, and they continued to live near Georgetown, Ill., until 1870, when they moved to Jasper County, Mo., establishing a home on a farm near Carthage. Both Samuel Weeks and wife are in the best of health, and thoroughly enjoy life.

A correspondent at Graham, N. C., writes: "We have just closed a successful series of meetings, conducted by Leanah Hobson, assisted by David E. Sampson, who has been in charge of this new field for the past four years.

"There were several conversions and some renewals, and we feel that the meeting did much in establishing the young members of this new meeting in the views of Truth as held and set forth by our branch of the Church.

"As a result of the meeting we have nine applicants for membership and three who had made application previous to the meeting (all adults), making in all twelve to come before our next monthly meeting.

"The ministry throughout was of an exceedingly earnest and solid character, and a spirit of testimony and of vocal prayer characterized our young people in most of the services. There was a quiet thoughtfulness and a marked absence of everything that might be classed as an excitable nature.

"Our work in this new field is steadily progressing during the winter, and previous to this series of meetings cottage meetings and other services had been held, resulting in conversions and four new members were received at our last monthly meeting."

Honey Creek Quarterly Meeting was held Fourth month 1st at Hubbard, Iowa. President D. M. Edwards, of Penn College, took a prominent part in all the sessions, his sermon in the devotional service being one of unusual power. During the business session he dealt with the campaign to increase the endowment of Penn. Forced by the ruling of the State Board of Education, which requires that accredited colleges must have an endowment of $200,000, the college is engaged in a strenuous campaign to raise a subscription of $100,000. Seventy thousand dollars has been raised thus far, and Sixth month 1st is the date set for the completion of the effort. It is a time of crisis in the history of the college. The raising of the $100,000 will accomplish several things. Chiefly it will settle for all time the question of the existence of the college. That being settled, the way will be open for new buildings, some of which are practically assured. President Edwards thinks that an announcement on commencement day that the full amount had been pledged would probably cause an increase in the enrollment of 50 next year.

Fifty thousand dollars of the amount is pledged by the people of Mahaska County, and the plan is suggested that, for the remainder, each quarterly meeting pay a pro rata amount, based on the yearly meeting assessment.

The organization of the Board of Trustees will probably be changed, the joint stock system being abolished and the college being tied closer to the yearly meeting.

Clark Terrell was present and spoke in the interest of our Bible schools, and V. D. Nicholson presented the claims of the American Friend.

Died

ATHERTON.—At her home in Uxbridge, Mass., Third month 30, 1911, Deborah P. Atherton, in her seventy-fourth year. She was a birthright Friend, a loyal and efficient member of New England Yearly Meeting.

BEARD.—At his home in Liberty, Union County, Ind., Third month 26, 1911, Wellington Beard, aged sixty-four years. He was a member of Westfield Quarterly Meeting of Friends for about forty years, and a recorded minister.

GARRIGUES.—At Haverford, Pa., Third month 20, 1911, Annie, daughter of the late Haydock and Sidney Garrigues, in her fifty-eighth year. The deceased was a member and overseer of Haverford Monthly Meeting.

HANSON.—At the home of his daughter, Lizzie J. Stiles, Jackson, Maine, Third month 15, 1911, Robert Hanson, in the eighty-seventh year of his age. The deceased was a life-long member of Unity Monthly Meeting, and for forty years an elder and faithful Christian.

HILL.—At his home, in Carthage, Ind., Third month 14, 1911, Samuel B. Hill, in his eightieth year. He had been either superintendent or teacher in the Bible school for sixty years. He was active in the business of the church.

NEWBY.—At her home, near Jonesboro, Ind., Third month 7, 1911, Sallie Newby, aged eighty-six years. She was a life-long Friend.

PARKER.—At the home of her daughter, Myrtilla Leach, Lenape, Kan., Second month 25, 1911, Asenath Parker, aged eighty-five years. Interment was made at Argonia, Kan.

FOURTH MONTH 23, 1911

JOASH REPAIRS THE TEMPLE.

2 KINGS 11:21-12:16.

(For Special Study, 12:4-15.)

GOLDEN TEXT. Then the people rejoiced, for that they offered willingly. 1 Chron. 29:9.

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fourth month 17th. Joash repairs the temple.

2 Kings 11:21-12:16.

Third-day. Ingratitude of Joash. 2 Chron. 24:15-22.

Fourth-day. Bad ending. 2 Kings 12:17-21.

Fifth-day. Bad end of Saul. 1 Sam. 31:1-10.

Sixth-day. End of Samson. Judg. 16:1-31.

Seventh-day. Manasseh. 2 Chron. 33:1-20.

First-day. A godly life. 2 Kings 22:1, 2, 23:21-30.

Time.—B. C. 821 or 864, in the twenty-third year of Joash's reign. Joash was slain in 803 or 847, the fortieth year of his reign.

Place.—Jerusalem.

Kings.—Hazeal in Syria; Jehoahaz in Israel; Shamash-ramman in Assyria.

Parallel account.—2 Chron. 24:4-14.

Joash was seven years old at the beginning of his reign, and of course Jehoiada was the one to be his guardian and the regent of the kingdom. It is said he reigned in all forty years, and as long as Jehoiada instructed him he did well, rather implying that he did evil after Jehoiada died, but this does not appear to be the meaning if we compare chapter 14:3. Naturally from his upbringing he would be likely to take special interest in the temple and his work of repairing the temple is the chief thing noticed in his long reign of forty years.

It should be remembered that the temple was a house not for worship, but for sacrifice, and for the honor of Jehovah. The dimensions of the temple show at once that the rooms were intended for priests, not the people. The building was a rectangle, 60 cubits long, east to west; 20 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high; or about 90 feet long, 30 feet broad and 45 feet high, inside measurements. The building faced the east. The material of which the house was built was white, hard limestone—a kind of marble. The floor was probably stone, covered with cypress wood, as were the walls with cedar. Beyond that the roof had cedar beams we know nothing about it. There were no windows as we understand them, but there were openings for ventilation. The interior was probably lighted with lamps. There were probably double doors. How far the temple of Solomon was gilded cannot be learned. Some authorities think there was no gilding. The stone was all hewn and fitted at the quarries or away, so the building was put together without sound of the mason's hammer.

4. "All the money of the hallowed things." "That is brought into the house of the Lord, in current money, the money of the persons for whom each man is rated." R. V. This is clearer than the Authorized Version. The income was of two kinds, (1) assessments imposed by the priests; (2) free-will offerings. Compare Lev. 27:2-8.

5. "Acquaintance." The Hebrew word thus rendered is found nowhere else and its meaning is uncertain. "Breaches." Where the walls had fallen or been injured. During Athaliah's reign the temple was neglected.

6, 7. The necessity for repairs occurred to the king, not to the priests, as might have been expected. The king reproached the priests with their neglect. Compare 2 Chron. 24:4, 5, which gives a somewhat different account.

9. "Beside the altar." The altar of burnt offering outside the temple proper; 2 Chron. 24:8.

10. "Told the money." Counted; we retain "teller" in this sense as a "paying teller" in the bank. The money was counted by the king's officer and the high-priest. This is the first use of the term "high-priest," and this may mean simply priest.

11. "Being told." "That was weighed out." R. V. All money was in the form of bullion and was weighed, not counted. "Laid it out." "Paid it out." R. V. We still speak of "laying out money on improvements."

12. The list of workmen and articles implies how extensive were the repairs needed. The money was paid to the "bosses" as we should say, and they paid the men. The idea seems to be to show that money did not go to the priests as before. They had failed in their duty and were not trusted.

13, 14. It is implied that there was not enough money to supply the utensils, but all was needed for repairs. In 2 Chronicles, however, (24:14) it is stated, "They brought the rest of the money (what was left after the repairs) before the king and Jehoiada, whereof were made vessels for the house of the Lord," etc. It is clear that nothing was spent for ornaments until the essential things were attended to.

15. They trusted the superintendents completely, "for they dealt faithfully." Whenever it is possible it is well to trust. The whole business world today is built upon credit—trust. The general faithfulness is wonderful. Men always hear about any broken trust that comes to light but nothing is said of the thousands upon thousands of men faithful to their trusts.

The end of Joash, according to Chronicles was very bad (2 Chron. 24:15-25), but in Kings the only charge brought against him is that he failed to remove the high places, otherwise he is rated among the good kings (2 Kings 14:3, 4). The difference is hard to explain.

WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY, edited by Dr. W. T. Harris and others. Publishers G. & C. Merriam Co. Bound in sheep....$10.75

Webster's New International Dictionary is not merely a revision of the International Dictionary which has become so well known in every part of the country; it is a thorough revision of every definition. All the new words of the language are incorporated in the main list of words—not affixed in an appendix as becomes necessary in modernizing an old edition.

English words are so numerous, it has become necessary to resort to very ingenious methods in order to put a complete dictionary under one cover. In this the publishers have succeeded admirably. The words in most general use with their definitions are printed in larger type on the upper portion of the page; while those not so commonly used appear at the foot of the page in smaller type. In this way reference becomes more convenient and space is economized.

The work contains 2,700 pages, 6,000 illustrations, and over 400,000 definitions. It is without doubt the most convenient and comprehensive dictionary on the market.

REASONED IT OUT.

AND FOUND A CHANGE IN FOOD PUT HIM RIGHT.

A man does not count as wasted the time he spends in thinking over his business, but he seems loth to give the same sort of careful attention to himself and to his health. And yet his business would be worth little without good health to care for it. A business man tells how he did himself good by carefully thinking over his physical condition, investigating to find out what was needed, and then changing to the right food.

"For some years I had been bothered a great deal after meals. My food seemed to lay like lead in my stomach, producing heaviness and dullness and sometimes positive pain. Of course this rendered me more or less unfit for business, and I made up my mind that something would have to be done.

"Reflection led me to the conclusion that over-eating, filling the stomach with indigestible food, was responsible for many of the ills that human flesh endures, and that I was punishing myself in that way—that was what was making me so dull, heavy and uncomfortable, and unfit for business after meals. I concluded to try Grape-Nuts food to see what it could do for me.

"I have been using it for some months now, and am glad to say that I do not suffer any longer after meals; my food seems to assimilate easily and perfectly, and to do the work for which it was intended.

"I have regained my normal weight, and find that business is a pleasure once more—can take more interest in it, and my mind is clearer and more alert."

Notice

The Annual Meeting of the Friends
Freedmen's Association will be held at 12th Street Meeting House, Philadelphia,
Pa., Second-day evening, the 17th.

The report of the Board of Managers will be read and there will be an address on the general subject of negro education in the South by Dr. James H. Dil-lard. Dr. Dillard is president of the Jeanes Fund and agent of the Slater Fund, and in connection with these funds he has occasion to inform himself thoroughly in regard to both the primary education and industrial training of the southern negroes. Before taking up this work he was a professor of Latin at Tulane University, at New Orleans. He is an interesting speaker and an able representative of the modern progressive view-point on negro education.

THE AIRSHIP.

What means the sound of wings unmounted in the skies,
As tho the race, long brooding, had at last brought forth
A fledgling destined, even now, aloft to rise,
And add the conquest of the air to that of earth?

And what shall be the emblem she aloft shall bear,
As forth, at last, with wings well proved she takes her flight?
Shall men behold the olive branch emblazoned there?
And shall she be a messenger of love and light?

Shall peace retain her as her High Ambassador?
And love chart all the sky-paths for her safe approach?
And everywhere shall men make neutral
all the skies,
That war on this, man's last won realm, shall not encroach?

Or shall she yield her helm to hands
made fierce with hate,
And trail across the skies with talons dipped in strife?
Or with the vultures swoop shall spew her loathsome stench—Dropped from the night-clouds, on the camps of life?

As God forbids, so let the laws of earth decree
That as the eyes of men are lifted, they behold,
No sign of evil portent, but the barques of Peace
Against the vast and star-lit spaces where of old

Men read the promise which so long the time awaits,
That not alone shall Heaven with voice of Peace be filled,
But in the earth as well, o'er land and sea,
Shall all the tumult of men's lives and hearts be stilled.

Suggestions for the Missionary Committee.

1. Secure if possible a copy of "Christus Redemptor" an outline study of the Island World of the Pacific. This book was published by the MacMillan Company, New York, in 1906, and was used as a text book by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Societies of the United States. It has in it two chapters of value to Christian Endeavor societies that aim to give an interesting meeting on these islands of the Pacific. These two chapters may well be assigned to two Endeavorers with the request that they prepare papers on them.

2. Turn to any good encyclopaedia for data regarding the history, government, geography, resources and development of these islands. Here is another opportunity for two interesting papers.

* * *

Hawaii and the Philippine Islands are of peculiar interest to Endeavorers of the United States because they both belong to this country. Hawaii was annexed to the United States in 1898 and became a territory in 1900. The Philippines by the treaty that closed the Spanish-American War were ceded to the United States by Spain, December 10, 1898.

* * *

The Hawaiian Islands are 2,100 miles southwest of San Francisco at the cross roads of the Pacific Ocean, contain eight sizeable islands with an area of 6,600 square miles. Its great business is sugar raising which occupies about half of the people. The population in 1900 was 154,001. Active attempts have been made to Christianize the islands. According to a recent estimate there were on the islands 26,363 Roman Catholics, 23,773 Protestants, 4,886 Mormons, and 44,306 Buddhists. In 1904 there were 147 public schools, employing 399 teachers with a registered attendance of 19,299.

* * *

The early Hawaiians were polytheists. Missionaries began work in 1819. In 1825 there were only ten baptized church members, though thousands were in the congregations. In 1832, ten years after the coming of the missionaries, there were only 577 church members in all the islands. At last, in the years from 1836-1839, occurred the great spiritual awakening that changed the Hawaiians to a nation of professing Christians. The native church of Hawaii early in its history began to send the Gospel to other groups of the island world. For fifty years they have maintained their representatives in Micronesia.

In 1870 a grand jubilee to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the mission was held in Honolulu. Arrangements had been made for the withdrawal of missionary funds and the placing of native pastors over the churches. The action of the Mission Board was felt by many of the missionaries at the time to be too radical, and events have proved that the Hawaiian people were hardly prepared for the burden of responsibility thus thrust upon them. The superstitions, weaknesses, ignorance, and inexperience of the natives could not and did not at once yield to enlightenment, and produce men prepared to be leaders in laying firm foundations for Christian civilization. Some of the imperfection and decline of the native churches can be laid to this mistaken policy of too early and precipitous withdrawal.

The Philippine Islands are 5,500 miles west of Hawaii and 500 miles off the coast of China. They have more than 3,000 islands with eleven of importance from their size and development. Total area 112,000 square miles, equal to all of New England and New York State. The population is 7,635,426.

The islands were discovered by Magellan in 1521. Attempts were made to Christianize them in 1564. The Friars who accompanied this expedition were the first teachers and civilizers of the islands. The British captured Manila from Spain in 1767 but on the declaration of peace the city was given back to Spain. After due credit has been given to Spain for what she accomplished in the Philippines—the giving of a scientific alphabet, the reduction to writing of the principal dialects, the beginnings of civilization, and the implantation of Christianity—the marvel remains that she did not do far more. Undeveloped resources, unknown territory, superficial development, mark the history of her stewardship in the Philippines.

* * *

After the battle of Manila in which Admiral Dewey captured the Spanish fleet, the United States found itself with the Philippines in its lap. President McKinley once told a company of ministers how our present policy was formulated. "I confess," he says, "I did not know what to do with them * * * I walked the floor of the White House night after night, until midnight, and I am not ashamed to tell you, gentlemen, that I went down on my knees and prayed Almighty God for light and guidance more than one night.

"And one night, late, it came to me this way—I don't know how it was, but it came: (1) that we could not give them back to Spain. (2) that we could not turn them over to France or Germany. (3) that we could not leave them to themselves, and, (4) that there was nothing left for us to do but to take them all, and to educate the Philippines, and uplift and civilize and Christianize them, and, by God's grace, to do the very best we could do by them, as our fellowmen for whom Christ died. I sent for the Chief Engineer of the War Department (our map maker) and told him to put the Philippines on the map of the United States, and there they are, and there they will stay, while I am President."

* * *

Protestant missions in the Philippines are being conducted by the Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists, United Brethren, Disciples, Congregationalists and the Bible Societies. These denominations have eliminated overlapping and to each by mutual agreement is allotted a specific field.

"Individual Faithfulness."

There is a phrase, very much used in Quaker circles, both ancient and modern, which needs to be carefully examined. The phrase to which I refer is "individual faithfulness." It is supposed to be a panacea for all situations. Meetings, it is assumed, would become strong and powerful if the members were individually faithful. Ministry would flourish in life and freshness if there was only individual faithfulness. The pastoral work of the meeting would be attended to, the social needs of the community would be met, the reforms that our wrong conditions of civic life are calling for would be undertaken if only we could secure individual faithfulness. What is needed is not machinery, not organization, not plans and committees, but "individual faithfulness."

This is a very old trait, this effort to reduce all the troubles of the world to one root and all the methods of relief to the practice of one virtue. There are many persons who stoutly believe that the ills of society would cease if we could only get a single tax inaugurated, or if women had the power to vote, or if competition could be eliminated or if some other particular nut could be cracked; for to the minds of such persons the millennium is tight inside some uncracked nut! Only locate and crack the right nut and, presto, the millennium has arrived!

This naive and simple view of life is always interesting. It seems as though the remedy was a bit nearer in sight when you get your finger on the one cause of trouble, like the old doctor who used to throw his patients into a fit, and then the course was plain, for he knew just what to do with fits! But however simple and interesting this view of life may be, it is superficial and it will not work. There are diseases which cannot be reduced to fits, and the multitudinous troubles of life cannot be treated by one blanket prescription. Righteousness and goodness must go forth to the battles of life with as great a variety of methods and expedients as evil shows in its forms and types. The millennium is in no single nut—it will not come at the stroke of a hammer. It will come only as we who are under the white banners of the great Captain fight the battle of Armageddon with all the weapons at our command.

My first point, then, is that no one phrase like this of "individual faithfulness" can meet the complexities of actual life; and my second point will be that this phrase itself is misleading as a magic religious principle. It was adopted in the eighteenth century, which was the century of individualism. Men were supposed to be created free and equal and to exist as separate, independent atoms, working out their own destiny. Each person had his own private window open on the Light from above and was responsible alone for his faithfulness in following it. This doctrine of individualism has passed away forever. We are born not as atoms, but in families. Our lives are formed by our group; our ideas have a long history behind them, just as our words have, and our most holy and spiritual ideals are formed not in individual isolation, but in a common group which draws upon a common source of Truth and which interprets it through a common history. The Roman Catholic boy and the Quaker boy will, to the end of their days, carry the traces of their respective groups and will interpret their Bibles and their inward intimations in the light of this group-experience. A society made up of individual atoms is a sheer impossibility. We cannot live unto ourselves and we cannot die unto ourselves. We must work out our destiny and our salvation in intimate and organic relation to one another. The best and most effective religious body is not the one whose members exhibit the most extraordinary individual faithfulness, but the one which is most corporate, conjunct, organic—in short, the one which is most truly an undivided "body" of many members. This will call, no doubt, all the time for personal consecration and faithfulness, but it will be a consecration and a faithfulness which have their root and ground not in the capricious individual will and purpose, but in the corporate life and wisdom of the whole body.

Current Events and Comments

The Chicago Vice Report

The first comprehensive study of vice conditions in a great American city has just been completed in Chicago. It is the work of a strong committee of unbiased professional and business men. Its findings are appalling and its recommendations eminently practical. The committee places the annual cost in lives at 5,000 and the annual profit in the trade at $60,000,000. It rejects as absolutely vicious a policy of regulation and segregation, and lays down the principle that the proper policy for a city is "constant and persistent repression," with "absolute annihilation as the ultimate ideal."

The committee recommends the immediate appointment of a morals commission of five members, to be chosen by the Mayor, to serve for two years without pay, the commissioner of health to be an ex officio member, its duty being to "gather evidence and to take the necessary legal steps for the suppression of vice in Chicago wherever such suppression is believed to be advisable." Its jurisdiction is to cover Chicago and the territory three miles beyond its corporate limits. In addition to this morals commission, there is urged a morals court to consider the cases submitted to it by the morals commission. The city is urged to erect a trade school and hospital for wayward women on a farm owned by the municipality, also a special house of detention and a second State school for wayward girls. Of vast importance in any city would be the suggested creation "of a sympathetic agency, with paid agents, who have followed a special instruction and would be charged with regular supervision of the children of unmarried mothers," and also an amply financed committee on child protection, unrestricted in its scope. Indeed, the welfare of children is a deep concern to the committee, which would keep them off the streets at night, forbid the sending of any messenger under twenty-one to a disreputable resort, while it suggests an increase in the number of small parks and recreation centers. It implores the churches to use their facilities for sane entertainments, and urges wise instruction in sex hygiene in the public schools.

As for the worst offenders, the procurers and the professional keepers of disreputable resorts, the committee urges relentless prosecution. Most interesting of all is the suggestion that women police officers be appointed to deal with the question of morals, and particularly to protect strangers on arrival. First offenders ought, the committee thinks, to be invariably placed under the charge of women probation officers.

Fifty Years Ago

Fifty years ago, wild excitement prevailed throughout the country. On the 12th of Fourth month, 1861, Fort Sumter was fired upon, and on the following day the garrison capitulated. President Lincoln called for volunteers, and within a week several thousand men were moving to the defense of Washington. The Civil War had actually begun.

Preparations are now under way in various parts of the country to commemorate prominent events connected with this terrible conflict. For the next four years these celebrations will not be infrequent. Veterans from the North and the South will meet on a number of the old battlefields to live over again the scenes now happily buried under half a century of peace.

There is a joyful yet pathetic aspect to these events. They are probably the last great reunions of Civil War veterans that will ever meet on this continent. General enthusiasm comes only with quarter-century anniversaries, and the third quarter will be beyond the life span of practically all the old soldiers. Comradeship born of carnage is rapidly becoming a thing of the past, and in its stead we are having the brotherhood of man.

The Democratic House at Work

The despatch with which the Democrats in the House of Representatives are carrying out their program presents a striking contrast to the deliberation with which congressional work has been done the past few years. Within ten days after the special session met, they had organized, passed two important measures, and were ready for the Canadian reciprocity. As soon as this is out of the way, they expect to take up the revision of certain tariff schedules which are supposed to affect the price of articles used by farmers. They propose to put such items as agricultural implements, wire for fencing, leather, boots, shoes, meats of all kinds and flours on the free list. On the whole, their proposed revisions are mild and have a fair chance of meeting with the President's approval. They hope to be through with this legislation by the middle of Sixth month and spend the balance of the session investigating the administrative departments. The carrying out of this program within the time designated is highly problematical.

Direct Election of Senators

The first important measure passed by the new House was an amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct election of United States Senators. The Republicans objected to the form of the amendment, fearing that it would curtail the power now vested in the Federal Government to control congressional election, but, after failing to get the wording changed, nearly all of them supported the measure, the vote standing 297 for and 15 against. The Senate Judiciary Committee now has an opportunity to do the country a real service by making a strict examination of the effect, whether immediate or remote, of the resolution as it stands on Federal control of elections; and, if it be found that existing Federal power is in danger of being impaired, they should devise a form of words which, while guarding against such a result, would not provoke opposition by seeming to grant new power. With this done, the amendment is likely to receive the required two-thirds support in the Senate.

Campaign Fund Publicity

Last Sixth month the President signed a bill providing for the after-election publication of campaign expenses, but the measure did not meet with universal approval. This gave occasion for early revision, and the second important legislative act of the new House was an amendment providing for the publication of campaign expenses ten days before election, with supplemental statements every three days thereafter. An amendment was adopted extending publicity to the individual receipts and expenses of congressional candidates, and it was only by clever manipulation that the leaders of the House succeeded in squeezing it out of the bill. Their excuse was that it would have defeated the whole measure, as it doubtless would.

300 Miles in an Aeroplane

The longest continuous flight in an aeroplane was made last week by Pierre Prier, who flew from the outskirts of London to the suburbs of Paris, a distance of 290 miles, in four hours and twelve minutes. This effort was the first attempt of an aviator to fly from the British capital to Paris. A flight from the French capital to London was achieved by the late John B. Moisant, Chicago, who carried a passenger. Delayed by bad weather, however, it took him twenty-one days to accomplish the journey.

The best previous cross-country flight was made by Lieutenant Cameron, who covered 147 miles in four hours and two minutes. The record for an over-sea flight was established some six weeks since by Lieutenant Bague, who flew over the Mediterranean from Antibes to the little island of Borgona, off the Italian coast. His flight measured 124.5 miles. In First month, J. A. D. McCurdy flew in a Curtiss biplane from Key West, Fla., to within a few miles of Havana, traveling over 90 miles before he was compelled to descend.

The Champagne War

The champagne war in northern France brings into prominence a form of monopoly that is none too common, even in this monopoly-ridden age. It might be called the "monopoly of excellence." True, the excellence in this particular instance pertains to wine—a worse than useless beverage—but this has nothing to do with the kind of monopoly which "protesters" in the champagne war are struggling to perpetuate. There are high and low grades of wine, just as there are of tapestry or glassware, and one of the best wines, so we are told, is that made from grapes grown in Champagne, a small province in France. So superior is this wine that it is known the world over by the name of the country where it is produced. Naturally the vine growers in the neighboring districts wish to profit by this reputation, selling their wines under the same name. The privilege was once granted by the French Government; then removed. Last week the French Senate passed a resolution restoring to one of these neighboring provinces its former privilege, whereupon the champagne producers gathered in mobs at Ay and Epernay, the champagne-storing centers, and began destroying the factories and warehouses using outside grapes. When once vandalism had broken loose, the real champagne houses were also attacked. Millions of dollars' worth of property was burned and thousands of gallons of wine were emptied into the street. National troops were required to quell the disturbance.

Improving the Comic Supplement

The league which has been formed "to improve the comic supplement for the children" should receive the hearty co-operation of everyone who cares for the cultivation of a healthy artistic and moral sense. It is not the purpose of the league to advocate the suppression of comic supplements, but to create a demand for the healthier kinds. As now printed, these supplements usually vulgarize taste and diffuse a spirit of irreverence and rowdiness positively harmful. It is encouraging to know, however, that a number of leading American journals are trying to supply amusing pictures and reading for children which are at once wholesome and entertaining. These should be encouraged, and "The League for the Improvement of the Children's Supplement," under the leadership of Percival Chubb, New York, ought to have branches in every large city in the United States.

Postal Reforms

In answer to criticism upon the postoffice department which has arisen in connection with the attempt to make the advertising pages of magazines pay larger postage, the department has issued a statement of recent reforms and changes which reach the impressive number of 50. The department congratulates itself on making better provision for its employes. It has reduced, so far as the public would allow, the "Sunday" work of letter carriers and postoffice clerks. It has made provision for better care and sanitation of mail cars. Better bookkeeping and a closer supervision of details have gone hand in hand with larger conveniences for the public, as, for instance, in the abrogation of the frequently troublesome rule that a registered package could only be delivered to the individual to whom it was addressed and not to members of his family or clerks of his office.

Education in the South

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

Through North Carolina.

To one who has traveled through the South the effort to educate the children is impressive.

This was noted particularly in Guilford Co., N. C., which takes the lead in mental and moral improvement in that State.

Three days spent at Guilford College gave ample opportunity to see the marked improvement in that time-honored and worthy institution.

The new Carnegie Library and King Hall being substantial additions to the campus, as also the beautiful new home of President and Mary M. Hobbs—all completed within the past twelve months.

We appreciated their hospitality and courtesy in giving us the freedom of the college, including several opportunities to meet with the students in their collections.

Everyone with whom we conversed about the college confirmed the conviction that it was a very valuable educational center.

At Greensboro, N. C., principal Foust, of the State Normal School for Girls, gathered the 600 students together to meet with us although it was late in the afternoon when we came to the school. Several members of the Society of Friends are on the teaching staff of this institution. Its equipment compares favorably with any of its class in the United States.

The spirit of self-sacrifice and appreciation of high ideals pervades the student body and gives great promise.

At Tuskegee.

Our objective point was Tuskegee Institute. We wished to see for ourselves what Booker T. Washington was doing for his people at that place.

Our reception by him and the entertainment which we enjoyed for five days, gave us ample chance to study the methods of this movement for the uplift of two races. We realized at once that industrial training was as helpful for the white as for the black man. If anyone lacks faith or hope or charity toward the Negro let him go forthwith to Tuskegee and see what a colored man has originated and put into successful operation, with the assistance of his friends. We were little prepared to find a campus of hundreds of acres with some thirty stately brick buildings—all built by the students—and the dining-hall seating 2,000 at one time.

Thirty-seven divisions in the industrial department gave employment to every student during half his school time, while those who labored every day had good night school privileges.

The first impression we received was that of good order prevailing throughout the institution.

The polite, alert and erect carriage of the students was an outward and visible sign of an inward power we could but wish might reach to every individual member of their race. The secretary of their Y. M. C. A. was detailed to accompany us through the various departments and out to the neighboring farms, where the influence of the Institute was much in evidence.

A two weeks' "Short Course" in agriculture attracted many of these farmers to take advantage of the instruction given in dairy management at the agricultural building. Here we saw butter and cheese made and milk bottled in the most approved way.

The auditorium, in which the annual Farmers' Conference is held seats 2,500 persons and it was filled repeatedly during the days which we spent in this inspiring community.

Eighteen hundred colored men and women from 11 States assembled to take part in this twentieth annual gathering of farmers. Booker T. Washington's master mind presided on all occasions with consummate tact, drawing out the best each person could contribute from his or her experience at farming. How to make the farm pay was the subject under discussion.

The older students and visitors listened attentively during the five hours sessions without any sense of tediousness.

One farmer brought sample seeds of his farm products. These he had selected carefully for and from his cotton and cereal crops and he offered them to any one who could use them.

The teachers and ministers were called upon at another session to report in what ways they had assisted the farmers. A certain teacher in the prime of her days said she had saved enough money, by hoeing at noon and early in the morning, to buy three houses and 300 acres of land, in the course of twenty years. She always went to the homes of the most needy and ignorant of her people and taught them how to live besides instructing their children.

The clear, strong practical sense of that woman remains in our memory above all the other speakers at that session, interesting as these were.

A young man, lately graduated from Tuskegee, had gone into the woods and started a school, with very little assistance, in a most creditable manner.

The true missionary spirit was always in evidence. The Executive Committee of the Negro Business League held its annual meeting at Tuskegee Institute while we were there, and 15 representatives of that league told of their success in life to an appreciative audience of 2,500.

The effect of the work at Tuskegee is to quicken educational interest in the county. Both white and black people feel the effect of this quickening, so that the tide of emigration from Macon Co. has been checked.

Tuskegee and Hampton Institutes create strong and capable men and women for the social and political citizenship of a nation even when, by the accident of birth, they are of another color.

The Revised Version.

That there was no new translation of the Scriptures for two hundred and seventy years after the King James Version is a striking testimony to the beauty and excellence of the Authorized Version. However, for more than a half century before the Revised Version was published, there was a growing feeling that a new translation was necessary.

Finally, after a number of efforts had failed, the Convocation of Canterbury, in Second month, 1870, resolved that it was desirable to undertake a revision of the Authorized Version. It was further decided that a body of its own members should undertake the work, with power to "invite the co-operation of any eminent for scholarship, to whatever nation or religious body they might belong." Forthwith a committee of 27 members was appointed. Every member of this committee was a devout scholar of high order. Two companies were formed, one for the revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament and the other for the revision of the same version of the New Testament. Eight rules were agreed upon by the convocation, which were to govern the revisers in their work. These rules may be found in the preface of any copy of the Revised Version, and are well worth studying. The fifth rule, in particular, shows how conservative they were. No change was to be made in the text except two-thirds of those present approved of the same.

On the 22d day of Sixth month, 1870 the English committee began its work, under the rules specified. Shortly after, steps were taken, under a resolution passed by both houses of convocation, for inviting the co-operation of American scholars; and eventually two companies of American scholars were organized, Tenth month, 1872, to work in co-operation with the English committees. From the very outset the work was prosecuted with great diligence and care. The whole time devoted to the work was ten and a half years. A session of four days was held every month, with the exception of Eighth month and Ninth month, in each year, from the commencement of the work in Sixth month, 1870. When we know that these devout men were working with no financial remuneration, and for ten years, even at great personal loss, gave unstintingly of their time and superb intellects, we read with new appreciation the Revised Version. The Revised New Testament was published in 1881, and the Revised Old Testament, and consequently Revised Bible, in 1885.

Perhaps someone is asking, "Why a Revised Version at all?" It is a well-known fact that some are prejudiced against the newer versions and cling to the Authorized Version with a devotion akin to worship. But it must not be forgotten that the King James Version had its day of opposition, and some honest and devout souls never acknowledged its merits over the Genevan or Bishops Bibles. Yet it must be remembered by all that the whole history of the English Bible, from Tyndale's day, is a history of growth and improvement by means of repeated revisions. William Tyndale, in the preface to his first translation, said, "If any perceive in any place that the version has not attained unto the very sense of the tongue or the very meaning of Scripture, or has not given the right English word, that they should put it to their hand and amend it, remembering that so is their duty to do."

The "duty" imposed by Tyndale has been keenly felt by scholars ever since.

There are four primary reasons why the duty to revise the Authorized Version was so generally felt by the scholars of the nineteenth century: 1. Owing to the natural growth of the English language, many words used have changed meaning entirely or become obsolete. 2. Scholars were better acquainted with the sacred languages, and able to distinguish delicate shades of meaning which their predecessors were unable to appreciate. 3. The science of textual criticism, under such eminent scholars as Griesbach, Lachman, Tischendorf and Tregelles, had resulted in the construction of a much more accurate Greek text than the best available in the days of James I. 4. The discovery and use of the three famous manuscripts, viz., the Vatican, the Sinaitic and the Alexandrian. To anyone who will pause long enough to give thought to the above points will appear the tremendous advantage which the later revisers had. They had at their command not only all that the former translators possessed, but, in addition, the accumulated fruits of the labors of devout scholars for three hundred years before.

If it had been the good fortune of any of us to have been present one day as the revision committee worked, we should have been much interested in the great stacks of documents, translations, versions and manuscripts. But we should have been most interested in the three manuscripts named above, for upon the authority of these ancient documents hangs the fate of certain portions of Scripture which appear in the older versions. Since they play such an important part in recent revisions, it will be necessary to pass each one in brief review.

These manuscripts show us the Bible as it existed soon after the apostolic days. Scholars are generally agreed that they are copies made about 300 to 450 A. D. There are many copies of the original manuscripts extant—some 1,500 in all, but the three under discussion bear the marks of age and are therefore of greater value for accuracy. They are called uncial manuscripts. They are written in capital letters, with no division between words, as if we should write: NOWHENJESUSWASBORNINBETHLEHEMOFJUDEA.

Later manuscripts, and consequently less accurate, are called cursive, being written in a running hand like our modern writing.

The reader will readily appreciate the value of the older manuscripts for accuracy if he will write a few paragraphs and pass them through 50 hands for copying, each one copying from the copy of the one preceding, and then finally comparing the fiftieth copy with the original paragraphs. He will be quick to see that the fifth or tenth copy is much nearer correct than the fortieth or fiftieth, and that, even in the first copies, words have been changed or omitted that have an important bearing upon the original meaning. Now if the reader will bear in mind that no original manuscripts of the Bible are in existence today, and that scholars are dependent upon copies made by hand from the originals, he will understand the value of these oldest copies.

It is a curious fact that these three manuscripts are in the hands of the three great branches of the Christian Church. The Alexandrian (called Codex A) is kept in the British Museum, and, of course, is one of the treasures of Protestant England. It was presented to Charles I by Cyril Lucar, Constantinople, in 1628, too late to be used in preparing the Authorized Version. It is not a perfect manuscript, as ten leaves of the Old Testament are missing, while twenty-five leaves from the beginning of Matthew, two from John and three from Corinthians are wanting. Exact copies of Codex A may be found in many public libraries today.

The Vatican manuscript (Codex B) is in the possession of the Roman Catholic Church and is carefully kept in the Vatican Library at Rome. This document is generally conceded to be the oldest of the manuscripts, and has lain in the Vatican Library about five hundred years. Although this document was in Rome at the time of the issue of the Authorized Version, it was not available for study by Protestant scholars. Dr. Tischendorf did succeed in getting some valuable information from it by writing on his thumb nails, for any who saw it were deprived of pen and paper. However, of late years it has become easily accessible through the excellent fac similes made by the permission of Pope Pius IX. This manuscript, like Codex A, is imperfect. Parts of Genesis and Psalms are wanting in the Old Testament, while Hebrews 14 is missing from the New Testament. But where one manuscript is faulty, the others are quite clear.

The Sinaitic manuscript (Codex Aleph) is the discovery of Dr. Tischendorf. It has only been known about fifty years, and is a valuable treasure of the Greek Church, kept at St. Petersburg.

It derives its name from the place where it was found. The story of the finding of this most valuable document reads like romance, and is too long to narrate here. Suffice it to say that Dr. Tischendorf, the great German scholar, unexpectedly found some sheets of the document in a waste-paper basket in St. Catharine's Convent, at the foot of Mount Sinai. Steps were taken which finally led to the recovery of the entire manuscript. It is upon the authority of this manuscript, together with the Vatican, that the last twelve verses of Mark are omitted in the Revised Version.

At an early stage in the labors of the revisers, an agreement was made with the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, conveying to them the copyright in the work. This agreement provided for the necessary expenses of the undertaking, and procured for the Revised Version the advantage of being published by bodies long connected with the publication of the Authorized Version.

The final issuing of the Revised Version is familiar to all. The numbering of verses, the division into paragraphs, the arrangement of the poetical books and the many suggestive and illuminating marginal notes, together with the numerous alterations in the text, have all been passed in review, adversely criticized by some, enthusiastically welcomed by others. But by every person who knows the history of its publication, the Revised Version is conceded to be the work of devout, unprejudiced, self-sacrificing scholars of the highest order.

The American Standard Version.

To the minds of some the difference between the Revised Version and the American Standard Version is not clear. As has been stated above, an American committee was asked to co-operate with the English committee in preparing the Revised Version. It is quite reasonable to expect that unanimous agreement would not be reached on all points. As a compromise, many of the suggestions from the American committee appear in the marginal notes and comments of the Revised Version when not carrying enough weight with the English committee to be given place in the text.

After the publication of the Revised Version in 1885, the English committee was disbanded, but the American committee continued as an organized body. The agreement with the university presses of Oxford and Cambridge prevented them from issuing an independent version for fourteen years. At the expiration of this time agreement, the American committee was ready with a complete revision of the New Testament which was published in 1900 and the Old Testament which was published the next year.

In formal particulars, this American Version will show but slight and infrequent deviations from its predecessor. Many of the marginal readings of the former version are incorporated in the text. The titles of the books, which in the former edition were given as printed in 1611, have been somewhat abbreviated or omitted, as in the case of "Saint," which is omitted as a prefix to the names of the evangelists. Words which have a different meaning in America were changed, as "corn," etc. The two most obvious departures of this edition from that of 1885 consist in the addition of references to parallel and illustrative biblical passages, and of running headings to indicate the contents of the pages.

In many important respects the American Standard revision is conceded, even by English scholars, to be superior to the Revised Version, out of which it had its growth.

Thus end the versions of the English Bible. Its history has been long and varied. From the first the efforts of the translators have been to give to the English-speaking people the Bible in their own tongue, expressed in language that would convey the original meaning. The last expression of that effort is found in the American version.

Will there ever be another version? He would be a rash man indeed who would say that the last word has been said on Bible translation. The advance of scholarship, the growth of the English language and the increased knowledge of the Orient may all combine to make a new version necessary at some future time. If so, we should be prepared to welcome it. For every effort to get nearer the truth as expressed by the inspired writers but makes that truth more precious.

The history of the translating and printing of the English Bible has been a continuous history of growing appreciation of its value as a guide book of life.

"What is the world?—A wildering maze.
Where sin hath tracked ten thousand ways,
Her victims to ensnare;
All broad, and winding, and aslope,
All tempting with perfidious hope,
All ending in despair.

"Millions of pilgrims throng those roads,
Bearing their baubles, or their loads,
Down to eternal night;
One humble path, that never bends,
Narrow, and rough and steep, ascends
From darkness into light.

"Is there a Guide to show that path?
The Bible: he alone, who hath
The Bible, need not stray;
Yet he who hath, and will not give
That heavenly Guide to all that live, Himself shall lose the way."

Friends and The Civil War.

BY CHARLES F. COFFIN.

In a bulletin of Friends Historical Society of Philadelphia of Third month, 1911, is an interesting extract from the minutes of the Baltimore Meeting for Sufferings in reference to the conscription cases during the Civil War.

It recalled to my mind forcibly the events of that interesting occasion and brought solemn feelings to me to find that I am the only living member of the committees of the different meetings for sufferings appointed to visit Washington City.

I have a very vivid recollection of our work. It was a serious time and one that tried men's souls. When we met together it was under feelings of great solemnity and earnest desire for the leading of the Holy Spirit in all that we did.

It was one of the first opportunities that Friends had had in this country to test their testimony against war. Our sympathies were all strongly with the Government and opposed to the continuance of slavery.

I recollect, when the appointed committees from the various meetings for sufferings visited Washington City and had an interview with President Lincoln, that he received us with great courtesy and kindness and showed deep feeling at the statements which we presented to him. After hearing our statements, he assured us that no person who was really conscientious should be permitted to suffer if the case was made known unto him—a promise which he faithfully carried out.

Our next visit was to Secretary of War Edward M. Stanton, who was, as is generally known, a man of great force of character, rough and hasty in his remarks, but evidently a man of deep feeling and tender sympathy. When we presented the subject to him, he listened (as is said in the report to the Baltimore Meeting for Sufferings) with earnest attention to the remarks, and, at the close, inquired whether we had any proposition to make. He stated that his mother was a Friend and that he had a warm affection for the Society and would be glad to relieve them from any suffering, but that he must comply with the law of the land. He also stated that he knew that many of the young men of our Society had no conscientious scruples, and such would be expected to take their places if drafted. He was exceedingly kind and courteous, however, and we left him with a high regard for his ability and force of character as well as kindly sympathy.

His remarks in reference to our young men were strictly true, as was shown afterwards, when many of them, without waiting for drafting, volunteered in the service. They weighed the question of loyalty to the Government and opposition to slavery against their educated idea of opposition to war, and as many of them had never formed a very definite conclusion of their own on this subject, they readily joined the army.

I recollect especially one of that class—Capt. William Wiles, Indianapolis, with whom I had a long conversation when his company was brought to Richmond to prepare for war. I did not feel it my place to persuade anyone to desist from doing what they thought was right in the premises. I listened to his argument in favor of his course with a great deal of interest.

We then visited each one of the secretaries, commencing with the Secretary of State, W. H. Seward, who was exceedingly curt and unkind and treated us quite uncivilly. We accepted his remarks kindly and withdrew.

I remarked to John Butler, one of the leading members of the deputation, that I thought that we had as well not go further. He replied at once, "We will go forward, for we want to find out whether there are any of the other secretaries who entertain a similar opinion to that of Secretary Seward."

We were received by all of the others with the greatest kindness, and they listened to our statements with rapt attention.

After completing this, the committee met again in Baltimore and tendered our report, which is published in the bulletin. The committee as a whole had no occasion to meet together afterwards. Much of the work connected with it fell upon our friends in Baltimore, who were quite equal to it. Our clerk, F. T. King, especially from his position as an influential man in the city, was useful in communicating with the Government.

I went to Washington City several times afterward on matters connected with the war. My position in Indiana was well known, and Governor Morton and myself were about one age and had grown up near to each other in Wayne County, Indiana. I always received from him the utmost kindness, and it became necessary to visit the Governor frequently, for the Government had elaborated a plan by which, upon payment of $300 (an amount sufficient to employ a substitute), to release Friends from military service; but we did not feel at liberty to accept pecuniary release from our testimony against war, and both the Government at Washington and Indiana acted with great kindness in releasing from the service any scrupulous persons who had been drafted.

I recollect on the return of our committee from the first meeting of the united committees, we came on the B. & O. R. R. through a hostile country, and we were warned that it was dangerous for us to travel over that railroad. It was a serious occasion. In the sleeping-car on which we traveled there were but few passengers except ourselves, and we united in a season of prayer at the close of the day, and came safely through.

I look back now through the long years that have passed, when these transactions have become historical, with the greatest interest and with the feeling that we were led through our difficulties by the Holy Spirit and, I believe, accomplished much for the relief of Friends.

The Doctor's Mind.

"No, no lemon!" said the doctor, with a growl. "I don't know what the world's coming to nowadays—can't even get a decent cup of tea. You'd think all the universe was coming down with colds and being dosed with hot lemonade. Of course, sugar—three lumps."

"What is it now?" his hostess asked, dropping in the three lumps and putting an extra one in the saucer. "The tariff or the school board? Or did Mrs. Rownes throw your medicine out the window as soon as your back was turned? It isn't a bit fair to blame my innocent tea."

"It's families!" the doctor exploded. "There aren't any families nowadays. The economists are right; family life is obsolete—as obsolete as chivalry. There are groups of individuals that sleep under the same roof and occasionally eat at the same table, but the moment breakfast is over in the morning, off they fly, each in a different direction, like atoms that are antipathetical."

"But when everybody has to go off to work—" the lady of the teacups began. The old doctor interrupted her. He put down his cup and hammered upon the arm of his chair.

"It isn't the work I'm talking about—it's the lack of interest in each other. It is the total absence of team-work. You remember the Fenchurches, Laura?"

His hostess nodded. "Well, they were a family. Remember when Bob ran off with that five hundred, how they all worked to pay the debt? And how they loved him into being an honest man afterward? That was a special thing, of course. But they always pulled together. The girls used to come in when their mother had callers, and she was always round when the young folks came. The girls took pride in Ben's chemical experiments, and he used to skip down every night for a bit of Della's music. Then when they married and scattered, they were always running home, and doing things for each others' children. That was a family—the way God meant families to be—sticking together through every sort of weather. How many do you know like that nowadays? I tell you I'd like to make a law that every family should spend two evenings a week together, getting acquainted with each other round a roaring open fire—"

"I thought it was time for King Charles' head to appear," Laura observed, wickedly, to the sugar-tongs.

The doctor rose. "That's right, scoff!" he cried. "You belong to the present generation. You're all alike. I tell you no economist has touched the root of the matter who leaves out the social value of the old-time fireplace. People had to get together or freeze. They had to get their corners rubbed off; they had to know each other's affairs and be interested in them—else they had an unpleasant time of it. They talked and read and worked and played together. That was living. They don't live any more—they only rush about. There, I'm going. I'm rushing like the rest."

His old friend's eyes followed him lovingly. He was a "crank," of course, but after all—

Thadeus C. Marsh.

Thadeus C. Marsh was born on a farm near Georgetown, Ohio, Eighth month 24, 1831. He was a birthright member of Friends, the son of William and Cynthia Ann Marsh.

When the call came for volunteers in 1861, he enlisted. After the war he began business in Cambridge, Ohio. In 1866 he united in marriage with Hannah Shaw, and three children came to bless their home.

In 1887 the family moved West and located in Tacoma, Wash.

Thadeus C. Marsh was among those who started a Friends meeting in Tacoma, and it was largely through his efforts that the work was carried to success. He gave not only much of his time, but also of his money to the work and, until his death, was a most devoted and faithful member.

He went to his reward Second month 19, 1911.

He was one of the leading members in preparing for Puget Sound Quarterly Meeting, which was held in Tacoma for the first time Fifth month, 1910.

Missionary Department

Banes Mission Station, Cuba

The workers at Banes felt impressed to begin the new year with a "week of prayer." Meetings were held every day at noon and at night, and a spirit of earnestness animated the members. Since then a deeper spiritual life has been evidenced and the members are taking an interest in the study of the Bible. The meetings, which had been small, are better attended and are often held in the manifest presence and power of the Spirit.

One man, who first became interested at the funeral of Ruperta Noris, in Twelfth month, has been attending all of the meetings since the first of the year whenever he could. He has a nice wife, who is also taking a deep interest in the Gospel, and a family of seven small children, of whom the larger ones are attending the Bible school. He has offered his home for several meetings, on which occasions he invites in his relatives and friends. Such meetings are great opportunities and remind one of the meeting in the home of Cornelius. This man and two young men have recently come into the candidates' class.

There is also another man who has been an object of special interest for many months. He has floundered in philosophy from rationalism to theosophy, seeking something on which he could rest, and has turned from each one in succession, disgusted with their emptiness, till he has become a man without hope, as he himself declares. As he has been attending the meetings, we have seen the struggle between doubt and faith depicted on his countenance. He is in darkness and wants light; tired, and is seeking rest; but has wandered in unbelief so long that he says it will be a great miracle if he ever finds relief.

The other evening he came to the mission home, and, after a conversation of about two hours, was willing to pray. We prayed for him; then he, of his own accord, prayed. It was a wonderful prayer—a full confession of his own helplessness and a willingness to let God lead him and a pleading with God to give him rest. Some expressions, as we remember them, were: "I am satiated with the things of this world. Tired I am, very tired of wandering. Oh, Lord, be Thou my guide; enlighten me; fill my imagination, which Thou hast given me, with one thought, and that of Thee." We feel it is a crisis in his life. He is well known as a public speaker on rationalism, socialism, etc., and said: "What will my friends say?" His temptations and struggles will be great. We are praying that his faith fail not. Will you not also pray?

We were favored with a visit from Carolena M. Wood and Anna Williams, members of the A. F. B. F. M., the first of Second month. Their presence and words of encouragement and counsel were a great help to the workers as well as to the native Christians. Samuel and Eva Haworth, Wilmington, Ohio, also visited this station the middle of Second month.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

On account of his wife's health, David Barton has returned to his former home in Montreal, Quebec.

David Tatum writes from Joplin, Mo., under date of 10th inst: "I am able to be up this morning, though very feeble. How lovely it would be to go home and be with my Lord and all the holy angels, and my beloved companion and daughter, who have gone on before."

South Eighth Street and East Main Street Meetings, Richmond, Ind., took action the 9th inst., on the proposition to consolidate the two meetings. In each meeting between 50 and 60 active members expressed themselves in favor of the consolidation, and between 80 and 90 in each felt that the two meetings could do more good to remain separate organizations, so no consolidation will be effected.

At its recent meeting in Greensboro, N. C., the Permanent Board of North Carolina Yearly Meeting arranged to build a yearly meeting-house at Guilford College, to be owned jointly by New Garden Monthly Meeting and North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

The yearly meeting, Eighth month last, referred the subject of changing the disciplinary provisions for the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight to the Permanent Board for decision, and it decided against the change and dismissed the subject.

On the 23d of Fourth month, 1856, John Henry Douglas and Miriam Carter were united in marriage in Grassy Run Meeting-House, Clinton County, Ohio. On the 23d of this month they will have been married fifty-five years, and no doubt their hosts of friends from Maine to California will help them celebrate the anniversary in a fitting way. Their useful lives have been an open book; and those who know them best know that theirs had been an ideal union, and that they richly deserve the prayers, good wishes and loving tribute of kind remembrance by all who know them and who appreciate the inspiration of their worthy example and valued service.

The annual meeting of the Friends University Board was held at Wichita, Kan., the 29th and 30th ult., with the following members present: James M. Davis, John G. Kirby, W. Q. Elliot, W. S. Hadley, Asa Kennedy, A. T. Jones, Nathan Brown, Alvin Coppock, John Newlin and Albert Cox.

There were several changes made in the faculty. Profs. Wheeler, Swain and Benton were granted leave of absence. Their places have not been filled, as yet, except that Maria Francisco was elected to take the place of Prof. Benton.

Steps were taken which will permit the University to meet the necessary six points this year and thus enter the list of standardized colleges of Kansas.

The board left the final arrangements in regard to a field agent in the hands of the local committee.

Probably no town in Indiana of 250 inhabitants has been so persistent in revival efforts as has the town of Keystone. Beginning on Christmas Day, the Friends held a meeting that lasted two weeks and a half, Mearl Wilson and Dewitt Foster assisting the pastor, Edward E. Hartley. Soon after the close of their efforts the Methodist Protestants began a meeting, which lasted three weeks and a half, then, after an intermission of a week, they began again, running another three weeks and a half. In less than a week after the Methodist Protestants closed their meeting the Friends began again, running two weeks and a half. In this last effort Edwin F. Tinney, Wilkinson, Ind., was greatly favored in preaching to the unsaved. During these two revival efforts in the Friends meeting-house there were 39 saved and 19 united with Friends. The Bible school is also prospering, reaching an attendance of 121 with great interest and good offerings.

On the 22d of Second month, Friends of Mount Pleasant, Ohio, held services commemorating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the dedication of their meeting-house. The exercises were held at the Ohio Yearly Meeting-House, which will celebrate its centenary in 1914, and were under the direction of a joint committee appointed by the mid-week meeting and the Christian Endeavor. The morning program was under the direction of Paul H. Wright, Emma C. Scott and Edith Patterson. The exercises of twenty-five years ago were reenacted. The meeting opened with the Doxology and the same Scripture, II Chron.:5-6 was read. Elizabeth M. Jenkins offered prayer. After a song, the pastor, Isaac L. Kinsey, read some letters from former pastors and spoke briefly on the early history of Friends in Mount Pleasant. Anna Jones and Cornelia Cattell sang a duet, and then Emma C. Scott read a paper on "The Last Twenty-five years." Esther Brooks and Dora Bayshore sang a duet and E. B. Jones spoke on "A Forward Look," after which the Bible school sang a selection. The closing consecration service was led by the pastor. A delightful luncheon and social hour was enjoyed. A thank-offering was made amounting to $130. In the afternoon, letters were read from absent members, a solo was sung by Mrs. Pearson, and the fact that it was the birthday of the Bible school superintendent, E. B. Jones, was suitably remembered.

Margaret A. Holme, a member of New York Monthly Meeting, who for a number of years has been doing missionary work at Luh Hoh, China, is now in America. She attended the recent session of her home monthly meeting and presented the following letter, which is quite unique:

To the Members of the Mother Church in America:

OUR VERY DEAR FRIENDS:—We thank God for his favor in that he chose Miss Margaret A. Holme to come to our country. She has now completed her second term of service among us. She has been doing the work of the Lord most diligently since her coming.

She preaches and teaches the people continually regardless of weariness. Many of the men and women of Luh Hoh are believing in Jesus Christ, and not a few are repenting of their sins, because of her faithfulness. She has carried on the Boys' Boarding School with courage, having many and serious difficulties to overcome.

It is wonderful how fast the time passes away, now it is nearly ten years since her return to us; and her second furlough is at hand. We feel we can hardly spare her, but it is God's will, so we cannot retain her among us any longer; we can only pray God to protect her continually, and give her a pleasant journey to her home.

We hope, too, that God will soon guide her back to China for the third time to help watch over the flock and gather in the lost sheep. We also pray that God may bless and inspire our Mother Church.

On behalf of the members of the Friends Church in Luh Hoh, China.

(Signed,) WEI RU LING,

Notes from letters of missionaries in Mexico: Mary B. Whinnery writes from Matehuala, Third month 23d, to Phariha Stephens, secretary Field Committee:

"We had an interesting temperance meeting last Sunday evening. It was prepared by the Temperance Committee of the Christian Endeavor. There was a poem by one of the girls, and papers by some of the teachers and others. Mr. Holding showed the effect of alcohol on the system by a series of pictures and the cooking of an egg in alcohol. An object lesson was given by one of the natives. There was a song by four young people, two boys singing first and offering the girls two small glasses of wine, which was colored water poured from a big bottle. The girls in their part threw the wine on the floor. There was other special music, and some 30 signed the temperance pledge. Mr. Holding has since given much literature to those who signed. The offering was better than on many occasions.

"We have 16 in the family now. I do not quite understand how they are always so good; they never quarrel, or, if they do, no one knows about it. They sometimes get into mischief. * * *

"Matehuala thought that the Revolutionists were going to come Saturday or Sunday, and many were badly frightened. It seems an idle boy was back of it, and he is in jail now.

"We are getting ready to celebrate Miss Lindley's birthday. It has come to be considered a special day in the school year.

"Mr. Holding is cleaning the organ in the church. We are preparing Easter music. The boys are working hard to learn their part. We have five who can sing nicely. One of the teachers can sing any part and loves music. I wish to aid all I can. With help, I put "Just for To-day" in Spanish, and Louisa will sing it some Sunday soon. There are so many interesting things to tell, but no more now."

Raymond S. Holding writes, Third month 6th: "The Ramo work moves on nicely. I trust we can some day make it a weekly paper, increase the subscription list considerably, and use a size larger type. We should like the same size as that used by THE AMERICAN FRIEND. Many people have an aversion to small type. I am one of them. Our annual meeting will be held at Matamoros April 12th to 16th. We at Matehuala have named Don Luciano as our delegate. We have also been encouraging Miss Whinnery to go, and she no doubt will. Everything moves on nicely. I have visited the schools in Cedral and La Pas recently. Self-support is taking hold of the people and we will have a better class of children."

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

In the copy of THE AMERICAN FRIEND which has just come to hand I see, to my surprise, that an article entitled "Sunday in Bournville, Cadbury Garden City," is attributed to me. (It appeared in the issue dated Third month 16, 1911, page 167.)

This is evidently an inadvertence, as I did not write the article, nor do I know who did. The article appeared in the Christian World of London and seems to have been written by someone who was not a Friend. It is well written, and, as far as I know, accurate on the whole, but it contains some statements which I should certainly have never penned.

I have been asked by the Friend concerned to take this opportunity of correcting certain statements which appeared in the article entitled "A Visit to the Grave of William Penn," on page 134 of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, dated Third month 2, 1911. Near the end of that article there appears this paragraph:

"Last spring a monthly meeting of London Friends undertook the establishment of a meeting in this place. They sent one of their number, a young and enthusiastic Friend, to take charge, act as organizer, preacher, superintendent of the place, and attend to visitors. Already there is a growing meeting and Bible school, which bids fair to become permanent."

Perhaps the best way to correct these sentences is to paraphrase them, amending such as need alteration and omitting inaccuracies. The paragraph then reads thus:

"For about a century no regular meeting for worship was held at Jordans, but throughout that period occasional meetings were held, especially on 'Yearly Meeting Sunday,' and, latterly, during the summer months. Last spring a number of Friends having gone to live in the neighborhood, it was decided to hold a meeting for worship after the manner of Friends every First-day morning. Luton and Leighton Monthly Meeting, in whose compass Jordans is, allowed the reopening of the place for public worship. Among others, a young and enthusiastic Friend, feeling a concern for the meeting, attends it regularly on his own concern and at his own expense. Already there is a growing meeting which bids fair to become permanent."

The "interesting old books and records" are kept in the safe custody of the monthly meeting or in the strong rooms at Devonshire House, London. Nothing of great value and easily removable is kept at such a lonely spot.

It seems probable that an unusual number of Americans will be in England during the coming summer, so I take this opportunity of saying that I shall be glad to advise any Friends who wish to visit Jordans or Penn's other meeting house, the "Blue Idol" at Worminghurst in Sussex, as to ways and means.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fourth month 24th. Cast overboard. Jonah 1:1-16.

Third-day. Jonah's prayer. Jonah 2:1-10.

Fourth-day. Repentance of Nineveh. Jonah 3:1-10.

Fifth-day. Why God spared Nineveh. Jonah 4:1-11.

Sixth-day. Men of Nineveh. Matt. 12:38-45.

Seventh-day. Jehovah reigneth. Ps. 96:1-13.

First-day. The great commission. Matt. 28:1-20.

Time.—Uncertain. A prophet, Jonah, lived in the reign of Jeroboam II, (804-763) and is mentioned in II Kings 14:25, and he is the chief character in the book of Jonah (Chap. 1:1), but he is not mentioned as the author. The whole atmosphere of the book is that of something long gone by, not of a contemporary author.

Place.—Nineveh the great capital of Assyria.

Parallel account.—None.

Probably no book of the Bible has been the subject of as much controversy as the book of Jonah. So much so, indeed, that too often the wonderful teaching of the book has been completely lost sight of. It has been held, that the book is in every respect historical; that it is wholly an allegory; that it is partly historical, and partly allegorical. All sorts of arguments for each of these positions have been skilfully brought forward, but it remains, certainly in some respects, one of the puzzling books of the Bible. "The book of Jonah," it has been said, "is, in some ways, the greatest of the old Testament: there is no other which so bravely claims the whole world for the love of God, or presents its noble lessons with so winning or subtle an art." It is this fact which makes it so appropriate for a "Foreign Missionary Lesson." The great and important feature of the book is not the miracles described which are generally first mentioned, though only incidents, but, "that God's purposes of grace are not limited to Israel alone, but that they are open to the heathen as well, if they only abandon their sinful courses, and, turn to Him in true penitence." There is no book in the Old Testament which so nearly approaches the spirit of Christianity in this respect.

There can be little doubt that, where-soever, or by whomsoever first written, the book as we have it dates from after the exile.

The whole of the book should be read. It should be noted that neither in the Hebrew nor in the English translation, in the Old Testament, is the word whale used. It comes from the New Testament, where the Greek word could as accurately be translated "great fish," or "sea-monster." See Amer. R. V. Matt. 12:40, Margin; Luke 11:30.

There are many lessons in this little book, but those which have been most dwelt upon: the reluctance of the prophet; why the judgment of God and the predictions of the prophets are not always fulfilled; the danger of not obeying at once the commands of God; these—while all valuable—are not the main lesson, as has been seen.

It is not needful to dwell on the graphic narrative of the earlier verses, but we may turn at once to the passage chosen for special study.

5, 6. "Believed God, and they proclaimed a fast." Believed so far as to repent. It does not mean were converted in the modern sense.

7, 8. The extension of the decree to the animals is truly oriental. Compare Joel 1:18.

9. "Who knoweth whether God will not turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?" R. V.

10. Another lesson is here taught: that penalties foretold may be averted by timely repentance—not all penalties, for God does not often, if ever, restore weakened powers—the result of evil living—but He will forgive and restore peace of soul to the penitent.

4:1. "It displeased Jonah exceedingly." Why? There have been several answers. Many think that it was because he thought his position as a prophet would be discredited; but it seems rather because he believed that the heathen should be destroyed, and he is angry because God shows forbearance to those who in his judgment did not deserve it. This was the typical Jewish attitude of mind toward the heathen.

2. He fled towards Tarshish because he foresaw what the result would be. That they would be forgiven if they repented. See Jonah 1:3. He could not bear this. Compare Ps. 86:3. Also compare the words of Elijah, I Kings 19:4.

4. Or, "Art thou very angry?"

5. "Booth." Made of branches like those at the Feast of Tabernacles. Probably there was little protection from the vertical sun as the leaves would soon wither.

6. "A gourd." This was probably what is known as the "bottle gourd," which grows with great rapidity and has large broad leaves. The word in the original occurs only in this verse.

7. The vine of the gourd family withers with great rapidity.

8. The analogy between Jonah and Elijah is very marked. "God prepared a sultry east wind." R. V. The "Sirocco," or "Simoon."

9. "A marvellously vivid presentation of a poor peevish nature, with its physical discomfort and its fierce religionism, its cherished hatred and its personal pique—equally miserable over the saved city and the withered gourd—little in its disappointments and base in its hopes."

10, 11. The moral lesson of the book—not stated in so many words, but implied. "Thou hadst pity on a gourd the creature of a night, and shall not I have mercy on men, women, and children." The argument from the less to the greater, so often used by Christ—"How much more!" "Six score thousand," 120,000 children. According to a common calculation—little children being one-tenth of the whole population—this would give a population of 1,200,000 for Nineveh. "Spare." "Have pity on." R. V.

The abrupt ending of the book is very impressive. Compare Ps. 145:9; I Cor. 9:9, 10.

"The book of Jonah is a remarkable and beautiful book full of large lessons of toleration, of pity, of the impossibility of flying from God, of the merciful deliverances of God, of man's little hatreds shamed into fatuity, dwarfed into insignificance by God's abounding tenderness."

Sam Lloyd, the well-known puzzle expert, whose problems have interested not alone the rising generation but others, died at his home in Brooklyn, N. Y., the 11th inst., seventy years of age.

For many years Lloyd had been famous throughout the country for his popular problems for the amusement of newspaper and magazine readers. In this calling he built up a fortune that has been estimated at more than $1,000,000.

Among the popular puzzles invented by Lloyd were the "donkey puzzle," "pigs in clover," "parchesi," "get off the earth" and numerous chess problems. He was born in Philadelphia, educated

COFFEE CONGESTION.

CAUSES A VARIETY OF ILLS.

A happy old lady in Wisconsin says: "During the time I was a coffee drinker I was subject to sick headaches, sometimes lasting two or three days, totally unfitting me for anything."

"To this affliction was added, some years ago, a trouble with my heart that was very painful, accompanied by a smothering sensation and faintness.

Dyspepsia, also, came to make life harder to bear. I took all sorts of patent medicines but none of them helped me for any length of time.

"The doctors frequently told me that coffee was not good for me; but without coffee I felt as if I had no breakfast. I finally decided about two years ago to abandon the use of coffee entirely, and as I had read a great deal about Postum I concluded to try that for a breakfast beverage.

"I liked the taste of it and was particularly pleased to notice that it did not 'come up' as coffee used to. The bad spells with my heart grew less and less frequent, and finally ceased altogether, and I have not had an attack of sick headache for more than a year. My digestion is good, too, and I am thankful that I am once more a healthy woman. I know my wonderful restoration to health came from quitting coffee and using Postum." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is this. Coffee has a direct action on the liver with some people, and causes partial congestion of that organ preventing the natural outlet of the secretions. Then may follow biliousness, sallow skin, headaches, constipation and finally a change of the blood corpuscles and nervous prostration.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Tom L. Johnson, twice Congressman from the 21st Ohio District, four times Mayor of Cleveland, champion of three-cent street car fare, and a prominent advocate of the Henry George "single tax theory," died the 10th inst., at his apartments in Cleveland, Ohio, aged fifty-seven years.

Johnson was a unique figure in financial and political circles in the Middle West. After attending public school, he began work as an errand boy and later became clerk in the office of the Louisville Street Railroad Company. He became a successful promoter in street railway enterprises in a number of cities. He was also successful as an inventor of several devices used in connection with the street car business. Through his inventions and ventures in business he became quite wealthy. As a politician he gained a national reputation, and his name has been mentioned as a possible candidate for President.

President Taft, acting under an act of the Congress, has invited all nations to send representatives to the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography, to be held in Washington, Ninth month 23-28th.

While President Taft is Honorary President of the Congress, the active President is Dr. Henry P. Walcott, of Boston, President of the Massachusetts State Board of Health.

The Governors of the several States are asked to appoint each a committee of five persons to co-operate with the Committee on Organization in preparing the exhibition which will be an important feature of the Congress. It will illustrate all the important phases of public health work, and the registration of vital statistics.

The Congress is divided into nine sections as follows:

Section I. Hygienic Microbiology and Parasitology.

Section II. Dietetic Hygiene. Hygienic Physiology.

Section III. Hygiene of Infancy and Childhood. School Hygiene.

Section IV. Industrial and Occupational Hygiene.

Section V. Control of Infectious Diseases.

Section VI. State and Municipal Hygiene.

Section VII. Hygiene of Traffic and Transportation.

Section VIII. Tropical, Military and Naval Hygiene.

Section IX. Demography.

WHERE IS TOMMY'S CAP?

He hunted through the library,
He looked behind the door,
He searched where baby keeps his toys
Upon the nursery floor.
He asked the cook and Mary,
He called mamma to look,
He even started sister up
To leave her story book.

He couldn't find it anywhere,
And knew some horrid tramp
Had walked in through the open gate
And stolen it, the scamp!
Perhaps the dog had taken it
And hidden it away,
Or else, perhaps, he chewed it up
And swallowed it, in play.

And then mamma came down the stairs,
And looked through the closet door,
And there it hung upon its peg
As it had hung before.
And Tommy's face grew rosy red,
Astonished was his face.
He couldn't find his cap—because 'Twas in its proper place.

Bible School Education Necessary

AS the twig is bent, so will the tree grow. Youth is the time to inculcate for lasting results moral and religious ideas. Our public school education, under the system which, with various denominations, we are obliged to adopt, is only secular teaching, with the teaching of morality in general. But that is not enough. There are those who feel as if it were dangerous to have education at all unless associated with religious education; but we in our country, under our system, have not found it practical to have public education associated with distinctly religious education. Therefore we feel, even more than in countries where that is possible, the necessity for Sunday Schools.

LESSONS FROM GREAT LIVES.

V. RUTH.

RUTH 1: 14-22.

(Consecration Meeting.)

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fifth month 1. Ruth the toiler. Ruth 2: 1-3.

Third-day. A humble faith. Ruth 2: 12.

Fourth-day. A kind daughter. Ruth 1: 8.

Fifth-day. A constant friend. Ruth 1: 16, 17.

Sixth-day. Dignified poverty. Ruth 1: 19-22.

Seventh-day. Christ's Gentile ancestor. Ruth 4: 13-17.

What does Ruth teach about how to treat the foreigner?

Tell of others who became great through affliction.

Tell of people that advanced, like Ruth, through service.

The books of Joshua and Judges are gory with human slaughter; the books of Samuel and Kings are black with human intrigue and passion; the book of Ruth, coming like a burst of sunshine through a dark cloud, shines with the beauty and warmth of a human love, cemented by a common sorrow, ennobled by a common service, and enriched by a worthy reward. A noble and beautiful story this to begin the history of that family, which numbered among its members a David and blossomed into a Jesus, the promised Messiah of Israel. The fruits of suffering, devotion, love and service are always divine.

* * *

The story of Ruth has always assumed an allegorical significance for the Christian. Her relinquishment of her early life tells us of the Christian's repudiation of selfishness and sin; her clinging to Naomi speaks in its charming way (Ruth 1: 15-18) of the Christian's allegiance to Christ; her sharing in Naomi's sad, solitary life, suggests identification with the Man of Sorrows in the loneliness of His soul; her interest in the new life about her stands for Christian service; and her marriage with Boaz is the story of the reward of Christian faithfulness.

* * *

This is the classic instance of a friendship between two women. What David and Jonathan, Damon and Pythias, are for men, that for women are Ruth and Naomi. And—strange contradiction to modern flippancy and magnificent in its rebuke—it is the passionate love of a girl for her mother-in-law. Mother-in-law and daughter-in-law have ceased to be, and we behold a pair of world-famous friends going arm in arm toward Bethlehem.

* * *

"By friendship I mean the greatest love, and the greatest usefulness, and the most open communication, and the noblest sufferings, and the most exemplary faithfulness, and the severest truth, and the heartiest counsel, and the greatest union of mind of which brave men and women are capable." Jeremy Taylor.

"Friendship—that select and sacred relation which is a kind of absolute, and which leaves the language of love suspicious, and common, so much is this purer, and nothing is so much divine."—Emerson.

Read Ruth 1: 16, 17; John 15: 12-15. The simplest yet most profound conception of religion is that which conceives of it as a divine friendship.

* * *

Ruth finds born within her a love that knows no home but the heart of Naomi. Houses, riches, furniture, upholstery, conveniences, art do not make homes. Love is the only home-maker, and builds its castle, and its palace in the heart of the loved one. Here no poverty ever knocks upon the door, and no blast of icy winter chills the bones, for love is rich and lavish in its outpouring, and the fire on the heart altar burns like the burning bush and still is not consumed.

* * *

Ruth and Naomi teach us that there need be no separation between advancing age and buoyant youth, between a saddened life and a happy spirit. Sorrow that isolates itself from life becomes morbid and sour; sorrow that identifies itself with the lives and interests of others becomes glorious in its unselfish consecration. Naomi could have ruined the life of Ruth, but instead she ennobled it by her sacrificial interest. When all her natural hopes had perished, Naomi lives over again in the life of her younger friend.

* * *

The courteous treatment Ruth received from the reapers and her acceptance by Boaz is an ancient illustration of the still older truth, that what we show to others as present in our own lives, we shall find in them. If your heart yearns for love, be loving; if for sympathy, be sympathetic. Be what you wish others to become.

"Be noble and the nobleness that lies
In other men, sleeping, but never dead,
Will rise in majesty to meet thine own."

A re-apportionment bill fixing the number of Representatives at 433 is now before Congress. This will make a very large House, but it is the smallest number which will leave the states having a declining population with as large a representation as they now have. The states with increased representation are as follows: New York leads with an increase of six; Pennsylvania is second with an increase of four; Oklahoma and California will add three each; while Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Texas and Washington will each send two more Representatives to Congress. Sixteen of the other states have an additional Representative.

To all intents and purposes the Missouri Pacific is again in possession of the Gould family, with a Gould president, a Gould directorate and with George Gould at the helm in his office of chairman of the board. The election of Benjamin F. Bush, of the Western Maryland—a road controlled by the Goulds and John D. Rockefeller—to head the Missouri Pacific was the final weight that drew down the scales toward the Gould side.

Speyer & Co. have been invited by George J. Gould to act as bankers for the company in the place of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., whose representatives have withdrawn from the board of directors.

We are accustomed to think of German universities as ancient institutions with origins dating back to the middle ages. We are somewhat surprised, therefore, at the announcement that a new university is to be opened in 1914 at Frankfort-on-the-Main. The general government will have no part in this project, the entire sum necessary, including an endowment of $2,875,000, having been raised by private subscription or contributed by the municipality. Neither Baden nor the Empire will contribute a cent, and the local founders announce as one of the attractions of the new institution that it will be "free from all crippling customs and traditions of long past ages." The backbone of the university is to be the numerous art and medical schools, the clinics, the chemical institute, the academy of social and commercial sciences, etc. There are to be special post-graduate courses for graduates already in practical life and special extension studies for non-graduates, even though they be well on in years.

Spiritual Preaching

One of our readers has asked to have an editorial on "Holy Ghost Preaching." He begins his letter by saying that a "studied sermon cannot be regarded as a Holy Ghost utterance," but he is in doubt as to just what does constitute such an "utterance."

The most that we can expect is that our ministers shall be sensitive to divine impressions, shall be in line with spiritual currents, shall be obedient to heavenly visions, shall be co-workers with the Holy Spirit. None of us—not even the most pure and perfect—can claim that he is an infallible oracle, that he passes on, untinted and uncolored, the perfect white radiance of the divine Word, that the words which fall from his lips are unalloyed "utterances" of the Holy Ghost. I have heard of a minister who was taken to task by the elders for having misquoted a passage of Scripture, and his triumphant answer was, "I gave it as it was given to me." But I should be inclined to think that the text would have been "given" differently if his memory had been better. So long as we remain finite and limited beings, bound up with bodies of flesh, dependent upon memory, influenced by ideas and feelings which we have acquired through education and subject to unconscious prejudices, we can hardly expect to be absolutely perfect transmitters of the will of the Holy Spirit, and it is very easy to detect a human element in all "utterances," however much the claim may be made that they were "given." I shall, therefore, assume that there will always be a human element, a human aspect, in any message that comes from a religious minister. Instead of asking from him "an utterance of the Holy Ghost," we shall rather ask for a spiritual message, which, while it has some marks of the human about it, shall still bear evidence of inspiration from above and shall actually be the product of a divine and a human co-operation. Now what shall we look for as the marks or the evidences of help from above in a sermon?

The first mark or evidence of divine help in preaching is the fact that the sermon carries conviction. What our correspondent calls a "studied sermon" does not do that. You feel, when you listen to a sermon of that type, that it is a mere collection of facts gathered out of books. They may be good facts, they may be true facts, but they only present you with information. The spiritual message, on the other hand, reaches the life, touches the heart and moves the will—in short, as I have said, it carries conviction. It makes the hearer dissatisfied with his present life and eager for a higher order of life. It does this because it is more than an array of facts; it is the utterance of a living experience of God's real presence and help, and comes with the weight of a true and strong personal life behind it. This does not by any means imply that the sermon has been "given" to the minister on the spot, or that it has cost him no previous effort. All good sermons do cost effort and spiritual travail, and the fact that a sermon comes suddenly, on the spur of the moment, is no evidence that it is from above. There are many kinds of things which come on the spur of the moment. The real evidence is found in the sense of reality within the soul of the speaker and its power of conviction upon the hearers.

Another good mark of the Spirit's co-operation in a sermon is its power to make the hearers see truth in new and fresh ways. Some sermons just drone on, giving, all the time, ideas that are true, but which leave you much as you were before. A real "Holy Ghost sermon" does not leave you where you were before. It illuminates. It reveals. As you listen, you see in some truth you have heard many times before a new meaning, a fresh light, as though a new sun had risen on your darkness. First its convicting power, and next its revealing power, are the marks in a sermon which make me think that it is not all of the man himself.

The transforming power of a sermon is still a stage higher and still a further mark of divine help in it. Nothing can transform life but Life itself, and the person who sees lives changing as a result of his messages may well be confident that the Spirit is in his words. When a message falls upon men's hearts like dew on the thirsty grass and makes them grow sweeter and gentler, more patient and more courageous, when it makes the evil in them grow weaker and raises the good in them to greater strength, when it turns their faces Godward and makes their lives more Christlike, that means that they have been hearing "Holy Ghost preaching."

Children, the Choicest Possession of the Church

That the choicest possession of the Church is its children, and its greatest opportunity the Bible school, is the thesis of an editorial by Levi Gregory in a recent number of The Pacific Friend. Having mentioned the material possessions of two wealthy churches in his home city, he continues:

The largest available assets of any church are the boys and girls and young men and young women—everyone of them priceless. I have long felt that we are not sufficiently alive on this great part of the Church work. We have not engaged in Bible school work with earnestness that the cause demands. Statistics show that 80 per cent. of the membership of the Church have come up through the Bible school. If in business we found that 80 per cent. of our profit came from a certain department, we would say at once, "We will develop and enlarge that department." We would read up on that line; perhaps visit cities, and put in the latest improvements and do special advertising. Why? Because we get the largest returns from this department. Our general government is doing great things in reclaiming the valuable lands in different States; by the great irrigation system being established, the barren places are made to blossom and yield abundantly. The government is also doing great service for the future by its forest reservation work. And we all say these are wise and proper efforts for present benefit and future good.

In the great work, we as Christians and churches are engaged in reservation that means vastly more than reclamation. After the embankments give way, there is a weak place in the old way, and all is lost. But in the boys and girls who have life and the possibilities before them, to save these lives for their highest purposes is certainly the God-given opportunity of the Church. With no Bible in our public schools, for many, a Bible school is the only chance for them to learn of the way of life and salvation. Here we are given one hour a week—if we are wise we may secure more—to mold and shape lives, which in turn will mold and shape other lives, and on and on for time and eternity. Have we had the vision? Can we grasp the magnitude of our opportunity? I really fear, as I think of it, we have only been playing, so to speak.

Precious souls are ours to instruct, ours to lead to Christ—boys and girls, just the material to make men and women—yes, grand men and grand women for the future Church. If we make His cause glorious, if we be wise and win them, not only is their future settled, but the hope of the Church is safe. I am rejoiced at the larger view of Bible school work that is pressing upon us. Once 'twas thought "just for women and children"; now it takes in all—men, women, boys and girls—not only all who can come to the school, but all to whom we may take it.

* * * * *

In conclusion, let us pray for a clear vision of this the greatest work left us by the master—greatest because all can work at it; greatest because it begins with the babe and lasts through life; greatest because it carries the Gospel to those about us who would not otherwise hear it.

The Graded Lessons

It is gratifying to find in every yearly meeting a number of schools using the "International Graded Lessons" in their primary and junior work. That these lessons have not been more universally adopted is not surprising, because it takes time to introduce new things, be they ever so promising. It was only a year ago last Tenth month that the first helps on the "Beginners," "Primary" and "Junior" courses appeared, and it is less than a year since those for "Intermediates" were issued; yet scores of schools are now using them. The larger and better organized schools were the first to take up the work, but it is by no means confined to them. A most encouraging report has been received from the mission school at Banes, Cuba. One of the special features of the Iowa Summer School for this year is a course preparing teachers to use the graded lessons.

That our readers may become more familiar with the new lessons and their use, we have planned to publish three or four contributions on various phases of the subject. This week, Wilbur K. Thomas, superintendent of Bible school work in New England Yearly Meeting, gives a brief statement of the plan and scope of the work.

Gaining Ground in Philadelphia

We wish to call attention to one item in the report of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting—the appropriation of $1,000 for work among the Doukhobors. Heretofore the missionary and philanthropic work of Philadelphia Friends has been done mainly by independent associations or individuals and not by the yearly meeting. While considering the Doukhobor work this year, there developed in the yearly meeting a conviction that it should be continued, although the funds which have been appropriated for the work are rapidly becoming exhausted. This brought the yearly meeting face to face with the issue—shall this responsibility be assumed, or shall it be left to others, presumably to individual Friends? That the yearly meeting rose to the occasion is significant. Corpora- tion response to the Pointing of Providence is a higher form of spiritual leading than mere individual faithfulness. It is a form of service which our age peculiarly demands, and we are glad to feel that Philadelphia is beginning to respond to it, although in this yearly meeting the emphasis has been placed almost entirely on individual leading.

Another encouraging fact appeared in connection with the minutes of the Representative Meeting. Statistics were given showing that the yearly meeting had gained in membership during the past year. The following is a summary:

Number of members Twelfth month 1, 1909, 4,380.

Gain by birth, 47; by certificate, 58; by application, 49; total, 154.

Loss by death, 80; by certificate, 57; by resignation, 10; by disownment, 1; total, 148.

Number of members Twelfth month 1, 1910, 4,386.

There was a time when Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was losing ground, but conditions are changing. In spite of the fact that deaths exceed births by 33, the net gain is 6, and the very small loss by "resignation" and "disownment" indicates a substantial membership.

Delaware County, Indiana, Under Prohibition

Our friend, Joseph A. Goddard, has made an examination of the public records in Delaware County, Ind., and of the city of Muncie, where he lives, with a view of ascertaining whether these records, in any particular, warrant the return of the saloon. Delaware County, under the late county local option law in Indiana, voted "dry" Fourth month, 1909, and the last saloon was closed the middle of Eleventh month following.

He finds that in Muncie, between Seventh month, 1909, and Third month, 1911, the building and loan companies had an increase of 3,046 members and a gain in deposits of $223,602. When he examined the criminal records of the county, he found that the arrests in 1910 were less than half the average for each of the preceding five years, and that the number of prisoners in the county jail had also fallen off more than 50 per cent. This decrease in the number of prisoners reduced the expenses of the county jail about $3,500, or 36 per cent. The "Children's Home" also showed a decline in its running expenses amounting to more than $2,650, or 30 per cent., while the circuit court saved about $2,750.

In making a study of the taxes, he finds that a return to license would increase rather than decrease the tax rate, for, while the saloons would probably augment the county revenue some $17,000, they would increase the criminal and pauper expenses of the county $21,000.

One of the stock arguments against prohibition is that a country that is "dry" is no better than a county that is "wet" because "blind tigers" supply, in an underhand and disreputable way, what well-regulated saloons should have the privilege of furnishing.

In this connection, a statement from a primary teacher in one of the Muncie public schools is very significant:

It used to be rather a common occurrence to have some child sob out a story of the father's drinking until no food nor fuel was in the house. Or else mother was drinking and did not get the child ready for school. We have not had one tale of this kind in the first three rooms this year. The percentage of attendance is higher this year in our first three rooms than ever before.

The Income Tax Amendment

The action of the New York Legislature favoring the income tax amendment has greatly encouraged the friends of the measure, and will doubtless have its effect on other Legislatures. To date, the amendment has been approved by 31 States, and only four more are needed to make it effective. Fourteen Legislatures are yet in session, and most of them are considering the matter. Louisiana, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and West Virginia have definitely rejected the amendment, and the lower house in Virginia has done likewise. The New Jersey Legislature adjourned before the measure passed its Senate. No action whatever has been taken in Vermont, Wyoming, Utah, Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Delaware. It is entirely possible that the required number of States will ratify it within the next few weeks. Should they fail to do so, a delay will be caused till next year, when some of the States with biennial meetings of their Legislatures will have an opportunity to vote on the question.

Keeping Cool About Mexico

While still feeling that Pres. Taft made a mistake in the spectacular movement of troops to the Mexican border, we wish to commend his calm and firm dealing with the developments of the past week. American citizens have been killed and wounded by Mexican bullets while going about their own business on their own territory, but the fatal shots were intended for insurgents. The lack of due precaution which affords just ground for grievance is being adjusted through the State Department. The matter could easily have been made an excuse for intervention, but the President showed his good sense by informing his jingo friends that it takes two to make a quarrel.

The general situation in Mexico, however, is not improving. The insurrectionist movement is increasing and causing no little alarm. One report has it that President Diaz is preparing to surrender the reins of government to Minister De La Barra, formerly Ambassador to the United States, who will issue a proclamation for a national election.

The International Graded Lessons

BY WILBUR K. THOMAS.

For many years almost all the Protestant churches have been using the "International Lessons" in their Sunday-schools. Notwithstanding all the bitterness engendered by doctrinal differences, they have studied the same course of lessons from the same book. It was stupendous as one considered that all over the world all Protestants, old and young, were studying the same portion of Scripture and following the same line of thought. Such a movement had its practical and likewise its sentimental side, but it was taken for granted that the teacher of the adult class would be able to bring forth meat for those who were able to bear it, and that the primary teacher from the same portion of Scripture would be able to deduce a goodly portion of milk for the little ones. The problems arising from such a course have given rise to the "Graded Lessons."

The title of the new work is somewhat confusing, for we immediately think that "graded" work implies the routine of the day school, strict separation according to ages or qualifications, and examinations. However, such is not the case. "Graded" here means grading of the subject-matter so that the child six years old will have what is suited for him, and the child fourteen years old will have what is suited for him. "Graded Lessons" are lessons planned to meet the spiritual needs of the pupil at each stage of his development. We recognize that such grading is a necessity in the day schools, while to this teaching, which is of far more importance to the life of the child, practically no attention has been given. Modern pedagogy has taught us the necessity of adapting the subject-matter to the one taught, and while in teaching the Bible the great lessons are the same for all ages of people, the difference in mental development demands different ways of presentation.

With this object in view, the International Committee, in preparing the lessons for the little tots four and five years old, have presented the great themes of the "Heavenly Father's Care" and "Love" in simple story form. The subjects of some of the lessons will illustrate the form of the story: "A Baby in a Basket-boat," "The Heavenly Father's Care for Birds and Animals," "Joseph's Coat of Many Colors," and "The Story of the Baby Jesus."

The primary course for the children of six, seven and eight years endeavors to teach the child more responsibility as it becomes better able to understand. Ways are presented by which a child can express love. Jesus is shown as the Saviour by His love and work, and this is followed by such stories "as will make a strong appeal to the child and arouse in him a desire to choose and do that which God requires of him." Some of the lessons for the first year will indicate the character of the work here: "The Baby Jesus in a Manger," "The Gift of Water," and "The Story of the Sheep that Was Lost."

In the junior grade, children of nine, ten, eleven and twelve, the aim is to awaken an interest in the Bible and a love for it; to deepen the impulse to choose and do the right. Here begins more particularly the effort to acquaint the child with the Bible and to memorize verses. The lessons still center around the story, but stress is laid in the teacher's book that the story for entertainment is valueless, "for unless they find something deeper and more lasting," they will soon lose interest. Here we have such stories as "The Beginnings," "The Patriarchs," "Moses," and the "Parables of Jesus."

In the intermediate grade, ages thirteen to sixteen, recognition is taken of the changing life of the child, and material and teaching are adapted to his needs. In the first year of work the heroic element is presented, and stress is laid upon the teacher to teach not history or story, but life and character.

The outline includes work for the senior grade, seventeen to twenty, and for the adult, twenty years and older, following the same course of development.

This, briefly, is the outline of the work so far completed in each grade and the general aim of all the work. The universal commendation which the work receives where it is tried is some indication of the success of the undertaking. It is intended that any school may use the lessons wholly or in part, so it is not necessary for a school to make a radical change in their work all at once. In New England Yearly Meeting quite a number of the schools are introducing the primary work, purposing to continue the graded work with the same pupils. A few are now putting it in the older classes of children. The greatest benefit is in having suitable subject-matter for the child, and this implies that the child will be more ready to receive the heavenly gift because he can understand better, and that it will make the way easier for the teacher to teach the great lessons of God and His love.

War Time Reminiscences

A Journey from North Carolina to Indiana.

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

(Concluded.)

A previous article left the North Carolina campers beside Clinch River, awaiting the return of Micajah Hill, Stephen White and Wm. Stanley, who had ridden northward to the Confederate outposts near Cumberland Gap to see if egress would be permitted through the lines in pursuit of the journey to Indiana.

At the end of the third day they arrived with an encouraging report. They had not secured access to the general commanding, but it was believed he would support the assurances given by subordinates at his outposts that they could pass, and they decided to go forward. Having ferried the swollen stream, the wagon train began the two days' climb of the grade to Cumberland Gap, and the third day found them over the mountain and on Kentucky soil, within the Confederate picket lines. The same messengers before sent sought General Zollicoffer's headquarters, two miles away. He received them cordially, but felt compelled to deny their request, as he was hourly expecting an attack from the Federals, and the passing of a train of emigrants would be dangerous to themselves and confusing to the military. The men returned with this disappointing information, and the situation was taken under advisement. A few hours later a flutter was caused in the camp by the arrival of horsemen, who were found to be General Zollicoffer and several of his aids. He had come to express his sympathy with them in their situation and assure them of protection so far as he could render it, but he adhered to his decision that they must not pass the lines.

As the only present alternative, the emigrants recrossed the mountains into Tennessee. The plan of Micajah Hill was to go to Lost Creek Friends neighborhood, near New Market, and await military developments. Others preferred immediately to seek some other outlet through the lines. After considerable discussion, the company again divided, Tilman Couch, Wm. Stanton and family and David Connor and family departing in search of a new route, while Micajah Hill, David W. Elliott and Stephen White and families, Maria Pope and son, Isaac Stanley and Marmaduke Lewis continued southward.

At one point a tumultuous vibrating sound disturbed the air, growing more distinct, until the vanguard of an advancing military force, with its rhythmic tread, was in view. It proved to be 1,000 recruits on the way to reinforce Gen. Zollicoffer, and the wagons had to halt two hours for the long line to pass.

At the end of seven days they arrived at Lost Creek neighborhood and secured quarters in some of the many deserted houses in the village known as Friends Station. Here they remained seven months, a period covering an unwritten page of touching interest in the Quaker annals of the South. The members of the once prosperous Friends meeting had largely gone, some to the North, others to points less liable to the mutations of war. Worshipers no longer gathered at the spacious log meeting-house, where Sarah J. Hill had preached on previous visits to this point, and the sheep of the neighborhood were finding nightly shelter from the autumn winds within its walls.

The prospect was not cheering, but this little band of wayfarers accepted the sojourn here as in the providence of God, Sarah J. Hill especially feeling that they would here find work for the Master, and her heart warmed toward the people of the neighborhood, stricken and discouraged under the surrounding tumult. Her husband shared this feeling, and, with his characteristic energy and promptness, had the disused meeting-house renovated and set in order, and circulated the word that there would be meeting the following First-day.

People came from far and near, and an audience that filled the house assembled in reverent quiet, SARAH J. HILL.

Micajah Hill and wife occupying places at the head of the meeting, in the men's and women's apartments, respectively. This unexpected reopening of services under most peculiar conditions, the pervading sense of dependence in the gathered company under the overhanging pall of war's unrest and uncertainty, with the benign faces at the head of a meeting largely made up of those not Friends, were features in a unique and impressive scene which is still held sacred in memory by those who have survived the changes of passing years. Sarah J. Hill invoked the divine blessing, and followed with a Gospel message suited to the occasion, imparting comfort and hope to needy souls amid the untoward surroundings. These meetings continued during their stay, and a mid-week meeting was held as well. The sessions of the monthly meeting were also resumed, but without any close adherence to formalities, as Margaret F. Hill served as one of the clerks, although her membership was still in North Carolina. Under the lead of a Friend by the name of Kelley, a Bible school was opened, in which the chief feature was the repeating of Scripture texts, as was usual in those days. A kodak reproduction of the juvenile portion of this school would now be an interesting study—boys and girls clad in homespun that was dyed in various colors and conforming to no standard of fit or style, reflecting the stress and scarcity that prevailed in those trying times; and these children used spelling-books as a necessary step toward learning to read and memorize Scripture texts, no secular schools being maintained in the neighborhood.

A number of armed Confederate soldiers entered the meeting one First-day, apparently with the intention of breaking it up, from the clatter they made with their canteens and other trappings. But, as if awed by the impressive silence, they took seats near the entrance and attentively listened to the sermon, some of them being visibly affected. Following this, soldiers came frequently, always behaving with decorum.

One liability constantly impending was that provisions, bedding or horses would be taken by soldiers for use in the army. One day the Hill household saw a squad of armed men thus despoiling their neighbors, whereupon they retired into their home and dropped the thin curtains, through which they could see what was transpiring. The men approached their premises, recklessly flourishing their swords as they passed the yard fence on the way to the barn, where they looked in upon the horses, and then quietly went away, as if restrained from any seizure by an unseen hand. The more remarkable was this as the Hills occupied the largest house in town, and their furnishings would have been quite a prize for the marauders in those days of scarcity. About a score of home-made woolen blankets, which the family prized highly, after this visitation were secured from view behind the stairway ceiling by removing and replacing the boards.

As spring approached, the war clouds deepened about the little band of sojourners. The possession of Cumberland Gap being contested in successive battles, the Federals were pushing into middle Tennessee, following the fall of Fort Donnelson, and the frequent cannonade sent echoes through the mountain vales about them. One day a defeated force fled through the village, when broken commissary wagons, frightened horses and struggling men rushed by in a bedlam of disorder which only a routed army presents. This was soon followed by a trainload of wounded, in dirty stock cars, on their way to Abbingdon.

But "God hath His way in the storm," and here interposed His providence. Gen. Brazelton, a veteran of the Mexican War, then resident at New Market, two miles away, although a pro-slavery man, had taken a kindly interest in the situation of these North Carolina Friends by attending the meetings at Lost Creek occasionally, and, taking the recommendation from Gov. Moorehead, North Carolina, held by Micajah Hill, went to Knoxville and laid their case before Gen. E. Kirby Smith, commanding the Confederate forces in East Tennessee. Gen. Smith consented to giving them a passport through the lines if the men of the company would come to him and make affirmation that they would not take up arms against the Confederacy, Gen. Brazelton having informed him that as Friends they could not take the oath. This they did the next day and received the passport.

And now, following an impressive farewell meeting in the old log meeting-house and an affectionate good-bye to the friends of their sojourn, from whom they parted with sincere regrets, they started, April 28, 1862, with a train of four wagons, John Wooten, Lost Creek, having joined them. The route taken was westward through middle Tennessee, instead of northward by Cumberland Gap, whence they came. Passing Knoxville, a few days' travel brought them to the main Confederate line, where their passport was honored. Thence northward through Kentucky, they saw many gruesome evidences of late hostilities. Near the crossing of Green River, a long succession of new-made graves was passed, where hasty burial in many cases did not entirely hide from view the bodies of the fallen. Danger also still lurked in their pathway betimes. They were one day overtaken by a band of bush-whackers, who halted them and went through their trunks and other baggage in search of arms, and started to rip open the feather-beds, but desisted on Sarah J. Hill's assurance that they would find no weapons. They seemed nonplussed to find such a train of travelers wholly unarmed, and disappeared without giving further trouble. Quite in contrast with this experience was the hospitality extended to them at a spacious Kentucky farmhouse, where the Hill family asked the privilege of lodgings for the night, the weather being inclement. They were received gladly and were given a bountiful supper, and then, though travel-stained, were placed to rest in immaculately white beds. When an elegant breakfast was added to all the other benefits, and payment was refused for their bestowal, Mother Hill asked the privilege of a little season of prayerful waiting with the family, which was cheerfully accorded. She read a selection from the Bible, devoutly thanked God for His care and goodness, and invoked blessings on those who had so kindly entertained strangers. It was with tender feelings that the wayfarers parted with their friends of a night, and they recall as a fragrant memory those restful, refreshing hours in this bower of peace on the line of war's waste and desolation.

A few days more of travel found them crossing the Ohio River at Louisville, and their sense of relief at having safely passed the danger zone and being privileged to stand upon the free soil of Indiana is still vividly recalled by the survivors. Shipment of the entire traveling outfit by rail to Columbus, Ind., shortened the journey, and the added travel of two days by roadway found the wagon train at the home of John Hill, brother of Micajah Hill. The sons of the latter, James and Daniel Hill, who had earlier left North Carolina, soon joined the company, and the goal of the long and perilous journey, which in its vicissitudes has few parallels on the same line of travel, was realized in this happy family reunion.

Micajah and Sarah J. Hill, continuing faithful to God, who had so signally guided and protected them, passed away at their home at Carthage, Ind., she in 1884, and he in 1894. The decease of David W. Elliott, also resident at Carthage, occurred only a little over a year ago. Tilman Couch now resides at Haviland, Kansas, and Marmaduke Lewis, who was a small boy in the Hill household at the time of the journey, has for many years been connected with the care of buildings and grounds at Earlham College. The whereabouts of others before mentioned who made this journey are not now known to the writer.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting

The yearly meeting of Friends of Philadelphia held its 230th session during the week ending Fourth month 22d. Not for a great many years has there been such a broad discussion of all phases of the yearly meeting's life, combined with such unity of feeling. The amount of response to business from the body of the meeting was conspicuous and the most encouraging feature of this session. There was little trace of a situation that in the past has not been unknown, when the gallery has tried to force or to block business matters in opposition to the united desires of the large majority of the meeting. This change in the spirit of the meeting was referred to by Jonathan E. Rhoads and also by Cyrus W. Harvey, Kansas, who compared the striking evidences of unity he saw with the very different situation that met him on his first visit to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting thirty years ago.

The clerk and his assistant, who continued in office from last year, were Charles S. Carter and Walter L. Moore, and these Friends were reappointed to this difficult service. The business of the week fell largely under three heads—the minutes of the Representative Meeting, formerly called the Meeting for Sufferings; the consideration of the state of meeting, covered by the answers to the queries; and the reports on educational matters and on the use of intoxicants. Perhaps the most striking thing of the whole week was the way the meeting rose to the situation presented by the committee having charge of the school among the Doukhobors at Petrofka, Saskatchewan, Canada. Not counting upon further interest and support of the yearly meeting, and the funds at their disposal being nearly exhausted, this committee recommended selling the schoolhouse and the two and one-half acres of land attached thereto and abandoning the work after a year or two should use up the income from this sale. The response was immediate and hearty. It was recognized that here was a piece of missionary work, started as a result of a religious concern of Joseph S. Elkinton, in which the yearly meeting could unite. While foreign missionary work is not acceptable to many members, this effort to educate these Russian immigrants seemed a most suitable undertaking that must draw upon the sympathies of all. The effect of twelve years' work there gave substantial grounds for encouragement. Consequently $1,000 was granted this committee, with directions not to sell any properties and to bring to the yearly meeting next year a statement of what would be needed hereafter annually to maintain this institution. It was hoped that Friends would feel drawn to personal giving for the school and not to allow the fact that the meeting as a whole was responsible for its support to deaden individual interest.

It was further learned from the report of the Representative Meeting that a letter had been written and presented to President Taft and to the members of Congress protesting against the proposed fortification of the zone of the Panama Canal. In connection with this matter a very lively concern arose in the women's meeting in regard to the dispatching of United States troops across the Mexican border. There was much evidence throughout the whole week that Friends were turning their minds to the condition of affairs about them and that their responsibilities to others were claiming a large part of their attention. The language of Scripture, that he that saveth his life shall lose it and he that loseth his life shall save it, seems to be more thoroughly realized than ever before. A clear instance of this was afforded in the concern expressed by Jonathan E. Rhoads about the position of Friends in Australia. Having visited that country many years ago in the company of Samuel Morris, he has since then kept in touch with the history of Friends there. Just recently, strict laws enforcing military training upon young men between the ages of fourteen and eighteen have been passed, thus severely testing their loyalty to their testimony against military service of all kinds. The meeting was brought to a lively feeling for these Friends, and a letter was written and directed to be forwarded to them, giving them our deep sympathy and encouragement. Still another example of this reaching beyond our own borders was the expression of interest that followed the announcement of a letter lying on the clerk's desk from a meeting of Chinese Friends. It is not the custom of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to read epistles addressed to it, and this custom was not departed from, but the meeting seemed to be much drawn out toward this small body of Chinese Quakers.

The reports on education included the work of our secondary schools, of Westtown Boarding School and of the Indian school at Tunesassa. It appears that a considerable number of our children attend public schools, although all such cases have been investigated and generally good reasons for this procedure have been found. However, it was pointed out that we must endeavor to make our own schools so attractive as to overcome this situation. The secondary schools educate 221 children who are not Friends and 81 Friends children. There are now more teachers desiring positions than there are positions to be filled, which is just the reverse of what has usually been the case in former years. The Westtown report contained an unusually interesting and frank discussion of the problems of that institution. As regards equipment, the school is in a flourishing condition, but a strong plea was made for increasing the attractions of the position of teacher at the school. Few young Friends now take up teaching as a life work, and Westtown has felt this situation keenly. The sum of $50,000 has recently been raised by the Old Scholars' Association, the income of which is to go toward increasing the teachers' salaries. On Fifth-day the Westtown report was read, and the treasurer's account showed a deficit of about $550. On Sixth-day the meeting was informed that a Friend had already paid to the committee a sum covering this amount. This is a very good indication of the interest which the school rouses throughout the yearly meeting.

Encouraging reports of the Indian school at Tunessassa were received. Since last year the school has passed through a very difficult period, owing to the necessary withdrawal of several valuable helpers. But these vacancies have now been satisfactorily filled. Indians who have formerly been pupils at the school are now returning to work among their own people. Especial interest was expressed in one young Indian who, at the suggestion of Zebedee Haines, left a very promising engineering position in Syracuse, N. Y., to join the staff of the school. Considerable testimony was given of the service this school is performing in educating and civilizing the Indians on the Allegheny Reservation.

Beside the regular business, several things occurred during the week indicating that Friends in Philadelphia are awake to the possibility of reasonable changes in their methods of conducting business. It so happened that none of these were found immediately acceptable, but the fact that they were broached is proof of a free and broader outlook. One of these was a lively discussion in the women's meeting on the question of the representation of women Friends on the Representative Meeting, or, in place of this, an independent Representative Meeting of women Friends might be appointed, corresponding to the men's committee. This concern was largely supported by the younger women, but to the gallery Friends the time did not yet seem ripe for such a radical step.

As a possible means of obtaining a larger attendance of men, it was suggested by George Abbott that we have one of the morning sessions meet on Third-day afternoon instead of in the morning. The Fifth-day afternoon session is generally the best attended of all. A business man can put in a fairly full day up to 2.30 P. M., while if he is away from his office from 10 A. M. to 1 P. M., he loses the chief part of his day. Of course, such a change would be convenient for city business men and inconvenient for those living in the country.

In the men's meeting it was suggested that the reading of the minutes from the quarterly meetings might be omitted. These minutes relate to matters of routine business only, whose transaction could be taken for granted, e. g., that the annual queries have been read and answered and that the quotas of the yearly meeting stock have been paid to the proper persons. In place of these a short report concerning the whole general subject was suggested as saving time. The question of the proper methods of carrying on our business is a very fitting one for consideration. The more routine business that can be omitted or referred to committees and briefly reported as satisfactorily performed, without giving useless details or reading a long series of minutes all alike, the more time can be given for a closer consideration of the business on hand or for fresh concerns that arise.

Of such concerns that arose this year, one of the most helpful was that of Esther Fowler to the men's meeting on Sixth-day morning. She pleaded that the testimonies, both chief and minor, of Friends might be upheld, not for their own sake, or for the love of being peculiar, but because they were the outward expression of those inner principles of life that the early Friends so bravely battled for. We need to search ourselves to see if what was required of our fathers be not required of us. The yearly meeting was fittingly closed by her message and by the feeling and response elicited by a memorial of Elizabeth C. Dunn. The living and the dead together witnessed to the power of the Quaker expression of the Christian faith. It was with a sense of having been in heavenly places that the yearly meeting adjourned.

Some Views on Present Day Topics

A Central Friends Publishing House

BY VINCENT D. NICHOLSON.

The agitation for a central publishing house, one that could assume charge of the entire field of our denominational literature, is growing rapidly among Friends in all the yearly meetings. Such agitation has assumed as yet but little of tangible expression, but if there exists such a need, the problem should be faced and solved. What are the facts? Does such a need exist? The argument seems to be about evenly divided, but just to introduce the matter, we will develop only the one side.

To properly get our bearings on the matter, let us first consider the basic question, "Why is denominational literature necessary?" the answer to which is found in the need of maintaining such denominations themselves. Our tremendous mission as a Church is becoming more and more profoundly impressed on the minds and hearts of all true Friends. Friends today have no less urgent a message for the world than they did in the days of George Fox,

Robert Barclay and William Penn. But not only is it our function as a denomination to develop certain particular phases of the great essential truths of Christianity, but in the denomination as an entity is found the basis for all the various lines of Church work. Of course, certain great social and religious reforms are necessarily carried on through interdenominational effort and organization. Such a tendency of centralization is natural and imperative. But such interdenominational work depends for its support upon denominational work. Its recruits are mustered and its support gathered from those trained in denominational ranks. It is the superstructure of which denominations are the foundation.

It is a matter of vital importance to maintain among members of a particular denomination any interest in and loyalty to that denomination as such. Important, first, because all the activities of a local meeting—the organization of the meeting, the work of the several committees, the acquiring and maintenance of church property have their genesis in and depend in large measure for their support upon loyalty to some particular denomination—not the loyalty bred of narrow-mindedness, but the loyalty subservient to a broader vision. Then the same principle operates in the broader fields. The missionary work, church extension, schools and colleges and religious literature depend almost entirely for their support, both in men and money, upon an interest in a particular denomination. No need of developing this point further. We all appreciate the necessity of maintaining among Friends an intelligent and comprehensive interest in the Church and its mission. In the accomplishment of this we have in general the problems of Church literature.

In detail the functions of such literature are many. One important service is to furnish leadership in thought. It is never safe for a religious body to drift aimlessly along. If it is to progress, some group of persons must supply ideals and mark out lines of advance. He is no leader who waits to discover the way the people want to go and then falls in line with them. The true leader must break the way, and no mediums are of greater service than the Church periodicals.

Then, again, there is no other practical way of keeping all parts of the Church in helpful touch with each other. The old itinerant ministers, going about from meeting to meeting, did this work in a crude way. With the passing away of this old system, it is now the function of the Church periodical to perform this service.

Another function of such literature is to arouse Church loyalty as well as to instruct members in the doctrine and discipline of Friends. Then, too, it is an educative and stimulative force. Local Friends are apt to grow discouraged when they see so little happening in their own community, but it is inspiring to read of the great lines of work being carried on in the broader fields. Narrow-mindedness and cramped vision are soon dispelled by a widely disseminated knowledge of the great lines of thought which are moving the age.

Lastly, but not least, it is the duty of Church literature to feed and stimulate the spiritual life of its members. This is accomplished through well-edited First-day school helps, devotional articles and a systematic and consecrated effort to meet all the needs of the Church in this field. These are the chief functions of Church literature.

Aside from the general facts which apply to any denomination, we as Friends have a very particular need of good literature. Small in numbers and scattered as we are, the unifying influence of widely-circulating periodicals is an imperative need. Friends have carried their doctrine of individualism in worship to extremes along all other lines, and have tended to emphasize points of difference rather than points of resemblance. We have lost sight of the fact that the group also holds an indispensable place in the march of Christianity and that it is through the group that our broader mission is to be worked out. The Church has lost more through its centrifugal tendency than through any other force. The first need is to become one body, united in Christ; to emphasize the fundamental essentials upon which we all agree; and, with all friction removed, the points of difference can gradually and charitably be straightened out. We must not starve our Church life nor the spiritual lives of the members with mere controversial discussion; it cannot thrive on that kind of food. Our periodicals can have a greater unifying influence than any other one force, but it is important that they first be completely dominated themselves by this spirit of unity.

(To be concluded.)

THE SINGING HEART.

I spoke to a traveler on the road
Who smiled beneath his leaden load,
"How play you such a blithesome part?"—
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

I questioned one whose path with pain
In the grim shadows long had lain,
"How face you thus life's thorny smart?"—
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

I cried to one whom adversity
Could not make bend the hardy knee,
"How such brave seeming? Tell the art!"—
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

Friend, blest be thou if thou canst say
Upon the inevitable way
Whereon we fare, sans guide or chart,—
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

Thank God for the man who is cheerful
In spite of life's troubles, I say;
Who sings of a bright tomorrow,
Because of the clouds of today.
His life is a beautiful sermon,
And this is the lesson to me—
Meet trials with smiles and they vanish;
Face cares with a song and they flee.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

The late Justus C. Strawbridge left $10,000 to Haverford College, and a like amount to Bryn Mawr. The bulk of the estate was left to the immediate family.

Among ministers in attendance at Sandwich Quarterly Meeting held at New Bedford, Mass., the 13th inst., were John Kittrell from Indiana, William Kirby from Ohio, Clarence E. Pickett, of Iowa, and from nearby quarterly meetings, Oscar G. Mostrom, of Rhode Island Quarterly Meeting, and Wilbur K. Thomas, from Boston.

A series of special meetings are in progress at East Whittier, Cal., conducted by Harley M. Moore, pastor in the Friends Church at Elmodena. Despite the busy season, the attendance is good and much interest is manifested. Plans have been submitted for the building of a manse at a cost of about $1,500. It is hoped that the building may be completed within the next two months.

* * *

At its recent meeting, the Permanent Board of North Carolina Yearly Meeting directed that aid be extended to the Blue Ridge Mission to help in restoring the main building there which was destroyed by fire recently. It also directed that a communication be sent to North Carolina Senators urging them to press the ratification of peace treaties with England and other nations as speedily as possible.

Friends at Winthrop Centre, Maine, held a special Easter service. The pastor, Arthur Jones, extended the right hand of fellowship to three young ladies and three members of the Junior Christian Endeavor Society, who were received into membership. The service was most impressive, and was followed by a strong sermon on "The Eternal Christ." "In the evening a large number gathered for a farewell meeting with the pastor. He left the next morning to take up pastoral work in Kansas City, Mo.

Sylvester Jones, missionary at Gibara, Cuba, writes: "We are just about to begin a week's special campaign with the object of getting our message more directly to the people. Next week we have two meetings each day in the meeting-house, besides meetings at other centers throughout the town. Am enclosing announcement, but you may not be able to decipher it at all.

"At our last Endeavor business meeting a committee was appointed to have charge of a campaign of a little different character, though not unrelated. It is proposed to circulate a pamphlet on the prevention and cure of tuberculosis. We have the translation of a most excellent work on the subject."

Special evangelistic meetings were held at Van Wert, Ohio, from Third month 26th to Fourth month 13th. Emma Coffin, Oskaloosa, Iowa, was the evangelist. On First-day, the 2d inst., a meeting for women was held in the afternoon, and, though it was snowing heavily, the attendance was good. On First-day, the 9th, a meeting for men resulted in six or eight taking a definite stand for Christ. Business men and others said it was the best meeting for men they ever attended. The same day a young lady was converted in her Bible school class. The house was well filled five times during the day, twice to overflowing. The revival resulted in the conversion of about 50, among whom were three men over seventy years of age and others over 50, besides several young men and Friends. Tennyson Lewis has served as pastor in this meeting for six years. After closing the meetings here Anna Coffin went to Carthage, Ind.

A letter from Joseph M. Purdie, in the recent number of The Friends Messenger, makes vivid the burning of the mission home at Mt. Airy, N. C., the 28th ult. It reads as follows: "This week has been one of the trying periods of life for us. Last Tuesday I was teaching in our school when some one cried out, 'fire!' I went out of the building only to find that our dwelling was so far gone that all we could do was to try to save some of the clothes and furniture. We saved some clothes and a good part of the mission furniture; but we lost two trunks in which we had a large part of our personal belongings. We have enough bed clothes for one bed, in winter. All our dried fruit and canned fruit were destroyed. We are left in quite a predicament as to what to do. We are thankful that no one was hurt, any more than cut hands and burnt fingers. Mrs. Purdie and the children are now about what one would expect after such excitement. I have closed school for this week, but hope to start up next Monday. How the fire started is a mystery to us."

In speaking of the new features which will appear at the Summer Assembly of Iowa Yearly Meeting, "Western Work" calls special attention to training for Bible school work. It says: Many of our Bible schools have already adopted the graded lessons and others are planning to do so in the near future. The primary and intermediate helps are already being used and the publishers announce advanced and adult helps will be ready in the near future. The grading of the Bible school is one of the greatest forward movements in Bible school work attempted in recent years. It is a part of that movement to place the Bible school on the same plane of efficiency as the day school.

But the key to the success of the whole movement lies in the teacher. Without properly qualified teachers the best system will be a failure. It is often the best teachers who realize most their need of preparation.

In order to meet this need special courses in Biblical subjects will be given in the summer school.

The old meeting-house at Salem, Ohio, has been repaired. In connection with the quarterly meeting, held there the 14th to 16th inst., a jubilee took place over the event. J. Walter Malone, principal of the Cleveland Bible Training School; Edward Mott, Evangelistic Superintendent of Ohio Yearly Meeting; John Pennington, and others, were in attendance. The following is from a local paper: "The Dry Street Friends have remodeled their church entirely throughout the interior. Finishing touches were completed Friday, and from an interior point of view this church now presents the aspect of a new building. This improvement is to a building that was erected in 1845. The records of the present branch of Friends called Gurneys dates from the year 1854. Previous to that time the Wilburs and present Gurneys were one body, worshipping jointly in the present Dry Street Friends Church. In 1854 a division of the society occurred. The Wilburs, as the new branch was called, moved into their house of worship on Sixth Street, and the Gurneys later purchased the Dry Street building. One member, George Fawcett, West Main Street, who was present at the first service in this women. So far 19 have applied for membership with church sixty-six years ago, will be present Sunday at the re-dedicatory exercises."

Wilhelmina B. Jones, whose obituary appears in this issue, was descended from generations of distinguished Quakers in Ireland, the Wakefields, the Richardsons, and the Bells. Her father was the first editor and publisher of the British Friend. She was well known in New England and Indiana, as well as in California.

Nellie B. Cyster, author of "The Chinese Quaker," writes of her: "One of the sweetest souls that ever dwelt in the form of woman has put on immortality. Of her it could truthfully be said:

"None knew her but to love her,
None named her but to praise."

"Exalted in her character, pure in her aspirations, with lofty ideals, with superior mental endowments, and a highly cultivated mind, she has lived for thirty years in San Jose, one of the most respected and beloved citizens. Her philanthropy was of the most active kind, as was shown by her interest in the Chinese around her, and her adoption and education of Tong Sing Kow, today a Mandarin of high rank in his native Shanghai, China. In the W. C. T. U. of San Jose she was an active and beloved charter member, her chosen department being that of Superintendent of Peace and Arbitration to which she brought all the resources of a life trained in the Quaker faith of non-resistance. In her social relations she was a star of the first magnitude, her beautiful 'Floral Home' always overflowing with good cheer and hospitality. She will be missed as we miss the sunshine, the blue sky and the tender flowers, and many hearts will ache for 'the touch of her vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still.' Beloved Wilhelmina, farewell."

The funeral was largely attended. The services were after the simple order of Friends. Joel Bean, Dr. A. T. Murray, of Stanford University; Elizabeth H. Shelley, and others, took part.

The third annual gathering of the Friends of the Connecticut Valley was no less successful than the other two. The interest manifested each year has been very gratifying to those who have planned the meetings. On Fourth month 3d, 31 people spent a delightful evening together in the home of Hannah H. and Ellen A. Winslow at 100 Monmouth Street, Springfield, Mass. In the very informal social part old friendships were renewed and new ones formed. In at least one case persons who had not met for years and knew nothing of each other's present life found great pleasure in recalling together incidents of their common childhood's home and mutual friends. Others who had been long separated from Friends appreciated much the privilege of once again mingling with those of kindred interests.

Seven different yearly meetings were represented, and one person present has since that evening been allowed to withdraw from the Methodist Conference to join Friends—Elihu Grant, one of the faculty of Smith College, Northampton, Mass. Those who know the last-named will warmly welcome him as a reliable addition to the Church with which he has long seemed so heartily in sympathy.

During the evening Alice W. Jones, principal of the Girls' Training Home at Ramallah, Palestine, now at home on furlough, gave an extremely interesting account of conditions in the Holy Land. She showed the great need of training the boys and girls for earnest, sincere, Christ-like lives, and by definite incidents proved the value of the work already done by Friends in Ramallah and vicinity. Much interest was shown by the many questions asked when opportunity was given. Her words were made very real by the presence of a former graduate, Emily Karam, now living in Springfield. Alice Jones had dressed her for the occasion in a native costume, and at the end of the address, in response to an urgent request, she repeated in Arabic the Lord's Prayer, and sang in Arabic to a native air the Shepherd Psalm.

At the close of the evening it was suggested that if any felt like doing so it would be pleasant to show appreciation of the work by sending at least enough to pay the tuition of a pupil in one of the day schools, which is five dollars a year. As a result eleven dollars will go from the Connecticut Valley Friends for the Ramallah work. Several expressed their gratitude for the privilege of thus showing their interest.

While most of those present were from Springfield, two came from East Northfield, 50 miles away, and two more from Northampton. Either by letter or personal message, regrets were received from 17 who were unable to be present. Wm. P. Hastings, who has been much interested in all the gatherings, sent a fine letter from his present home in Battle Creek, Mich., which was read during the evening.

Born

JONES.—At Valley Mills, Ind., Second month 20, 1911, to H. Orville and Jocelyn E. E. Jones, a son, Melville Winston.

Married

NICHOLSON-COFFIN.—At Wilmington, N. C., Third month 16, 1911, Rosa Coffin and Harry Gaines Nicholson. The bride has been known and much loved in many parts of North Carolina for her work as teacher and for her service as a church worker. She is a daughter of Stephen and Mary Coffin, Hamptonville, N. C., while the groom is a son of Dr. J. P. Nicholson, Greensboro, N. C. Their address is Hamptonville, N. C.

Died

BASTON.—At Minneapolis, Minn., Third month 3, 1911, Ethel Isabel, daughter of Alzin and Elizabeth Baston, aged two years and three months.

HODGIN.—At Newberg, Ore., Second month 5, 1911, Matilda Hodgins. The deceased was a member of Newberg Monthly Meeting.

MEADER.—At the home of her son, Bristol, Vt. Third month 28, 1911, Sarah B. Meader, in her ninety-first year. She was a life-long Friend, and at the time of her death a member of Ferrisburg Monthly Meeting.

MENDENHALL.—Near West Elkton, Ohio, Fourth month 3, 1911, Elizabeth Mendenhall, in her seventy-sixth year. She was a birthright Friend who lived a quiet, consistent, Christian life.

PEACOCK.—At her home near Darlington, Ind., Third month 17, 1911, Rachel Peacock, aged eighty-one years. She was an esteemed member and elder of Sugar River Monthly Meeting of Friends, a devoted Christian mother.

TAYLOR.—At West Elkton, Ohio, Fourth month 8, 1911, Lewis Taylor, in his eighty-seventh year. The deceased was a birthright Friend, who for fifteen years served as clerk of his monthly meeting; likewise as clerk of the quarterly meeting for about the same length of time. He was an elder for many years, which position he held at the time of his death.

SECOND QUARTER, LESSON VI.

FIFTH MONTH 7, 1911.

UZZIAH, KING OF JUDAH, HUMBLLED.

II CHRONICLES 26.

(For Special Study, Verses 8-21.)

GOLDEN TEXT.—Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall. Prov. 16: 18.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fifth month 1. Name spread abroad. II Chron. 26: 1-15.

Third-day. Humbled. II Chron. 26: 16-23.

Fourth-day. Nebuchadnezzar humbled. Dan. 4: 1-37.

Fifth-day. Belshazzar humbled. Dan. 5: 1-31.

Sixth-day. Sennacherib humbled. II Chron. 32: 1-23.

Seventh-day. Herod humbled. Acts 12: 1-23.

First-day. God resisteth the proud. I Pet. 5: 1-11.

Time.—The reign of Uzziah, King of Judah, 801-749, or 806-755 B. C. The incident described may have taken place about 760 B. C.

Place.—The temple in Jerusalem.

Kings.—Jeroboam II in Israel; Shalmanezzer III in Assyria.

Prophets.—Amos, Isaiah, Hosea, Zechariah (not the one after whom the book of Zechariah is named).

Parallel account.—In part, II Kings 14: 21, 22; 15: 1-5.

The reign of Uzziah (called Azariah in II Kings) was a long and successful one in many things. The king seems to have pursued a wise policy in his relations with other nations, and a skilful policy of development within. Uzziah was only sixteen when he came to the throne. Having been chosen by the people, it is hardly likely that he was the legal heir, though a member of the royal family. Successful as was Uzziah's reign in bringing about material prosperity for Judah, his policy brought about closer contact with the heathen world with all its dangers, and also introduced habits of luxury among the wealthier classes which changed the old-time simplicity, and introduced a disregard for the right from which Judah had been more free than Israel.

8. "The Ammonites." They are Semites, kindred to the Israelites, descended, according to tradition, from Lot. Their country was east of the Jordan, north of the Dead Sea. "Entering in of Egypt." Exactly the opposite direction from Ammon, thus showing the extent of his reputation.

9. "The corner gate." The exact position is unknown, but it probably was on the north. "Valley gate." Probably on the west of the city toward Jaffa (Joppa). Neh. 2: 13; 3: 13. "Turning of the wall." Possibly the northeast corner. Neh. 3: 19, 24.

10. "Desert," better, as in R. V., "wilderness," a place uninhabited; not sandy. "Digged." Better, "hewed out many cisterns." "Carmel." Not always a proper name, and from the connection it is evident that the word should be translated "the fruitful fields." R. V.

11. "By bands." The soldiers made raids on the neighboring tribes.

12. "The heads of fathers' houses, even the mighty men of valor." R. V. The landed proprietors and other well-to-do people. Compare II Kings 15: 20.

14. "Throughout." "Even for." R. V. "Habergeons." Coats of mail. Neh 4: 16.

15. "Engines." Machines or contrivances. "Bulwarks." Battlements. The above account is evidently given to show how prosperous Uzziah was, and how this same success caused his trouble.

16. "His heart was lifted up." A favorite Hebrew expression for pride. "So that he did corruptly, and he trespassed against the Lord his God." R. V. The Hebrew word for "trespass" means to deal presumptuously as with holy things. "To burn incense." This particularly sacred act belonged exclusively to the priests. Compare Exod. 30: 1-10, 34-38.

17. "Azariah, the priest." Called chief priest in verse 20. He cannot be identified with any one in the list of I Chron. 6: 4-15. It was a favorite name in priestly genealogies, and, indeed, is the name by which Uzziah himself is called in II Kings 14: 21. "Four score men." This showed that he was determined to assert his rights and duties.

18. "The priests the sons of Aaron." Compare chapter 13: 10, 11; Numb. 16: 40. "Neither shall it be for thy honor." A threat of disgrace and danger.

19. "Uzziah was wroth." It was natural that a strong character like him should resent such a rebuke and threat. The kings of Judah had considered they had a right over the temple services—as Joash, for instance—and who, he doubtless said in his heart, is Azariah to rebuke and threaten me. But he was to learn that "pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall." While he spoke angrily that dreaded disease, regarded as a special mark of God's displeasure, "broke forth in his forehead." R. V. Just as he was ready, standing by the altar of incense the scourge made its appearance. Compare II Kings 5: 25-27.

20. The stricken monarch was now ready to haste to go out from the altar. "The Lord had smitten him." Leprosy was regarded as a punishment for sin. II Kings 15: 5.

21. "Dwelt in a several house." "A separate house." Am. R. V. He was isolated, and possibly deposed. At any rate, his son Jotham was the actual ruler.

22. The reference does not mean our book of Isaiah, and whether Isaiah did write a book of Chronicles is not known.

23. He was not buried according to this account in the tombs of the kings lest their bodies should be defiled, but in a field adjoining the tombs. See, however, the statement in II Kings 15: 7, which differs. With present knowledge these statements are not easily harmonized. The lesson of Uzziah's reign as thus related is obvious.

RUTH AND NAOMI.

Two little Quaker maidens

Were playing by the fire:

Naomi's doll, made on a cob,

. She quaintly named "Desire."

Ruth, had a very worldly doll

Adorned with brightest red;

She shyly took one ribbon off

And tied it 'round her head.

Naomi, shocked at such an act

Named her, the worst she knew.

Saying, "I do not like thee now, Thou naughty Quaker you."

J. L. Spicer.

"Please, sir," said the office boy. "Well, what is it?" demanded the boss. "Please, sir, could I get off again today? We had to postpone grandma's funeral yesterday on account of the rain."—Detroit Free Press.

tures of a sacrilegious or immoral nature. The penalty for violation is a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both. At the time the bill was introduced, last January, the proposed presentation of Rosstand's drama, "La Samaritaine," by Sarah Bernhardt, was causing considerable discussion in Philadelphia, which was ended by Mayor Reyburn's refusal to prevent its production.

The resignation of David Jayne Hill, the American ambassador to Germany has been attributed by a few, to some unpleasantness between German and American Professors, but a more probable reason may be found in the protest which the kaiser made three years ago to Ambassador Hill's appointment on the ground that Dr. Hill was not rich enough to entertain on a sufficiently sumptuous scale. When the kaiser's objections, through somebody's blundering, became public, it was necessary, for many reasons, for his imperial majesty to receive Dr. Hill most cordially and for the doctor to stay in Berlin several years. Evidently the time has arrived when the doctor can retire from the German court with dignity unimpaired and the prestige of his government undiminished.

DAME NATURE'S HINTS.

WHEN THE FOOD IS NOT SUITED.

When Nature gives her signal that something is wrong it is generally with the food; the old Dame is always faithful and one should act at once.

To put off the change is to risk that which may be irreparable. An Arizona man says:

"For years I could not safely eat any breakfast. I tried all kinds of breakfast foods, but they were all soft, starchy messes, which gave me distressing headaches. I drank strong coffee, too, which appeared to benefit me at the time, but added to the headaches afterwards. Toast and coffee were no better, for I found the toast very constipating.

"A friend persuaded me to quit coffee and the starchy breakfast foods, and use Postum and Grape-Nuts instead. I shall never regret taking his advice.

"The change they have worked in me is wonderful. I now have no more of the distressing sensations in my stomach after eating, and I never have any headaches. I have gained 12 pounds in weight and feel better in every way. Grape-Nuts make a delicious as well as a nutritious dish, and I find that Postum is easily digested and never produces dyspepsia symptoms."

To Whom Does The Song Belong?

What! Pay for a song? Pay whom?
To whom does a song belong?
'Tis made from the sunshine and song of the birds,
'Tis made from the sweet, shy flowers,
'Tis made from the joy of a little child,
'Tis made from the night's long hours.

'Tis made from the sorrow that floods the soul
And leaves it alone and adrift,
Silent and aching and heeding not
The sun's breaking through the rift.

'Tis made from the sulphurous, choking despair
That tells us life is in vain,
'Tis made from the joy of a living trust
That leads us to effort again.

'Tis made from the lap of the ocean wave,
From the droning hum of the bees,
From the glinting flash of the little brook,
From the whispering summer breeze.

For the work of my hands, so weak, you can pay
With the coin of thy hand,—but my song—
The song of my soul—what coin has life
To pay for a life and a song?
And to whom does the song belong?

—Eleanor Scott Sharpless.

Sixth-day. Unwritten pledges. Luke 16:13.

Seventh-day. Living the pledge. Psalms 56:11-13.

Quote Scripture passages about vows.

Tell of some who refused to pledge themselves to Christ.

What helps you most in the Christian Endeavor pledge?

The Christian Endeavor pledge is the most wholesome and profitable obligation for the maintenance of the young Christian's life that has ever been presented to the young people of the world. To keep it in spirit and in letter is to make sure of Christian growth into the likeness of Christ. These vows of the pledge call for trust, for active service for Christ, for prayer and Bible study, for allegiance to the Church and for faithfulness in that divine obligation and privilege of self-expression for Christ. If this is kept, no lights will be hid under bushels, no slip or fall will remain unrecovered and unforgiven, no cloud will continually obscure the light of Christ's face, no activity will hinder the soul from growing through the want of exercise. The obligation of the pledge is a wholesome tonic for souls that in the drag and drain of real life are subject to materialistic anaemia.

* * *

A pledge is the verbal recognition of a standard of life or activity. There are standards of education which every school teacher is obliged to maintain, standards of rank above which every pupil must keep, standards of business which every successful storekeeper holds continually before him, standards of morality which every community supports a court to maintain. Why should we hesitate to set a standard of Christian life and spiritual experience, and to bend every energy of body, mind and soul to keep it? Man's religion is inclined to be aimless, and therefore spineless. Some kind of a pledge or vow or covenant or promise (the terms are fundamentally synonymous) gives purpose to his spiritual aspirations and thereby links his religion to his life, his heart's deepest feeling with his feet's daily motion. Religion thus becomes a thing of practice as well as a hazy notion about being good.

* * *

A pledge or covenant or vow is a hitching-post. Tie yourself to a worthy one (Emerson said: "Hitch your wagon to a star"), and you will find yourself in the richest field of clover imaginable. The witch-grass of sin, the thistles of discontent and the plantain leaves of a sordid life are all beyond your reach. The halter, rope and post keep a cow tied to her feeding field and away from the roadside and the forbidden fields of other people. Rarely do you find a Christian who will not wander if he is not tied to some definite and specific Christlike obligations. Hitching-post here means obligation. As a Christian, what is yours?

* * *

A young Christian recently told the writer that he was not going to join the Church until he had brought his life up to the standard on which he believed a Christian ought to live. He was wrong, and wrong for this reason: He thought he would lift himself, as it were, hand over hand up a rope to the standard of the Church, whereas he should know that uniting with the Church is like placing a mighty hand at the upper end of the rope; then rope and young Christian are brought up to the true standard. The disciple must learn to cling, and let Christ and the Church lift him. He can never lift himself. The difference between staying outside the Church of Christ until you reach the Christlike standard of living, and joining the Church that you may thereby be helped to live out your ideal, is the difference between the struggle a man makes to lift himself by his own bootstraps and the ease with which a strong hand and a mighty arm lift a fallen man to his feet and stay with and around him until his strength is assured. Have you joined the Church? If not, why? You need the Church to help you get on your feet and then keep them.

* * *

A vow taken under undue pressure or excitement or as the superficial whim of a moment is in danger of becoming a boomerang which, on its return, strikes the foundations of the life and lowers every sense of moral obligation. Make your pledge; let it express the feelings of your heart and the purpose of your life, and it becomes the polar star of all your career.

* * *

It makes little difference how much wood I burn, but what I do when I get warm. It makes little difference how many pledges I make, but how my life expresses the spirit of those pledges when they have been made.

"The highest compact we can make with our fellows is: Let there be truth between us two forevermore."—Emerson.

* * *

"Oh, human soul! as long as thou canst so

Set up a mark of everlasting light,
Above the howling senses' ebb and flow.
To cheer thee, and to right thee if thou roam—

Not with lost toil thou laborest through the night!
Thou mak'st the heaven thou hoped indeed thy home."

—Matthew Arnold.

* * *

"I cannot do it" never accomplished anything; "I will try" has wrought wonders.

* * *

The most sacred human pledge is the marriage vow. It is, after all, only the outward expression of an inward love. The more two people love each other, the more eager they are to take this holy pledge.

News in Brief

Plans have been completed for the erection of a building at Broadway and Park Place, New York, which is to be 55 stories high. When completed, this will be the highest building in the world. From the curb to the apex of the tower, it will stand 750 feet. There will be 30 stories in the main building and an additional 25 in the tower.

A discovery in the fundamentals of electrical science, augmenting previous discoveries, has just been announced by Dr. Robert A. Millikan, associate professor of physics in the University of Chicago. By this discovery, it is said, Prof. Millikan gives complete proof of the correctness of the atomic theory of electricity and a satisfactory demonstration of the perpetual dance of the molecules of matter.

* * *

The brilliant record of the New Jersey Legislature, under the inspiring and masterful leadership of Gov. Woodrow Wilson, is complete. It embraces four great measures—enacted into law—the Geran elections bill, a stringent corrupt practices bill, a public utilities bill and a bill providing for a commission form of government in municipalities. Not the least striking aspect of the situation in the New Jersey Legislature is that the Republican Senate has supported the Governor scarcely less cordially than the Democratic House, and that is an achievement in bi-partisan leadership that comes very close to genius.

* * *

Dr. Orville Owen and the Duke of Beaufort are searching in the bed of the River Wye for a cache which they believe is buried there, containing papers that will prove that Lord Bacon was the author of Shakespeare's plays. Their sounding has resulted in the discovery of a wooden block which is so imbedded in the mud that it will require several weeks before it can be uncovered. Skeptics believe it to be the buttress of an old Roman bridge, but Dr. Owen and his friends say that its location has been determined by a series of new Bacon ciphers which they have recently obtained, and that it is probably the cache for which they are searching.

Mistaking the Map for the Country

I have heard of a boy in a geography class who was asked by his teacher to give a description of Canada. His answer was that all he could remember was that it was very pink! His trouble was that he mistook the map for the country. He thought that the map of Canada was Canada, and that, therefore, he had described it when he had said that it was very pink.

How many persons, grown-up persons, too, have made a similar mistake in still more important matters than geography. In religious matters, how often the map is taken for the reality itself, or, to put it another way, how often phrases are substituted for experiences. It is perfectly easy to construct a system of theology out of texts and out of ancient phrases, and to assert that here in this system is expressed the final word of truth forever.

All that, I say, is easy, until somebody a little more serious and a little more inquisitive comes along and asks what it all means in terms of life and experience; and then you wake up to discover that your dealer in texts and phrases has been mistaking the map for the country, and he has no more described reality than the boy had described Canada when he said that it was very pink.

The trouble with "phrases" is that they allow you to suppose that you know something when you really have not thought it out, have not grasped and apprehended it, and are merely using a word instead of seeing a truth. We all know ministers who could not preach at all if they lost their stock of phrases. These smooth, easy-running phrases save them all necessity of going down deeper into living experience, until the truth becomes a genuine throbbing part of their life, so that they can tell it in the simple, commonplace language of everyday life, and can thus make it vital even to little children. I have personally always had a horror of stock phrases. I dread the mere possibility of putting the map in place of the country, of substituting a system for an experience. The result is, as my readers all know, that if I am to deal with some great central truth, the first thing I do is to put it into fresh, everyday language. I take it out of its scholastic setting and its time-honored words and tell it, as I have found it, in the language of experience. I do this not because I am perverse, not because I want to say something new and startling, but because I do not want to slide along on the smooth grooves of a phrase and I do not want my readers to do it either. I am trying as far as I can to produce a sense of reality. For example, when I wanted recently to make my readers see the power of the Cross and the reality of vicarious suffering, instead of repeating well-worn phrases, I pointed out that "life is blood-red with suffering for others," and I said, as illustration:

There almost never was a good mother who has not some time suffered over the foolishness or wrong-doing of her child, and there almost never was a true father who did not have his moments of fear and sorrow over some beloved child floundering about in the green and unformed period of youth. If the child actually becomes wayward and stubbornly sinful, then the parents pass through as bitter sorrow and grief as it is possible to know. It is one that sins, but many that suffer, and the persistent love of father and mother, the love that will not let go, the love that endures and suffers and pursues, is, more often than any other influence, the one which works the change in the misguided youth. There is no one of my readers who cannot remember, with me, with a swelling of emotion in the throat, how the love and patience of some good soul reached him when he was on the perilous edge and drew him to a safer course in life. But we never know, we never can know, how much suffering we have cost those who love us—a suffering which is clearly vicarious.

The Cross, then, is no irrational method of redeeming men from sin. Christ took a world-old method and glorified it forever. The love that loves everlastingly and that ceaselessly pursues the wanderer, even at the cost of deepest agony of suffering, is like the love we know, only here we see it as the very heart of our infinite Father, and we discover that the highest and divinest way of redemption is the simple, familiar way which we learned as children in our father's house and by our mother's knee.

Now, there will always be some persons who will insist on the use of the proper phrases, who will call everything else unitarianism and who will contend that the profound truths of redemption cannot be told in the language of life and experience.

To this I should quietly answer that the Saviour of men is my shining Guide. He refused to use the legal phrases of His people's religion. He kept as far away as He could from the technical language which the Scribes had coined, and He told the most transcendent truths in the simple language of daily life—the language which the little child can follow. The Kingdom of Heaven is like yeast, like mustard seed, like children playing in the street, like maidens going to a wedding, like fishermen sorting their fish from the nets. You may understand the nature of God by seeing how He cares for sparrows. You may realize His seeking, redeeming love by watching a shepherd find his sheep, a woman search for a coin, a father meeting his lost son. "No man ever spoke that way before," was the amazed comment.

With Him you never have the map given for the country, a phrase substituted for a truth. I am only trying to follow this method. I am quite willing to have the theologians blame me and call me names. I am not writing for them. I am writing for those who are teachable, for those who wish to see, for the children and those who have the childlike mind, for those who care more for life itself than they do for the ancient phrase.

Book of Meetings

The second edition of the Philadelphia "Book of Meetings" is the most complete work of its kind that has come to our notice. Information such as the following is given concerning each local meeting:

BURLINGTON, NEW JERSEY.

Held on First and Fifth-days at 10.30 o'clock; on monthly and quarterly meeting days at 10.

Burlington is on the Amboy Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, 18 miles from Camden. Take Market Street ferry. Two trolleys also run from Camden; time, nearly two hours. In summer there is boat service from Chestnut Street wharf, Philadelphia. Burlington can also be reached by ferry from Bristol, Pa., in good weather.

The old meeting-house is in the town, about one minute from the station.

Usual attendance on First-days, about 15.

There is vocal service from the members, but no resident minister.

Burlington meeting is said to have been held in tents as early as 1677, being thus, with Salem, N. J., probably the earliest meeting of the Middle States. The "Six Square" house, 1682, in which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was first held, was followed by the "Great House" in 1696. The present house dates from 1784 or 1785.

The historical paragraph is a new feature which adds greatly to the general interest of the work. A brief discussion on "How to Help Our Meetings" is another valuable contribution. The work follows the former edition in giving (a) a statistical table of membership; (b) a list of particular meetings, with information as above indicated; (c) a list of other meetings not officially connected with the yearly meeting; (d) a list of closed meeting-houses, giving location, condition of property, Friends in the vicinity, etc.; (e) time and place of holding the yearly, quarterly and monthly meetings; (f) a table showing time and place of quarterly, monthly and particular meetings; and (g) a map of the yearly meeting.

The book is especially designed for the use and encouragement of those who feel called to visit and labor among the several meetings; and there are not a few in this class. It is this stirring of life that is responsible in a measure for the hopeful outlook which prevails.

Fixing Responsibility for Dynamiting

During the last two years there has been a series of dynamite explosions which have wrecked thousands of dollars' worth of property, and in one instance—that of the Times Building, Los Angeles—a number of persons were killed. These disasters have occurred in various parts of the country, but always in connection with the property or work of contractors employing non-union men. Their frequency caused alarm, and the National Erectors' Association employed William J. Burns, a former Government detective, to investigate the trouble. He has caused the arrest of John J. McNamara, secretary-treasurer of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, at the headquarters of the association in Indianapolis, together with his brother, James B. McNamara, also of Indianapolis.

The dynamiting with which they are charged took place in Los Angeles, so that requisition papers signed by the Governors of California and Indiana were in possession of the officers when they made the arrests. The fact, however, that the McNamaras were hurriedly taken from Indianapolis and dispatched to California without a preliminary hearing has been made the ground of a counter-charge, and Detective Burns, the consulting attorneys in the case and the chauffeur of the taxicab that carried J. J. McNamara out of Indianapolis have been arrested for kidnapping. Prior to the arrest of the McNamaras, an accomplice, Ortie E. McManigal, was apprehended in Detroit, and it was his confession that led to the later arrests and to the finding of dynamite stores, one of which was secreted in the basement of the headquarters of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers. All three men are now imprisoned at Los Angeles, awaiting trial, while their accusers are out on bail, pending a hearing in Indianapolis. Meantime the grand jury of Marion County, Ind., is preparing to make an extended inquiry covering the entire situation.

Detective Burns believes he has succeeded in capturing the chief conspirators in an extended plot to wreck the work of those employers who refuse to submit to the demands of labor unions. On the other hand, many union men assert, with Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, that the whole affair is a scheme to bring unionism into disfavor, and that the taking of the prisoners to California is an "outrageous piece of legalized kidnapping." A more sane position, however, is taken by John Mitchell, who, while professing to believe in the innocence of the McNamaras, points to the fact that no union should be held responsible for what an official does secretly and without official sanction. He deprecates the destruction of property, declaring that if the success of unionism depended upon such measures, he would be the first to sever his connection with it.

Workmen's Compensation Law in New Jersey

The significance of the New Jersey Workmen's Compensation Act becomes apparent when it is contrasted with the Employers' Liability Law, which it repeals. Under the old law it was necessary for an injured employe, or his family, to establish in court the fact that his accident was due to his employer's negligence. After such a trial, it was left to the jury to decide whether the employer was liable for damages and to what extent. This system forced the workman or his family to risk the cost of a long and doubtful lawsuit at the very time when the ordinary burdens of life were made heavier by the accident. The new law, on the other hand, provides a fixed compensation for every accident not due to the drunkenness or wilful neglect of the working man himself; thus, for the loss of a hand, he will receive 50 per cent. of daily wages during a hundred and fifty weeks; for the loss of an arm, 50 per cent. of daily wages for two hundred weeks, and so on, through a long list of casualties. In certain instances the facts in the case will have to be determined by legal process, but usually this will be unnecessary. The Workmen's Compensation Law is calculated to make the employer pay for the cost of accidents to workmen just as he pays for accidents to his machinery and to charge such accidents to the cost of production. A law similar to this one has just been declared unconstitutional by the New York Court of Appeals on the ground that it deprives employers of property without due process of law. The New Jersey statute attempts to avoid this objection by making the system of compensation optional, but it is so arranged that the employer will find it very disadvantageous to choose anything else.

A Remarkable Legislative Record

Not only has the New Jersey Legislature passed an employers' liability act that deserves special attention, but, thanks to Governor Wilson, it has carried out a legislative program that is truly remarkable. One measure fixes the primary as a feature of Jersey politics and amends the election law in the interest of honesty and popular control. A second is a corrupt practices act, modeled upon the English law, which forbids even the offering of a drink by a candidate or anyone in his behalf. Under these laws the people of New Jersey can have perfectly fair elections, if they are willing to take the pains to enforce them. A third is a public utilities act giving the commission power to supervise and fix rates. Bills to allow the establishment of the commission form of government in cities and to limit the time of food kept in cold storage to ten months are further samples of work accomplished by a Legislature in which one house was controlled by the Republican and the other by the Democratic party. Governor Wilson has taken in public attention the place held by Governor Hughes, and his success goes to show that the leader in good government may belong to one party as well as the other.

On The Way to Peace in Mexico

Since our last writing, the situation in Mexico has been more hopeful. The insurrectionists under Francisco I. Madero have ceased hostilities and are negotiating for peace. This does not mean that all the disaffected elements are quiet, for there continues to be considerable disturbance in the southern provinces. The fact, however, that the leaders of the more formidable forces along the United States frontier manifest a disposition to listen to reasonable concessions has created a feeling of growing optimism in official circles.

No Fire-alarms in the Capitol

It has just been learned that the laxity which resulted in the destruction of the New York Capitol has long been paralleled at Washington. The astonishing situation was discovered last week, when Fire Chief Wagner sent word that the alarm boxes would be out of use for a few hours, and asked the Capitol officials to use the telephone in case of emergency. He was informed that the building had no such boxes. His records showed that they had been furnished fifteen years ago. An investigation revealed the fact that they had never been installed.

How a Boy Lost His Home, Became Great, and was Thrown into a Lions' Den

BY RUFUS M. JONES.

There was once a noble boy, with a fine, dark face, beautiful eyes and beautiful hair, who lived in a splendid home in the city of Jerusalem, and his name was Daniel. He loved his city almost more than he loved his own life, and on the great feast days he would march in line with the other boys of the city and they would sing the fine old songs that told how beautiful Jerusalem was and how happy its people were, and then some old man, with white, flowing hair, would tell them stories about the heroes who had lived and died to make Jerusalem safe on its holy hill and to make its people true and good. Little Daniel, as he listened, could feel his heart throb, and he would say to himself: "When I grow up I will be a hero, too, and I will show how much I love Jerusalem."

But one sad and dreadful day the great king of Babylon, with a mighty army, came marching up to Jerusalem. The valleys were filled with soldiers. All the gates of the city were shut and the people tried very hard to save the city, but after a while the soldiers outside began to break the wall down and to come streaming in. Then they set fire to the houses, and Daniel saw his own house burn up, and then he saw the beautiful temple burn, and before long he saw the city which he loved so much entirely broken down, burned up and destroyed. The cruel soldiers took him and many of the other boys who used to march and sing on the great feast days and carried them, with their fathers and mothers, far away to Babylon. They had no city now; they had no home of their own; but Daniel bore it all like a hero and kept in his soul a bright image of the city where he had lived and played. After a time the king of Babylon saw Daniel, who looked so noble and good that the king took him, with some of his best young friends, to live in the palace and to be educated there. It was a beautiful place. Everything was grand and dazzling. There were all the good things in the world to eat and the most splendid clothes to wear. But Daniel was afraid that all these grand and dazzling things might make him forget his old city and his own people and the God he loved, and so he wore in the palace the same clothes he used to wear at home, and he ate only the purest and simplest food on the table, and he would not drink any wine; and all his young friends did the same. But when they came before the king, they looked in such fine and splendid health, their faces were so full and fair, their eyes were so bright and clear and their minds were so wise and strong that the king thought that they were the wisest and strongest and best young persons in all his kingdom.

Once when the king had dreamed a strange dream that frightened him, and nobody in Babylon could tell him what the dream meant, Daniel was brought in before the king and he told him what it meant.

Another time when the new king, Belshazzar, was having a great feast, with a thousand princes at the table, the fingers of a hand came and wrote on the wall before their eyes the words, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin." The king was so frightened that his knees knocked together and his face became as white as snow. There was nobody who could tell what the words meant, until Daniel was brought in. When he came, God told him in his heart that the strange words meant that Belshazzar's kingdom was to come to an end and he was to lose it. This made the king very sad indeed, but he put a gold chain about Daniel's neck and made him one of the great nobles of the country because he was so wise.

Belshazzar did lose his kingdom just as Daniel had said he would, for a great king, named Darius, came and took it away from him. King Darius learned to love Daniel very much, and he made him one of his great rulers; but Daniel did not forget his old city, which he still loved as much as when he was a little boy. Every day he kneeled down by his window and looked out across the country toward the west, where the burned city of Jerusalem was, and he prayed to God and asked Him to bless the city on the beautiful hill and to send men to build it up again.

The other rulers of the country did not like Daniel, for they were mean and selfish, and they knew that he was better than they were, and they wished he was out of the way; so they came to the king and asked him to make a law that nobody should be allowed to pray to God for thirty days. They said: "Oh, king, live forever. Will you make a law that any person who prays to God and does not worship you shall be thrown into a lions' den?" The king did not stop to think much about it, and he said, "Yes; I will make that law, and it cannot be changed."

Daniel heard the dreadful law, but he was not afraid, for he trusted God and meant to pray to Him no matter what happened. He put up his window and looked out toward the dear city and prayed just as he used to do. When the men who hated him saw him kneeling there and heard him praying, they ran to tell the king. The king was very sorry now that he had made the law, but he could not change it. So they brought Daniel and put him into the den with the lions. Everybody expected to hear a great roar from the lions and then to hear them breaking Daniel's bones and eating him. But nobody heard anything all night long. It was all still and quiet, though if they had listened very hard they would have heard Daniel still praying that God would keep him and bless the city he loved. Early in the morning the king, who had stayed awake all night, came running to the lions' den, and he cried out: "Oh, Daniel, are you still there? Has God kept you?" And Daniel said: "Oh, king, I am here, all safe. The lions have not touched me, for God has kept me through the whole night." Then the king was very glad, and he had Daniel brought up out of the den, and he told everybody in the kingdom to love Daniel's God and pray to Him.

Education in the South

BY JOSEPH ELKINTON.

(Concluded.)

On the Benson Estate.

We journeyed some thirty miles north of Tuskegee to Kowaliga (cow-Elija) to see what Wm. E. Benson was doing for his people among the foothills and in the primeval forest of Central Alabama. Here we found 13,000 acres of land entirely controlled by him and his father, J. J. Benson. The greater part of it was reserved for colored men as they are able to settle upon it, W. E. Benson acting somewhat as land agent and banker. Seldom have we met a man more farsighted, unprejudiced and practical in his work.

J. J. BENSON'S HOUSE AT KOWALIGA, ALA., WHICH HE BUILT HIMSELF. FIFTY BALES OF COTTON IN YARD.

The average colored farmer is very improvident and his white neighbor has often taken advantage of his ignorance, but young Benson is more than a match for the white trader in advising the colored man not to mortgage his mule or farm, while he makes to the farmers loans at 6 per cent. instead of 10 per cent.

He is a graduate of Howard University and president of the Dixie Land Co., which has its sawmill, turpentine still and model cabins for workmen at Benson, Ala., near Kowaliga.

For ten years W. E. Benson has been conducting a preparatory school for 250 children, which will soon have quarters in new buildings on a 100-acre campus.

It seemed to my wife and myself that his plan to give employment to a large number of colored men and to build neat modern cabins for them, as well as to insist upon a moral life, was exceedingly wise, in the meantime educating their children—both industrially and academically.

His father had built a large stone house with modern conveniences, the fourth on that site since he was a slave. We found comfortable apartments in it for three days, and noticed 50 bales of cotton in the front yard—the remnant of last year's crop.

His school buildings were burnt down a year ago and we found the children being taught in improvised quarters, until the new buildings are ready.

At Other Schools.

We were also much pleased at Fort Valley, Ga., with the entertainment which we received as the guests of Henry A. Hunt and his excellent wife. They are doing a much needed work in the Black Belt of Georgia along similar lines.

We returned with him from Tuskegee and visited his High and Industrial school with two colored men who had attended the farmers' conference at Tuskegee. As we listened to them tell the children of this school how they should improve their opportunities we realized as never before what a long road the colored man has traveled and has yet to travel and what a good prospect he has while there are such helpers as we have met during this trip—to lead them onward and upward.

Russell C. Calhoun founded a school at Eatonville, Fla., on the Tuskegee plan, and succeeded wonderfully in ten years. He died last fall and his capable wife is now Principal.

During the two days we remained at this school and attended several sessions of the Ninth Conference of Farmers held there, our belief in the ultimate success of the Negro was greatly strengthened.

South of the Mason and Dixon Line.

The greater problem, in the South, is the attitude of the average white man—which is a direct outcome of slavery. Prof. Hart, of Harvard, has written a very discriminating analysis of "The Southern South" (1910) in which he says "All that has ever been written about this Southern question must be read in the light of the environment, the habits of thought and the daily life of the Southern people, white or black. * * * "The South has not only its own division of special classes, its own methods of influence, it has also its own way of looking at the problems of the universe and especially that department of the universe south of the Mason and Dixon line."

Prof. DuBois adds his testimony in these words, "The stranger (in the South) realizes at last that silently, restlessly, the world about flows by him in two great streams, they ripple on in the same sunshine, they approach and mingle their waters in seeming carelessness—then they divide and flow wide apart”; while Henry W. Grady asserts “The race problem casts the only shadow that rests on the South” and Edgar Gardner Murphy “The real struggle of the South from the date of Lee’s surrender—through all the accidents of political and industrial revolution—was simply a struggle toward the creation of democratic conditions. The real thing in the unfolding of the later South is the arrival of the common man.”

There are five or six millions of the poor white or “cracker” class at present in the South and some 8,000,000 negroes, whose relative position before the war was stated tersely by a Kentucky white woman, forty-five years ago, when a Northern officer asked, “Joyce what do you think this war is about?” “I reckon that you’uns have come down to take the niggers away from we’uns.” “Joyce did you ever own a nigger?” “No sir.” “Did you ever expect to own a nigger?” “I reckon not.” “Which did the people that did own niggers like best, you or the nigger?” “Well, ’twas this way. If a planter came along and met a nigger he’d say ‘Howdy Pomp! How’s the old massa and how’s the young massa, and how’s the old missus and how’s the young missus?’ But if he met me he’d say, ‘Hullo Joyce, is that you?’”

The war gave this class of whites political privileges which they had not used before and which they in turn have used to disenfranchise the Negro in most of the Southern States.

The real task is to educate both white and black together, or at least equally, as they must remain fellow citizens of our great Republic.

The effort to segregate only complicates and delays the final emancipation of both races—as it takes the good in each to produce the best in both.

However “inferior” one race may consider the other the fact remains that the affectionate, emotional temperament of the African has in the course of centuries reacted upon and moulded the character of his white brother, with whom he has been so closely associated, and how could it be otherwise when the white infant was entrusted to the thick-lipped, ignorant and superstitious “mammy” to get its first impressions of life?

The only possible way to raise the millions of irresponsible, shiftless Negroes to a self-respecting life is by educating enough of their own people to reach every community of them. And to accomplish this the public funds ought to be equally at their disposal. As it now is they receive much less than the white population and so their Northern friends must come to their support.

It was a great satisfaction to meet and converse with some of the master-class who were always far more generous in their attitude than the average white whom we met. Two of these former slave owners attended the Farmers’ Conference at Tuskegee and gave those assembled excellent advice and we were particularly glad to get their point of view—which was confirmed by another man whose father owned a hundred slaves in Virginia. He said, “I love the Negro for I was brought up with him and I know his good qualities as well as his faults.”

Short as our trip was we could but be impressed with the signs of growth upon every hand and even in our Northern home, still feel an ever-increasing interest in the development of the sunny South.

Moylan, Pa.

Sarah Atwater Kelsey

The subject of this sketch was born Tenth month 31, 1834, and passed to her rest Fourth month 27, 1911. She was the youngest and last surviving member of the family of Mead and Huldah Hoag Atwater. Both of these, her parents, were well-known ministers of New York Yearly Meeting during the middle period of the last century. The changes which began during their lives, making of one a Wilbur and of the other a Gurney Friend, found their larger development in the lifetime of their daughter, who, following the example of her mother, moved with the current that broadened into the great awakening of the latter half of the century. But while this is true, it must be said that Sarah Kelsey never lost sight of those cardinal points of doctrine and practice which have always been the real essence of the Quaker message.

Regarding conditions in the Society in her early life and her own religious experience, she has left the following interesting note in a brief autobiographical sketch, written for her children in 1894:

“One can hardly understand, in these days of active profession of the Truth, the trend of thought among Friends in my early days. If one dressed plainly, used the plain language of ‘thee and thou,’ and attended meetings First and Fourth-days, one was considered a pattern of Christian life; the necessity of a change of heart through the forgiveness of sins, while I think believed in, was not so taught plainly. Yet from a child, I wanted to serve God and was fond of religious people and their conversation. When my parents were absent, I would not partake of my meals without first sitting in reverent silence, and often I was melted to tears under a sense of His love.”

Sarah Atwater attended Westtown School, near Philadelphia, in 1850. She was married to Asa Kelsey, at Ypsilanti, Michigan, Tenth month 31, 1860. Her religious experience about this time is described by herself as follows: “I had often thought I would have to tell others in our public meetings of God’s loving mercy; and the summer before I was married, I attended Ohio Yearly Meeting and, at an evening meeting at Ann Taylor’s, first testified. At this time the revival movement was beginning among Friends. Several times in the winter after my marriage I was prompted to express my thought at family worship, and twice yielded, but I had so long resisted God’s call to speak for Him in public that I feared I should never know His voice again. But when my eldest child was a babe in my arms, in a First-day morning meeting, the message came and I dare not disobey, and, handing him to another, I repeated the gracious call, 'Ask and it shall be given, seek and ye shall find,' adding, 'These are exceeding great and precious promises.' I was really glad to respond to the call, taking it as evidence of God's favor toward me. Thus I was enabled frequently to testify to His goodness and mercy."

After 1875, Asa and Sarah Kelsey, with their family, lived at Western Springs, Illinois, a suburb of Chicago. At that place the public ministry of Sarah Kelsey became more active and her gift was acknowledged by the Society. She was a regular attender of Western Yearly Meeting for many years, where she was much used in the business of the meeting. Her sweet face, enshrined in its Quaker bonnet, will long be remembered there. Her life was pre-eminently devoted, however, to the care of her family of five children, Mead, Phebe, Irving, Edward and Rayner, all of whom, with her husband, survive her.

The following sacred lines breathe her life hope: "As to you, my children, I gave you to the Lord in your infancy and have reconsecrated you to His service from time to time as your powers increased for service. Now I praise Him for your establishment in the Truth as it is in Jesus."

And her children, all seeking to serve her Master, the four sons ministers in the Society, give thanks oftener than the morning for the wondrous heritage of this godly mother.

Hers was the kind of life that well nigh convinces a skeptical world that the command, "Be ye perfect," may be literally fulfilled in human life. She was often called the spiritual mother of the community in which she lived, and those who knew her best and longest frequently said that, as far as human eye could detect, her life was blameless. In her last written message to her family, she proposed that her grandchildren band together to support a child at some foreign mission station. Thus by her life and influence, by her ministry, public and private, she earned a place among those who, having turned many to righteousness, "Shall shine as the stars forever and ever."

Asa and Sarah Kelsey removed in 1909 to Newberg, Oregon, where two of their children were residing. There they were faithful attendants of Newberg meeting as long as Sarah Kelsey's health permitted. There the golden anniversary of their wedding was observed Tenth month 31, 1910. There her far journey was ended and her wonderful soul returned peacefully to the Maker whom it had served so long and well.

Some Views on Present Day Topics

A Central Friends Publishing House

BY VINCENT D. NICHOLSON.

(Concluded.)

It is true that no one influence can so weld the Church into an aggressive and progressive body as really efficient denominational literature. But do we possess such efficient literature in all its many necessary phases? In order to draw our conclusions as to the need of a central publishing house, we need some facts as a basis.

At present there are three general classes of Friends publications—first, those published weekly for general circulation; second, those published for members of a particular yearly meeting; and third, those published in the interest of some particular department of Church work. In the first class are THE AMERICAN FRIEND, The Evangelical Friend and The Friend, known as the "Philadelphia" or "Square Friend." In the second class are seven papers, most of them established within the past few years, representing the yearly meetings of Baltimore, North Carolina, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, California and Canada. Most of these are issued monthly and have an average circulation of about 600. In the third class—that representing a particular phase of Church work—are The Missionary Advocate, The Messenger of Peace and the various Bible school publications issued by P. W. Raidabaugh, Plainfield, Ind. In addition, various missionary boards, Bible school committees and local meetings publish monthly or quarterly papers.

Few of the publications are on a self-supporting basis, but are maintained through special contributions from the college, the yearly meeting or interested Friends. The combined circulation of the periodicals mentioned in the first two classes is between 12,000 and 15,000. Many homes, however, have more than one paper, so probably less than one-fourth of the Friends householders in America are supplied with a Friends paper of any kind and a much smaller percentage with a national weekly. Only a small percentage of Bible schools are using Friends Bible school publications, and comparatively few households are reached by our other literature.

But even though our present literature circulated universally throughout the Church, still it would not suffice. Friends deserve and will demand the best, and neither in quantity or quality do our publications compare favorably with others that are in the field. However efficient some of our separate publications may be, it is true that we are not measuring up to our possibilities in the field of our Church literature. This is not due to a lack of interest on the part of the members, nor is it due to a lack of earnest effort on the part of consecrated men and women to cover the field.

A number of causes might be cited: A tendency for secular as well as non-sectarian religious literature to crowd out our own; a lack of the proper degree of unity among our periodicals, which is only an outcropping of a more serious and deep-lying condition embedded in the Society itself; limited finances, which has tended to tie the hands of those engaged in the work; and a number of other similar reasons apparent to us all. From a careful diagnosis of the situation it would seem that the cardinal weakness has been a lack of the proper degree of centralization. Co-operation in any work is always productive of greater efficiency, and in view of the small size of our denomination, which naturally limits the possibilities of circulation, such centralization for us is the more essential.

Thus there presents itself as the remedy the idea of a central publishing house which will gradually, as opportunity presents, assume entire charge of the whole field. The idea in brief is this: Let there be established a publishing plant, with adequate printing facilities, sufficient financial backing and capable men, to assume charge of all Friends publications which such a concern can wisely issue. Church supplies and other such literature can be furnished according to the demand. Orders can be taken for the various yearly meeting minutes, other reports, college bulletins and catalogs. Job printing can be secured and the business stability of the plant thereby strengthened.

We find such centers in most of the other denominations, conspicuous examples being the publishing houses of the Congregationalists and Universalists in Boston, the Christian Church in Dayton, Ohio, and the Wesleyan Methodists in Syracuse, N. Y. A strong testimonial to the success of this idea is found in the new publishing plant of the Anti-Saloon League of America, located near Columbus, Ohio. It has almost entire charge of the literature of the State leagues, and has wonderfully reduced the cost and raised the efficiency.

The simple economic law of greater economy and efficiency resulting from co-operation and large scale production operates in the plan. The waste of decentralized capital and effort and of small scale production is eliminated. Printing could be done in large quantities and the proportional cost reduced. A unity of policy and a systematic and comprehensive plan for covering the field could be developed and, through the freedom of larger facilities, properly executed. The profit now paid to private printing concerns would accrue to the Friends publications themselves. The best talent in the Church could ultimately be concentrated back of one management.

But the general theory of the value of co-operation is known to us all. What would be the practical results in detail of such a reform? Our national periodicals can in time be narrowed with much profit to one paper. Although the publishing house might not at first be able to effect such a union and assume charge, yet a tangible basis would be given for a future union when conditions should permit. With the natural increase in circulation resulting from such a combination, with the added appeal it would have to the membership, the proportional cost would be greatly reduced and the efficiency raised. With money, literary talent and Church support back of one paper, its cost could be lowered, its size could be increased, its standard raised and its influence widened. Such a combination must ultimately be effected, and this is the first logical step.

It might or might not be wise to ultimately combine with it some of the yearly meeting papers, enough additional space being given to include these features. Thus many homes might be reached by our national paper which at present are satisfied with the local paper alone.

According to a large number of our prominent First-day school workers, there exists in our Church a definite need for thoroughly modern and comprehensive First-day school literature. Our membership is sufficiently large to maintain such literature, provided there was back of it the facilities to adequately meet the demand. Even though the notes on the new system of graded lessons are edited by experts under the direction of the International Committee, it is expedient that these be revised and published by a house of our own. If we are to successfully carry out our propaganda as a Church, small in numbers as we are, we need a central "rallying" point to which Friends can look for all their literature.

Do we need a separate missionary publication? Probably so, but we need a thoroughly representative one which will reach the people and cover the field. This could be done through the influence of a large central concern.

Friends as the pioneers in the peace movement might well maintain an influential publication devoted to that great work. The Messenger of Peace deserves much credit for its excellent work, but why not publish a paper of twice the size and reach many times the people? Why should a paper on a subject of such universal interest be limited to Friends? Connected with the peace movement in a peculiar way as we are, we might well exert a broader influence in enlightening the world.

We might elaborate in similar manner on other possible phases of Church literature. Often times at great religious conferences, Friends literature is conspicuous by its absence in comparison with the vast amount displayed by other denominations. Our membership is not so large and our activities consequently smaller than their own, but, as has been shown, we do have many needs in this important phase of Church work. We should either make our publications meet the need or else give up the struggle and permit them individually to die a peaceful death.

There would also be indirect and more intangible benefits that are none the less real. Such a centralization would cause a focus of attention of the members generally with an accompanying awakening of interest. Such a center as we have outlined is always productive of greater loyalty. A popular interest in any work is determined by the breadth and efficiency of the work itself. When evidence is given of something being accomplished, then everyone wants to get on the band-wagon—but we must first furnish the band-wagon.

If such a publishing house were dropped down in Richmond or Indianapolis or possibly Chicago, we would welcome it with outstretched arms. It is the problem of launching it that dispels our enthusiasm, destroys our faith and causes us to say "Not yet, but soon; let us wait a while." If that spirit dominated all of our actions, in what deserted pile of past relics would we find our Church today? What would become of progress in general? The problems are great, but not unsolvable.

The first problem is the one of initiating the movement. It is entirely within the realm of reason for the Five Years' Meeting—not of 2012, but of 1912—to officially authorize the establishment of such a house and appoint men to carry forward the necessary steps of organization. If the time is not ripe for such official action, an independent house might be established and maintained until conditions did permit the Church taking it over. However, it would need the initial strength of Church endorsement, and the time seems ripe for the Church to assume charge of some, even if not all, of our literature.

The second problem is the one of financing the undertaking. It has been estimated that $50,000 would suffice to build, equip and operate the plant till the business acquired should insure its financial stability. Are there not enough interested men in the Church to take up that amount of stock?

The third problem is the one of men. Upon the personnel of the movement will largely depend its ultimate success or failure. The wide possibilities of the work, the urgent need, the competent salaries which such a plant could ultimately pay would attract the right men if we have them. And that we have them is not even a matter of conjecture.

The practical difficulties are many and not to be lightly argued away. But we must enlarge our vision to the possibilities and the magnitude of our mission as a Church. We must leave no stone unturned, no avenue of work unentered, necessary to carrying forward our propaganda. If the need exists, as most of us admit it does, have we not the brains, the money, the faith, the enthusiasm to carry into effect now what at some time will be the inevitable ultimatum in this field of our work.

Missionary Department

Expensive Business, This

Unless American Friends show some disposition to reconsider and withdraw their forces from Kavindondo, someone is going to pay dearly for this missionary enterprise. At least, so thinks Ingokho, whose name by interpretation means "chicken."

Ingokho is the husband of three wives and the father of a dozen bright children. The three huts (one for each wife) are arranged about the grain storage hut, located in the center of his rather neatly enclosed family village near Lirhanda. Some of these children have spent a good deal of time on the mission station ever since we came to this district. There was no objection to this, and Ingokho has ordinarily been a cordial neighbor. But when one, then another, and still another of his children showed signs of a loosening grip on heathen customs, Ingokho's countenance changed toward us. One of his daughters has already been bargained off to a husband. Another is of a marriageable age and he wants to turn her into cattle as soon as possible. But she is one of the three who have been caught in the Gospel net. She doesn't object to being married, but she does rebel against the immoral courtship in vogue and to being sold to a pagan husband. When her father insisted that she receive young men at her home in the customary manner, she took refuge on the mission station, where she has under her care four younger girls who are following her example. She faithfully helps her father by cultivating, but comes to the station for school and service and to spend the nights. We have talked with Ingokho about these things, but he has not become reconciled to her firmness nor to our interest in her. A short time ago, one of the above three, a lad of about twelve years, took a definite step in the right direction by avoiding a deeply rooted and sinful custom. Ingokho was hardly prepared for this, and made no attempt to conceal his increased displeasure as the customs of his forefathers from time immemorial were set at naught in certain respects. Soon after this he came home one evening at dark from one of his frequent rum carousals with friends of the neighborhood. Muhanga, the lad, was visiting his mother, with whom he planned spending the night. But the father, enraged with drink and remembrance of the son's recent decision, seized a stick and drove his boy into the dark bush, saying that, if he was going to heed the white man's teaching, he couldn't sleep under his roof. African boys have feelings, and Muhanga came to Lirhanda with a heavy heart but, I believe, more determined than ever to follow the Light which is shining upon his path.

We don't blame Ingokho. We would probably be like him had we been born and reared in his environment; but we are trusting that the salvation of his children may become his own and that still greater inroads may be made in his fine flock of children.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

President D. M. Edwards of Penn College was with the Friends at Cedar Creek Meeting, Salem Quarter, Iowa, First-day, 23d ult.

* * *

Rachel C. Woodard, who spent the winter with her brother J. Carter Bales at Wichita, Kans., has gone to live with William Bales, near Lawrence, Kans.

* * *

Prof. Anson B. Harvey has resigned from the chair of Philosophy in Friends University, and Prof. William J. Reagan, acting-President of Pacific College, has been called to fill the vacancy.

* * *

At the recent meeting of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions, which convened at Cleveland, Ohio, last week, arrangements were made to include the Friends Africa Industrial Mission under their supervision.

* * *

John and Nettie Riley hope to resume evangelistic work in the near future. Owing to a severe breakdown in Nettie Riley's health, it has been necessary for them to rest for a few months in the country. They have been staying near Gilroy, Cal.

* * *

From the 12th to 16th ult., the Christian people of West Branch, Iowa, joined in a union evangelistic effort led by a Y. M. C. A. Gospel team from the State University of Iowa. There were six men in the team. All the services were held in the Friends meeting-house. Several attended who were not in the habit of going to meeting.

* * *

Arthur Jones, late of Winthrop Center, Maine, has assumed charge of the work in Kansas City, Mo., attending meeting there for the first time on the 23d ult. Kansas City Friends are now using the new meeting-house, located at 30th and Bales Streets. It is a handsome, well-appointed building, simple in style and yet possessing much architectural beauty. The small membership is to be congratulated upon it.

* * *

As a result of a union evangelistic effort in Marion, Ind., led by R. A. Torrey, nearly 1,000 professed conversion. The First Friends Church joined in the effort and continued meetings after the union services were closed. Over 100 have applied for membership with Friends and some, now residing in Marion, who belong to other meetings are having their membership transferred. Chas. W. Sweet is the pastor in this meeting.

Dr. William W. Cadbury, of the University Medical School in Canton, China, writes in a recent letter: "Our hospital is now well under way and we are maturing plans for the opening of a school taught in colloquial in addition to the few boys now taught in English. The vernacular school will, of course, mean a far greater amount of labor in preparing lectures, etc., and, although I have passed off the work required for the first two years of study, I am still working hard at the language. We hope to have the co-operation of other missions in our medical school, and that will, of course, greatly enhance its efficiency."

* * *

Fourth month 16th, was a red letter day in the meeting at Glens Falls. In the morning the house was beautifully decorated, and the congregation enjoyed beautiful Easter music. Ten persons who had been received into membership by the monthly meeting, were welcomed by the church while others chose this method of expressing their desire for membership.

At the evening service there was a junior chorus of 22 voices who inspired the audience with the Easter message. The chorus was drilled by Byron Allen, one of the young men of the church.

* * *

Van Wert Quarterly Meeting held a conference of the different departments of church work at Rockford, Ohio, the 14th to 16th ult. On Sixth-day evening the 14th, Daisy Barr spoke on "A History of the Saloon," and the following morning, at the home missions session, she spoke on "The American of Tomorrow." Seventh-day afternoon Tennyson Lewis delivered an address on "Peace." George H. Wappner was the chief speaker in the evening at the Bible school conference. Music was furnished by the junior choir of Van Wert, Ohio. First-day morning the subject of missions was presented by A. M. Harvey. In the afternoon the Junior Endeavors of Rockford gave a program under direction of Belle Leistner, junior superintendent. In the evening, A. M. Harvey addressed the Junior Endeavor. Oscar H. Trader had charge of the singing at all the sessions except the Bible school.

Poughkeepsie Monthly Meeting, held the 20th ult., was a time of unusual blessing. Supper was served in the lower rooms. Then the meeting of Ministry and Oversight met in the parlors, after this the regular monthly meeting convened in the main auditorium. A large number were in attendance. There was a sweet spirit of harmony in both the religious and business meetings. Four new members were received. William J. Sayers offered resolutions to be sent to the State Representatives asking them to use their influence against the new race track law which is intended to remove some of the restrictions on betting. During the past year there has been a solid gain in membership. The Bible school and Christian Endeavor have done fine work and show a good increase. The missionary work is very active. The largest part of those present were young men and women.

Tilman Hobson held a series of special meetings at Ramona, Cal., from the 2d to the 16th ult. A number were converted, and about a score united with the Friends meeting. On Second-day, the 17th, he delivered his illustrated address on "Slums, Saloons and Prisons" to a large and interested audience in the Town Hall. In this lecture he showed the evils arising from the various forms of sinful indulgence, as well as the good results of a righteous life.

The meeting at Ramona is one of the smaller as well as older meetings of California Yearly Meeting, and had passed through many vicissitudes, but now seems to be gaining ground. It is located about 40 miles northeast of San Diego, in a shallow valley in the mountains, 1,500 feet above sea level, reached by rail to Foster and thence by a picturesque stage ride of 14 miles up the splendid new boulevard recently constructed by the county.

The following minute of a meeting representing the Religious Society of Friends held in London, Fourth month 7, 1911, has been sent to President Taft, Sir Edward Grey, Right

Hon. Arthur Balfour, M. P., the Honorable Whitelaw Reid, and others:

"It is with hearts full of thankfulness to our Heavenly Father, that, at the opening of our monthly executive meeting today, we record our appreciation of the response made by Sir Edward Grey on behalf of the British government, to the invitation of President Taft to other countries to enter into negotiations for treaties or arbitration to cover every issue which cannot be settled by ordinary negotiations. We trust such a treaty may without undue delay be concluded by our government with the United States of America.

"It is our prayer that such a treaty may never be regarded as a menace to any other nation, but rather that it may lead to similar treaties with other peoples, so that the present condition of the nations, armed and ready for bitter and horrible conflict, may be superseded by the organization of international justice based upon mutual confidence and respect.

"Signed on behalf of the meeting,

"ROBERT A. PENNEY, Clerk.

Samuel Dickinson, whose obituary appears elsewhere, was born at Milton, Ind., Fifth month 29, 1848. He was the son of Joseph and Esther G. Dickinson. A year after his birth, his parents moved to Richmond, Ind., where he has since resided. He received his schooling at the old Whitewater Friends school under Hiram Hadley, and later at Earlham College.

After finishing his education, Samuel Dickinson entered into the lumber business at Hagerstown, in which he continued for some time. In 1869 he and his father engaged in the mortgage and loan business in Richmond and it was from this business that the Dickinson Trust Co. developed. A merger was effected in 1899 and the trust company entered on its successful career. He was president of the company for about ten years. At the time of the merger he had associated with him in the mortgage and loan business his brother, Joseph J. Dickinson, and his brother-in-law, Charles H. Francisco.

To him is given a large share of the credit for the success of the trust company that bears his name. He took an active part at all times in its management and operation.

He was well known to a large number of Richmond residents and had a host of friends and acquaintances among whom he was highly esteemed.

Southland College for Colored Youth, Southland, Ark., dedicated its new buildings First-day morning, the 26th ult. The music for the occasion was furnished by the music teacher, students and alumni. A solo rendered by Prof. Cecil Mills was very impressive. The dedicatory sermon was delivered by Zona M. Williams.

Mary A. J. Ballard, a member of the board from Richmond, Ind., was present and gave a very interesting talk on the planning of the buildings and the furnishing of the rooms in the girls' dormitory. The 30 additional rooms to the girls' dormitory and the furnishings are all paid for, the money for the latter having been subscribed by individual members of Indiana Yearly Meeting. The college has a debt of $1,500 on the annex to the school building. The patrons of the school expressed warm appreciation of the opportunities which their children are enjoying. The college chapel was crowded, and after the services, a sumptuous basket dinner was served in the college dining-rooms and offices.

These new buildings are highly appreciated by the local church and by the people of the surrounding communities. It was supposed when the work was undertaken that the present improvements would amply equip the college for next year at least, but the work is growing so rapidly that there is an imperative demand for provisions for the boys similar to those now made for the girls. This work should be done this summer, but the problem of funds is appalling.

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

After a somewhat careful investigation of the conditions, we have thought best to reserve a section in the Publishers' Exhibition Building, adjoining the convention hall, for Friends headquarters during the International Sunday-school Convention, to be held at San Francisco, Sixth month 20-27, 1911. We desire every Friend to come and register at headquarters, giving home address and stopping-place while at the convention. Our headquarters will furnish a place for Friends to meet each other, and serve as an information bureau. Friends books, tracts, papers, etc., will be on exhibition and for sale. Anyone desiring space for exhibits should make arrangements early.

While San Francisco has a large number of hotels, several have already been taken by State or city delegations. Fourteen full trains are already reported as coming from the East and South. If several Friends are planning to come together and desire a hotel, this matter should be taken up at an early date. The hotels are not in walking distance of the convention hall. The street car service, however, is quite good.

This is a great work. Shall not Friends be found on duty?

Yours in the Master's service,

LEVI GREGORY.

831 Fifty-fourth Street, Oakland, Cal.

Died

DEEDS.—At the home of her daughter, 1920 Rockefeller Avenue, Everett, Wash., Third month 29, 1911, Mary E. Deeds, in her seventy-second year. She was an elder of Everett Monthly Meeting. For several years she has been an invalid, during which time she had carried on a helpful correspondence with a large group of absent Friends.

DICKINSON.—At Richmond, Ind., Fourth month 21st, 1911, Samuel Dickinson, aged sixty-two years. The deceased was a member of South Eighth Street, Richmond, Ind.

JONES.—At College Park, San Jose, Cal., Fourth month 4, 1911, Wilhelmina B. Jones, a member of College Park Association of Friends, and of Dover Monthly Meeting, N. H.

KELSEY.—At Newberg, Oregon, Fourth month 27, 1911, Sarah Atwater Kelsey. A minister of the Society of Friends. Daughter and youngest child of Mead and Huldah Hoag Atwater, born at Rochester, N. Y., Tenth month 31, 1834. Further notice appears elsewhere in this paper.

KENWORTHY.—At her home in New London, Ind., Fourth month 20, 1911, Naomi Kenworthy, aged nearly eighty-four years. She was a beloved elder of New London Monthly Meeting. She lived a beautiful life, and having "in her own generation served the counsel of God, fell asleep."

MEADER.—At the home of her son, Edwin J. Meader, Bristol, Vt., Third month 28, 1911, Sarah B. Meader, aged ninety-one years. She was a member and for many years an elder in Ferrisburg Quarterly Meeting.

MOFFITT.—At his home, Lexington, N. C., Fourth month 16, 1911, Dugan Clark Moffitt in his fifty-seventh year. The deceased was a member of Pine Woods Monthly Meeting, and for years an interested worker in church activities. He was an upright business man, and had the confidence of all who knew him.

The International Bible School Lesson

SECOND QUARTER, LESSON VII.

FIFTH MONTH 14, 1911.

ISAIAH'S VISION AND CALL TO SERVICE.

ISAIAH 6: 1-13.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I heard the voice of the Lord saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I; send me. Isa. 6: 8.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fifth month 8th. Isaiah's vision. Isa. 6: 1-13.

Third-day. Vision of Jehovah's house. Isa. 2: 1-4.

Fourth-day. Triumphs over idols. Isa. 2: 5-22.

Fifth-day. Entering into judgment. Isa. 3: 1-15.

Sixth-day. Heedless women. Isa. 3: 16; 4: 1.

Seventh-day. The redeemed Jerusalem. Isa. 4: 2-6.

First-day. Come let us reason together. Isa. 1: 1-2.

Time.—B. C. 749, or 755. "The year that King Uzziah died."

Place.—The Temple in Jerusalem.

Kings.—In Israel, Menahem; Assyria, Asshur-dan III; in Judah, Jotham (749-741) was Uzziah's successor.

The book of Isaiah is, next to the Psalms, and possibly the Proverbs, the most familiar and most quoted book of the Old Testament. Except perhaps parts of Amos, no book equals it in beauty of language, poetic imagination and force.

The prophetic ministry of Isaiah nearly covers the latter half of the eighth century before Christ. It was the time of the greatest activity of the great Assyrian empire, when the whole of Palestine suffered from the attacks and conquests of the great Eastern empire. The full meaning of the books of Amos, Hosea, Micah and Isaiah cannot be understood without some knowledge of the history of the times which is not given in the Bible. To attempt to do so would be like attempting to understand the American Revolution wholly apart from the history of England. Fortunately recent discoveries of cuneiform inscriptions and the ability to decipher and translate them have thrown such a flood of light upon contemporary history that we can understand the words of the great prophets far better than was possible fifty years ago. In almost every instance, Biblical accounts have been confirmed.

Of Isaiah himself comparatively little is known outside of what is stated in the book bearing his name. He was probably born about 760 B. C., and so was contemporary with the early years of the city of Rome. He was the son of Amoz (not Amos, the prophet); he was a citizen if not a native of Jerusalem; he was married, and had at least two sons. The time of his death is not known, but tradition says that he was martyred by being sawn asunder. The latest prophecy by him is about 701 B. C.

The lesson describes his divine call to service, and though coming well on in the book, tells of the beginning of his prophetic career. It is one of the most remarkable passages of the book.

1. "In the year." About 749 B. C. I saw in a vision. "Train." The skirts of his garment. "Temple." The outer court or possibly not the actual temple at all, but a heavenly enclosure. Psalms 11: 4; 29: 9, 10.

2. "Above him." R. V. "Seraphim." The Hebrew plural of Seraph. This is the only mention of Seraphim in the Bible, and it is impossible to speak about them with certainty. The popular idea that they are the same as angels has no evidence to support it. The whole account is symbolical. The first pair of wings are thought to indicate reverence; the second, self-forgetfulness or self-effacement; the third, active service. The "feet" means the lower part of the body.

3. "Holy," etc. Used as the refrain of the well-known hymn of Reginald Heber. "Holy" primarily means "set apart." Here, in addition, it means the ethical qualities as well—"His moral purity and intolerance of sin." "The whole." Literally, "The fulness of the whole earth is his glory." "The wealth and beauty of all the world is His glory."

4. "And the foundations of the thresholds were moved." R. V. "Smoke." Not of incense, but as indicating the wrath of Jehovah against sin. Psalms 18: 8; 74: 1; Rev. 15: 8.

5. Isaiah feels not only his own unworthiness, but the tainted moral atmosphere in which he lived. "Mine eyes have seen," etc. He realized his own condition by seeing the purity of Jehovah.

6, 7. "Live coal." Literally, "hot stone." A hot stone was used for boiling water, by being put into the water or liquid to be heated; cakes were baked by being put on a hot stone, which was renewed as often as needful. I Kings 19: 6. R. V. margin. "Laid it upon." "Touched." R. V. Isaiah feels the direct touch of the divine Spirit without any intervening priest. "In that divine Presence, Isaiah is his own altar; he acts his guilt in his own person, and so he feels the expiatory fire come to his very self directly from the heavenly hearth." Psalms 51: 16, 17.

8. One of the greatest verses in the Old Testament and, indeed, in the whole Bible. First it teaches that, though God has angels, and seraphim, and cherubim whom He might send, He chooses human beings, with all their imperfections and liability to sin. Secondly, that we, not God, have to make the decision. "Self-consecration is the beginning of His service, and a sense of our own freedom and our own responsibility is an indispensable element in the act of self-consecration." When we see the need, when the call comes to us, not, it may be, in some divinely-sent vision, but with unmistakable certainty, do we, have we, like Isaiah, in self-effacement and reverence and willingness to serve, said, "Here am I; send me?"

9, 10. The message. The idea conveyed in these words is that, though Isaiah did preach, the hearers would not listen—nay, would even become harder to move. "By a vivid form of speech the prophesied result of Isaiah's preaching is here put for the purpose of it." This passage is quoted by Christ and applied to His own preaching. Matt. 13: 14; Mark 4: 12; Luke 8: 10; John 12: 40.

11. "How long?" It was a most discouraging outlook to a young volunteer. The answer came, "Not until judgment has been carried out in complete desolation of the land and exile of the nation." Verses 11-13 have been thus translated by George Adam Smith:

"Until cities fall into ruin without an inhabitant,

And houses without a man,

And the land be left desolately waste, And Jehovah have removed man far away,

And great be the desert in the midst of the land;

And still if there be a tenth in it,

Even it shall be again for consuming.

Like the terebinth, and like the oak,

Whose stock when they are felled remaineth in them,

The holy seed shall be its stock."

A WIDOW'S LUCK.

QUIT THE THING THAT WAS SLOWLY INJURING HER.

A woman tells how coffee kept her from insuring her life:

"I suffered for many years chiefly from trouble with my heart, with severe nervous headaches and neuralgia; but although incapacitated at times for my housework, I did not realize the gravity of my condition till I was rejected for life insurance, because, the examining physician said, my heart was so bad he could not pass me.

"This distressed me very much, as I was a widow and had a child dependent upon me. It was to protect her future that I wanted to insure my life.

"Fortunately for me, I happened to read an advertisement containing a testimonial from a man who had been affected in the same way that I was with heart trouble, and who benefited by leaving off coffee and using Postum. I grasped at the hope this held out, and made the change at once.

"My health began to improve immediately. The headaches and neuralgia disappeared. I gained in flesh, and my appetite came back to me. Greatest of all, my heart was strengthened from the beginning, and soon all the distressing symptoms passed away. No more waking up in the night with my heart trying to fly out of my mouth!

"Then I again made application for life insurance, and had no trouble in passing the medical examination.

"It was seven years ago that I began to use Postum, and I am using it still, and shall continue to do so, as I find it a guarantee of good health." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason."

Read the big little book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

Every read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

"There was to be a withering and repeated devastation, in the end a bare survival." These verses give the key to the rest of Isaiah's words. (Chaps. 1-39.)

One of the principles of the Boy Scout movement is to do a good turn to somebody every day, and in this connection the founder of the brigade, Sir Robert S. S. Baden-Powell, has been telling a good story that he had heard in Canada. He said that a Boy Scout woke up one night and remembered that he had not done a good turn that day. He lay for a time thinking and very unhappy about it. Suddenly he heard the noise of a mouse in a trap in the room, and a bright idea struck him. He got out of bed and gently took the mouse out of the trap and gave it to the cat.—Westminster Gazette.

In the Black Hills of South Dakota the officials of the United States Forest Service have assembled what is believed to be the largest supply of pine cones ever gathered in the United States. With these the Forest Service expects to do a vast amount of replanting on the burned areas in South Dakota, Idaho, Colorado and other Western States. A bushel of cones makes a pound of seed, and the Government requires 3,000 pounds of seed for Montana alone and the same quantity for some of the other States. The Black Hills and certain sections of Colorado were the only regions where good cones could be found. Even the squirrels of the Black Hills are indirectly aiding in gathering the piles of cones for the Government, for from their nests, where the squirrels had stored them for the winter, the cone gatherers took, in the aggregate, many hundreds of bushels, after leaving a small store for the squirrels.

Notice

At the annual meeting of Friends Freedmen's Association, the principal of Christiansburg Industrial Institute appealed for contributions of partly worn clothing and shoes, which are very much appreciated at the school. The sewing school and shoe cobbling department are ready to put these things into good shape before they are sold or given to very needy recipients. New material for the sewing school is especially appreciated. All contributions to be sent should be at Friends Institute, 20 S. 12th Street, Philadelphia, not later than Fifth month 17th, plainly marked, "For Christiansburg Industrial Institute."

Several famous writers and lecturers of Boston were once speaking of their lecture experiences. Each man of the company was certain that he had received the smallest sum. But Dr. Holmes made a climax by saying: "Listen, gentlemen. I had engaged to give a lecture for $5. After it was over, a grave-looking deacon came to me and said, 'Mr. Holmes, we agreed to give you $5; but your talk wasn't just what we expected, and I guess that two-fifty will be about right.'"—Christian Register.

In Thee Alone

Thou rulest, Lord, the lights on high,
Sun, moon and stars Thy servants be:
But every glory of the sky
Is darkness, if I have not Thee.

How vast the marvel of the mind,
How far the beams of reason go!
But all the wisdom of mankind—
How blind, how vain, till Thee I know!

Where'er I look is light and joy:
A blooming flower, an eagle's wing
Their sinless jubilee employ,
And to Thy praise full tribute bring.

Thy gifts to Man beyond compare
Like royal crowns and emblems shine:
But all are given for Man's despair
Until I hold each gift as Thine.

Delight and wisdom, peace and power,
A heart of hope, serene and free,
Through life's dim dream and transient hour,
I find, O God, alone in Thee.

Tell of small beginnings that grew into large things.

Give one modern instance of advancement through faithfulness.

Tell of your opportunities for growth and how you use them.

I like that word "growing"—growing into larger work. Great work does not come unheralded and like lightning from a clear sky. The seed cannot become the tree with its foliage, its blossoms and its fruit without the perennial ministrations of sun and darkness, heat and cold, moisture and soil. The Christian worker isn't born ready made. He is the flower crowning the plant of service, rooted in the nourishing soil of an environment that fosters worthy ambitions and encourages the gleaners of truth to use their God-given powers.

* * *

Those plans and purposes of forming our life after the idea of Christ, which He has developed within us, will not at once be filled out with practical realization any more than the ear at once becomes the full corn in the ear; but yet the time of ripe fruit will come. There is no Christ-given thought which shall not also become Christlike endeavor; and there is no Christlike endeavor which shall fail to become an attained practical result. All Christian truth is directed to Christian doing; and as the seed sown in suitable soil develops, by a necessary law, "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear," so also the Lord Jesus, being received into the heart duly prepared, grows, by the very law of things, under Heaven's influence, into newness of understanding, newness of will and newness of life.

* * *

We learn many lessons from the gleaners. Their little task seems to fit our lives. Ruth was a gleaner, but only for a short time. Afterward she became the wife of the chief harvester of the town. Every lad who "rakes after" has ambition to ride the horse-rake. The gleaner's task is a preparation for the harvester's work. Faithfulness in little things swings the doors to larger responsibilities. The faithful use of the two talents and the five talents brings the word, "I will make thee ruler over many things."

* * *

"Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, to you I have given it." Experience and not theory is the test of possession. To say a thing is ours and to possess it are two different things. The Bible promises are all ours, and yet how few we really own. They stretch before us like the land of Canaan before the children of Israel, beautiful in situation, filled with rich harvest fields and vineyards, overflowing with milk and honey. We possess them only by marking them with the soles of our feet, which means they are ours only as we bear our weight upon them. A promise is ours only as it becomes incorporated in our life.

* * *

Larger work depends more often upon the whole-hearted consecration of the instrument to the master workman than upon the amount of self-sufficiency. Efficiency in the Master's work is measured in terms of spirituality, singleness of heart and consecration more than in terms of technical skill. "Look at the artist's chisel. The artist cannot carve without it. * * * The chisel lays itself in his hand and is obedient to him. That obedience is faith. It opens the channels between the sculptor's brain and the hard steel. Thought, feeling, imagination, skill flow down from the deep chambers of the artist's soul to the chisel's edge. The sculptor and the chisel are not two, but one. It is the unit which they make that carves the stone." We are but the chisel to carve God's statues in this world. Unquestionably we must do the work. But the human worker is only the chisel of the great Artist. The artist needs his chisel. But the chisel can do nothing, produce no beauty, of itself."

* * *

As a Christian, you should be doing a larger work this year than last year and planning for a larger work next year than this year. Plants that do not grow, decay. Lives that do not expand, contract. There is no standing still. Growth is the watchword of the Christian experience, and growth comes through work as in no other way. The Christian absorbs the Christ-life by fellowship with Him, and then makes it really and forever his by expressing that life in service. The more service, the more life. The soul expands under the pressure of hard work and touch with the needs of man. The Christian should remember that he is neither a century plant nor a mushroom. He is a hardy annual that bears its fruit every year in spite of and by means of every shifting wind of circumstance and the changing seasons of emotion. He bears fruit and in ever greater abundance.

"Angels of growth, of old, in that surprise

Of your first vision, wild and sweet,
I poured in passionate sighs

My wish unwise

That ye descend my heart to meet—
My heart too slow to rise!

"Now thus I pray: Angelic beings hold

In Heaven your shining poise afar,
And to my wishes bold

Reply with cold,

Sweet invitation, like a star
Fixed in the heavens old.

"Not to content our lowness, but to lure

And lift us to your angelhood

Do your surprises pure

Dawn far and sure

Above the tumult of young blood,

And starlike there endure.

"Wait there; wait, and invite me while to climb;

For, see, I come! but slow, but slow!

Yet ever as your chime,

Soft and sublime,

Lifts at my feet, they move, they go
Up the great stairs of time."

According to a press dispatch from Wichita, Kan., the State Elks' Convention was relieved of part of its refreshments by the chief of police. In preparing for the entertainment of their visiting brethren, the local Elks had purchased $2,000 worth of different kinds of beverages. It is a violation of the Kansas prohibition law to sell or give away these beverages, and the police of Wichita deemed it their duty to take care of them.

The Carnegie Hero Fund Commission met recently and made 35 awards. Twelve of the recipients were less than sixteen years of age. Four of them were girls—one, fourteen, and three, thirteen years old. The fourteen-year-old girl lost her life in helping to save three other girls from drowning. A silver medal, together with $1,000, was awarded her mother. In nine instances the heroes lost their lives and the rewards go to their nearest of kin.

Senator Gallinger, New Hampshire, has been remembered for his distinguished services in securing temperance legislation. Recently, on the occasion of his seventy-fourth birthday anniversary, friends of the temperance cause presented him with a handsome cane and umbrella. The handles were of turtle ebony, tipped with plates of solid gold, and sticks of ebony were joined to the handles by bands of gold. Upon these bands were engraved this inscription:

"In appreciation of services for temperance reform, by friends of the National Inter-Church Temperance Federation, the International Order of Good Templars, the National Temperance Society and the National Women's Christian Temperance Union."

On the gold tips were engraved the Senator's name, address and birthday anniversary date.

The Death of Hannah Whitall Smith

Hannah Whitall Smith peacefully passed away, in her beautiful English home near Oxford, on the second of this month. All who knew her and loved her will rejoice that she has been taken—and we may confidently say taken home—before her mental powers failed and before there was any clouding of that perennially joyful spirit which characterized her life.

She was born in Philadelphia in 1832, and has finished her earthly life just before reaching her eightieth year. Eight years ago she told the story of her early life and her religious development in a book bearing the interesting title, "The Unselfishness of God and How I Discovered It." She refers to it as a "spiritual biography," and so it is. I know of no more interesting account of a Quaker childhood and youth than this. She has given with unusual insight, with penetrating appreciation, and yet with a happy play of humor, experiences which many of us knew at first hand a generation ago, but which nobody will ever know hereafter except through such descriptions. Her home life was ideal; her father and mother were both wise and good, and the influence of the home life and of the meeting seem to have combined to quicken her spiritual nature very early in life. She wrote in her diary, at the age of sixteen: "This is an important time for me. Now is the forming time of my character. I feel as I never felt before. The great and solemn duties of life have for the first time come before me. I was not born to be an idler, for I feel something within me which points onward into the future, beyond this into a brighter, happier world, and tells me of the glorious reward of those who fulfil their duties. * * * I must struggle earnestly to become pure and holy and noble-hearted, that I may be great in the world and perform faithfully my part in the great battle of life."

Her search for a true and satisfying religious experience, her joyous glimpses of light, followed by eclipses of faith; her states of "assurance," followed by times of questioning, and finally her arrival at an experience which met her need, are told in a straightforward, illuminating way which makes her story of real value to all kinds of readers. Some time in the sixties, she entered upon a stage of religious experience, sometimes called "sanctification," or "the higher life," or "the life hid with Christ in God," in which she reached the fulness of her religious joy and of her spiritual power. Her book, "The Secret of a Happy Life," was the most important fruit of this experience, and it has gone around the world, influencing multitudes of men and women and showing the way to a type of Christianity which was inwardly alive and dynamic. She must have been, during the years of her intensest experience and her most prominent public service, a difficult person to fit into the staid and quiet order of the Quaker system, and yet she always loved and appreciated the religious Society into which she was born, in which she was nurtured and to whose deepest principles she always gave unswerving loyalty.

She traveled a very different religious path from that frequented by the most of her early associates, but it was due to the fact that she possessed an intensely religious nature and could not find her peace and joy in ways beaten hard by tradition. She was not made so that she could settle down quietly and be content with any second-hand modes of religion. Whatever she was to have must be hers. She came to realize that it was a mistake to expect that all persons should pass through the exact experiences which had seemed so wonderful to her, but to the end she insisted, and rightly so, that every person's religion, whatever path each one may take to arrive at it, must be fresh, alive and expanding.

She was, I have always felt, a very remarkable woman. From her childhood up she was a happy, joyous spirit, radiating light and good feeling everywhere and demonstrating that religion really is fullness of life. Her human interests were extraordinarily wide, touching almost every side of life worth touching. She formed a very large circle of intimate friendships, she was in touch with a vast variety of undertakings for the betterment of the world, her home was always a center of activity and fellowship, and, by diligent reading, she kept in constant contact with the progress of affairs and the movements of thought. She realized, in a happy measure, that expectation of her girlhood that she was to be "great in the world and perform a faithful part in the battle of life." The intense religious enthusiasm of her early and middle life slowly gave place to a more calm and stable type of religion. The unselfishness of God which she discovered in her youth came to be a permanent reality of her mature life, and in a rich and untroubled spirit she moved on toward the sunset of her journey. "I have had,"

she once said, "a few faint glimpses of God's glory here and now, and it has been enough to ravish my heart. But there I shall see Him as He is, in all the glory of an infinite unselfishness which no heart of man has ever been able to conceive, and I await the moment with joy." That moment has now come. She has in truth "finished her course with joy," and has found beyond the sunset the dawn of a new day.

Helps for the Graded Lessons

Four series of helps on the "International Graded Lessons" have been prepared as far as the intermediate grade.

* First, are helps issued by a syndicate of four sustaining denominations—the Methodist Episcopal, the Methodist Episcopal South, the Presbyterians and the Congregationalists—and ten affiliated denominations. It was realized at the beginning of the enterprise that the initial cost in preparing adequate helps for these lessons would be enormous. Experience with the "Uniform Lessons" had demonstrated that a great saving could be accomplished by preparing union helps which require but little change for denominational purposes. Accordingly the great denominational publishers proposed syndicating, with the result indicated above. This syndicate employed a number of experts, regardless of denominational affiliation, to prepare helps in the various courses. Their work, however, is inspected by the denominational editors in the syndicate, and the literature bears the imprint of the denominational publishing house through which it passes as well as the name of the denominational editor.

The fact that the Methodists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists are issuing the same helps is doubtless responsible for an impression in certain quarters that they are prepared under the supervision of the international committee, but this was not the case. Others have supposed they were Methodist helps, since they are all printed on the Eaton & Main presses. This also is erroneous, because great care has been taken to make them interdenominational in character. This is the series of helps referred to by Lyra D. Trueblood in her article in this issue. It is also the series handled by P. W. Raidabaugh, Plainfield, Ind.

Second, are helps by the Sunday School Times Co. These also are interdenominational in character, and are prepared by a special staff of competent editors. The helps are in two forms—quarterly pamphlets and a monthly magazine. The first-year helps in the beginners', primary and junior departments are published in quarterly pamphlets. The second-year helps in the same departments and in the first-year intermediate are published in a monthly edition of the "Sunday School Times." (This should not be confused with the regular weekly edition of the "Sunday School Times," which is exclusively devoted to the "Uniform Lessons.") In addition to these helps for the teacher, the "Sunday School Times" provides a graded course of pupils' pads for home study and home work.

Third, are the "Baptist Graded Lesson Helps." Although it involved a large additional expense, the Baptists decided not to go into the syndicate. They employed a corps of experts, who followed the same general plan as the syndicate writers and editors, but who produced an entirely independent set of helps. Some of our First-day schools are using these helps in preference to all others.

Fourth, are helps by the Christian denomination, with its publishing house at Dayton, Ohio. As far as we know, these helps are not used by Friends.

Hastening the End of the Opium Traffic

The British Government is evidently yielding to moral pressure and negotiating an agreement which will hasten the end of the opium traffic with China. The London Friend for the last week says:

The facts of the situation in China are being recognized by the British Government, and Dr. Morrison writes that "there is widespread confidence that within one year, or at most within two years, the Indo-Chinese opium trade will no longer be in existence." Effort and prayer have not been in vain. The movement last year in Britain gathered strength, and in China the agitation spread apace, culminating in the anti-opium resolutions of the National Assembly demanding the immediate exclusion of the drug. The Chinese Government has every right as well as reason to ask for an earlier cessation of the traffic than was contemplated in 1907, when it was assumed that it would take ten years to stamp out the growth and use of opium.

* * * * *

According to the Times correspondent, British consent has been given (1) to the cessation, as soon as China has completely suppressed the growth of the poppy, of the importation of Indian opium; (2) to a triple increase in the duty; (3) to a modification of the original proposals respecting the accumulated stocks (some 20,000 chests) now in bond in the treaty ports; and (4) to an early revision of the agreement if circumstances require it.

Substituting Argument for Force

A complete Anglo-American arbitration treaty may become a reality within the next few weeks. The preparation of an agreement, in which Great Britain and the United States pledge themselves "to abide the adjudication of an international arbitration court in every issue which cannot be settled by negotiation," has so far progressed that it will probably be presented to the two governments within a week or ten days. Popular sentiment on both sides of the Atlantic is decidedly in favor of the compact, and it is hoped that the United States Senate will not stand in the way of its adoption, as it did with the treaty negotiated a few years ago. One of the most helpful signs from the other side was the holding of a large meeting in London, in which the Mayor of the city, Premier Asquith, former Premier Balfour, Sir Joseph G. Ward, Premier of New Zealand, and other notables expressed their hearty appreciation of the measure. Premier Asquith said:

The unique situation which we have met to recognize and welcome has not been organized or engineered by the apparatus of diplomacy. The seed which the President of the United States cast fell on the ground prepared to receive it. That which a few years ago, even a few months ago, might have been regarded as the dream of idealists has not only passed into the domain of practical statesmanship, but has become the settled purpose of two great democracies. The profound significance of the new departure is that between Great Britain and the United States, whatever the gravity of the issue and the magnitude of the interests involved, whatever the poignancy of the feelings it arouses, there will be a definite abandonment of war as a possible solution, and the substitution of argument for force, and the suppression by judicial methods of the old ordeal of battle.

He then embodied his thought in a resolution, which was seconded by ex-Premier Balfour. The leaders of the two great political parties thus became the champions of the measure.

Conservation is Constitutional

Since the inauguration of the conservation movement by ex-President Roosevelt, the withdrawal of public land for forest reserves, power sites and the like has been a hotly questioned policy. In a decision handed down last week, the United States Supreme Court unanimously sustained the right of the Government to control its public lands and to dispose of them as Congress may direct.

In one of the cases in question, a citizen of Colorado contended that he had a right to graze his cattle on the Holy Cross Forest Reserves until the Government complied with a State law which requires private citizens to fence their property before claiming damages. The court held that the National Government is not subject to State law. Colorado came to the assistance of its citizen and directed the State Attorney to take charge of the case. He denied that the Government had any constitutional right to "conserve the national resources" by providing for a continuing timber supply, regulating the flow of streams and preserving power sites from being monopolized. He urged that the withdrawal of such large tracts of land, said to be one-fifth of the entire area of Colorado, was the denial of equality with the older States, which had been allowed to exercise dominion over all their territory.

The Court, however, took the ground that the Federal Government owned the public land for the people of the United States, just as a private citizen owns land, and that it had a perfect right to regulate its use. Thus one, at least, of the difficulties that might stand in the way of an effective national policy of conservation is forever disposed of.

More Gospel Truth From Roosevelt

The fact that Samuel Gompers and other labor leaders began a public defense of the McNamara Brothers as soon as they were arrested, interpreting it as an attack on unionism, has moved the apostle of "the square deal" to put some very evident truths into very plain language. The following paragraph is taken from Theodore Roosevelt's editorial in last week's Outlook:

No worse service can be rendered by labor union leaders to the cause of unionism than that which they render when they seek to identify the cause of unionism with the cause of any man guilty of a murderous attack of this nature. I have no idea whether the men arrested on Mr. Burns' statements are or are not guilty; the labor leaders in question have no idea whether or not they are. They are entitled to an absolutely fair trial. If they have no money to provide counsel for themselves, then it would be entirely proper for any body of men to furnish them the requisite funds, simply as an incident in securing them a fair trial. But it is grossly improper to try to create a public opinion in favor of the arrested men simply because the crime of which they are accused is one committed against a capitalist or a corporation and because the men who are charged with committing it are members of a labor union. This is an iniquity as gross as it would have been if when, three years ago, the Sugar Trust was indicted for swindling operations in the New York Custom House, the forces of organized capital had been put behind the indicted men on the ground that the attack on capitalists guilty of crime meant an attack on all capital.

My Primary Class and the Graded Lessons

BY LYRA D. TRUEBLOOD.

The Lessons.

The "Beginners' Graded Series of Sunday School Lessons" is arranged in a two years' course, the year to begin October 1st. It is planned for children of four and five years of age. The second year follows the same general line of thought as the first, with repetition, emphasis and further illustration of topics studied before. The aim of the course is "to lead the little child to the Father" by helping him to know and love the heavenly Father and Jesus Christ, His Son, the Saviour and Friend of little children. There is a "Teacher's Text Book," issued in four parts, at 25 cents each. There are folders for the pupils, containing the story that is to be told in the lesson hour. These are 7½ cents a quarter for each child. Then there are large picture-cards, illustrating each lesson, which cost on an average 60 cents a quarter and are an almost indispensable part of the teacher's outfit. The children are always eager for the story period to come so they may know what the picture is to be. To these must be added a song-book, preferably "Songs for Little People," by Frances W. Danielson and Grace W. Conant. All these supplies are to be obtained at The Pilgrim Press, 14 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass. With these splendid helps in hand and a love for children, the success of the primary teacher ought to be assured.

Perhaps I can best give an idea of the contents of the course for the beginners by outlining the first year's lessons. There are 11 main topics, with several lessons under each:

1. "The Heavenly Father's Care."
 - a. "A Mother and Her Little Boy."
 - b. "Father and Mother Birds' Care."
 - c. "The Heavenly Father's Care for Birds and Animals."
 - d. "A Baby in a Basket Boat."
 - e. "How God Fed Elijah."
 - f. "The Heavenly Father's Care for His Children."
2. "Thanksgiving for Care."
3. "Thanksgiving for God's Best Gift."
4. "Love Shown Through Care."
5. "The Loving Care of Jesus."
6. "God's Care of Life."
7. "Our Part in the Care of Flowers and Birds."
8. "Duty of Loving Obedience."
9. "Love Shown by Prayer and Praise."
10. "Love Shown by Kindness (to those in the family circle)."
11. "Love Shown by Kindness (to those outside the family)."

These are so arranged that the topic, "Thanksgiving for Care," leads up to the Thanksgiving season, and the one, "Thanksgiving for God's Best Gift," to the Christmas time. Then in Third month begins the theme, "God's Care of Life," with the stories of winter's sleep and spring's awakening, preparing the way for the Easter lesson. Old Testament stories are interspersed with those from the life of the Saviour. During the first year's course we had such topics as: "The Gift of Day and Night," "Jacob's Ladder," "God's Garden," "The Pillar of Cloud and Fire," "The Giving of the Manna," "Daniel at Prayer," "David Praising God," "Stories from the Life of Joseph," etc. From the New Testament there were the stories of "The Baby Jesus," "The Shepherd and His Sheep," "The Good Samaritan," "Jesus Caring for Hungry People," "Jesus Loving Little Children," etc.

In the text book the lesson contains the Bible reference, the truth to be impressed, suggestions for pictures, songs, handwork and blackboard work. Then follows the outline of the hour's work, divided into two sections—the circle talk, which is informal and conversational, including always a review of the past lesson; the story period, with the lesson story in simple form for the teacher to relate. Between these two there is a suggestive song, a prayer and a rest exercise. A number of these rest exercises are given in an appendix, and consist of many kinds of motion exercises illustrative of the lesson themes, such as ringing Christmas bells, sleeping and waking of the flowers, swaying trees, falling snow, lullabies, fluttering leaves and so on, to relieve any tension the children may be under. We need always to remember how hard it is for little bodies or minds to keep at any one form of work for any length of time.

The course for the second year follows the same general outline, and is not more difficult nor advanced. There are many lessons quite similar to those of the previous year, some are repeated, others are entirely new. The 12 topics are:

1. "Our Heavenly Father's Protection."
2. "Thanksgiving for Protection."
3. "Thanksgiving for God's Best Gift."
4. "Our Heavenly Father's Protection in Nature."
5. "God Helping to Protect."
6. "Jesus the Helper and Saviour."
7. "Jesus Teaching to Pray."
8. "God's Gift of Life."
9. "God's Gift of the Wind, Sun and Rain."
10. "Jesus Teaching How to Help."
11. "Children Helping."
12. "Friendly Helpers."

With My Class.

I have found that although the course is planned for children of four and five, it is equally well suited for those of six and seven. Owing to local conditions in our school, my class has not been strictly graded, and in two cases I have had three children from the same home, the youngest in each case being a baby brother and sister still on the cradle roll and only just able to toddle to First-day school. The babies seem happy and the older ones proud and interested to be in the same department with the little folks. The ideal method, of course, is to have a department large enough to be subdivided, an assistant teacher taking the very smallest ones aside during the story period and telling them the story in a simpler way, using more of the kindergarten methods to hold their attention. But when there are only from six to ten in the class, it seems better to me to keep them all together. Provided the lesson be not made infantile, it can never be too simple for the child-mind. The greatest difficulty is to get a truth presented in a form which can be grasped and assimilated. The repetition of the stories, as planned for in this system, is one of its greatest advantages. How the children love an old, familiar tale, whether it be the story of the child Samuel, or the good Samaritan, or David and Goliath, or "How the Juniper Tree Got Its Berries"!

Recently our lessons have been about some of the heavenly Father's helpers—the wind, the rain and the sun. I have no hesitation in changing the order of the lessons to suit the conditions. For example, the Sunday when we were to talk of "The Sun as a Helper," it was a raw, bleak April day, with snow in the air. So I took up another lesson on "Jesus and His Friends," and left the "Sun" to warmer, brighter times. This is made very easy by getting the entire quarter's lessons thoroughly in mind at the beginning. Last Sunday was our first beautiful spring day. After we had had our opening exercises, singing "Father, We Thank Thee," a sentence prayer, collecting the pennies (for which one child stands and holds the box while we all march around, singing "Hear the Pennies Dropping"), and partially learning a new song for "Mothers' Sunday," we filed out, hand in hand, and took a walk around the block. I asked first what one of the heavenly Father's helpers we could see, and the answer came from several, "The sun." "And what is one of His other helpers doing?" "Why, the wind is blowing the leaves and the dust along the street." "Which helper has done something to the grass?" "The sun has made it green," was the prompt reply of a six-year-old lad. So we continued our walk, commenting on the things that came our way. Bird notes rang out clear and sweet. We stopped to listen. "I hear somebody telling the heavenly Father he is thankful for the warm sunshine and the spring breeze." "Oh, yes, the birdies." There was a bird-house in a tree to elicit further remarks as to ways we could help the Father care for His birds. In a neighboring yard, behind a hedge, was a bed of tulips and daffodils; we all mounted some stone steps better to see their brightness and beauty. Yonder some bright eyes spied two bits of dandelions peeping through the grass; and so the ten or fifteen minutes passed and we had a most vivid illustration of the lesson, "Caring for Flowers and Birds."

"The merest grass along the roadside when we pass,
Lichen and moss and sturdy weed,
Tell of His love who sends the dew,
The rain and sunshine, too,
To nourish one small seed."

When we got back to the meeting-house steps, we sat down in the sunshine and I told the lesson story and then asked for the verses we had learned the previous Sundays about the wind and the rain and the sun. As we went in to the closing exercises, it was with a sense of exhilaration and the consciousness that we had had something of which the rest of the school knew nothing—it had been so novel and entrancing to steal quietly out and in again with no one knowing just where we had been nor what we had seen and talked about.

To go back to the old system of formal lessons would be to me an impossibility. When, for example, the lesson was from Paul's Epistle to the Roman Church, what could I teach my little folks? There was nothing to do but work out a new lesson of one's own. With these delightfully gotten-up teacher's text books, folders and pictures, the way of the busy teacher is made comparatively easy. One can follow the suggestions without being in any way slavish or lacking in originality. The conversational method with children, followed by a story period, always brings out novelty and variety, for when did ever children answer questions in the way the teacher anticipated? There is great possibility in the graded lessons for leading the little child to know and love his Father in Heaven.

"My opportunity! Dear Lord, I do not ask
That thou shouldst give me some high work of thine,
Some noble calling or some wondrous task—
Give me a little hand to hold in mine.

"Give me a little child to point the way
Over the strange, sweet path that leads to Thee;
Give me a little voice to teach to pray;
Give me two shining eyes Thy face to see.

"The only crown I ask, dear Lord, to wear,
Is this—that I may teach a little child
How beautiful, O! how divinely fair
Is Thy dear face, so loving, sweet and mild!

"I do not need to ask for more than this.
My opportunity—'tis standing at my door;
What sorrow if this blessing I should miss!
A little child! Why should I ask for more?

The California Field

BY HERMON D. WILLIAMS.

The Work of Friends in the City of Los Angeles.

The tide of events and the force of surroundings hold out to few cities such brilliant promise of enlargement as that which they bestow upon Los Angeles, California. The seers of a century have seen that the Pacific Ocean and its islands and shores are to be the chief theater of the world's great events in the future, and the location of Los Angeles on the most direct route to the Orient, and the assured completion of a harbor that will make it a port of call for the world's commerce that shall crowd the isthmus canal, will constitute it one of the principal gateways to this new arena of the world's larger activities. Add to these advantages a tributary country that excels Egypt in extent and fertility, and the coming of an aqueduct that shall bear to its gates the waters of a mountain river for use in all future time, and which shall generate electric power without limit, and it is conclusive that Los Angeles is soon to be one of the commanding cities of the continent.

Only seven blocks from the pulsing heart of this city, now numbering 325,000 souls, a Friends meeting, numbering about 140 resident members, is located; and this congregation, small though it is, must be an object of interest to every Friends Church in America because of the problems imposed by its surroundings and because of the widening opportunities that await it. Who that reads these lines will not breathe a prayer that this congregation may be a "Gideon's Band" in assailing the forces of evil in a great city and that its place of worship may be a Bethel to all the Friends from the East who shall tour the "Land of Sunshine" through the years to come?

The work in Los Angeles experienced not a few vicissitudes before it reached the stage of an organized meeting. At its very beginning a few scattered Friends, under a longing for the simple service of their fathers, met for worship sometime in 1892 in a hall on Belmont Avenue, near the present high school. For the most part, theirs was a silent meeting, like those of the olden time, and they were only a little flock, including Fred. and Dora Jones, William and Martha Denby, Leon Scheck, and Editor Hammer, of the Hotel Gazette. Some months later they met a few times in the Methodist Church South, then on South Broadway. J. E. Coffin and wife, Wm. E. Cox and family and others having joined the pioneer band, they secured rooms in Temperance Temple, and Charles E. Tebbetts for quite a period served them as pastor. The Bible school, which had been maintained from the beginning, here enlisted a large attendance outside the membership.

Their numbers having become depleted later by removals, the meeting was next held for a time in the law office of Wm. E. Cox, where Josephine Marlott took a leading part in Gospel service.

The next station in the itinerancy was a storeroom on Downey Avenue, East Los Angeles, where the work enlarged into quite a city mission, under the direction of Preston and Emma Mills, with Robert Samms as superintendent of the Bible school. And here comes in a little romance of the Kotzebue Mission. Carrie Rowe was converted through the little Church here while Robert Samms was active in its work as head of the Bible school, and when later the yearly meeting board was seeking a man and his wife to accompany Anna Hunnicutt to the far North, these young people solved the question by getting married and thus fulfilling the conditions for a work to which they felt their hearts drawn, and the sequel was a honeymoon trip to the Arctic and several years of faithful and successful service there. That the nuptial event, only a question of time, was hastened by the emergency was regarded by all as in the ordering of the Lord.

Valuable additions to the mission workers who had arrived in the meantime were David and Rhoda M. Hare and Walter and Sarah C. W. Nordhoff, Rhoda M. Hare being made pastor by the yearly meeting committee in charge.

And now came the final steps to a permanent organization. William P. and Matilda Brown had located in the vicinity of Fourth Street and Fremont Avenue in 1894, where David and Rhoda M. Hare joined them in Tenth month, 1896. These and members in other parts of the city felt that it would be right to start a work in this locality. Matilda Brown, assisted by her husband and by Cynthia B. Stanley, secured subscriptions to the amount of $119.72, with which a vacant school building on Figuerora Street, near by, was purchased and furnished, and a Bible school was organized Fifth month 9, 1897. A specially interesting feature of the school was a very large class of neighborhood children, gathered in and taught by Matilda Brown. Seventh month 11, 1897, Levi Gregory, evangelistic superintendent, here organized a meeting for worship, with Rhoda M. Hare, pastor; Matilda Brown, clerk and treasurer; Eva Bowman, organist, and Eddy L. Brown, chorister.

Ninth month 11th of the same year, a monthly meeting was organized at the mission on the east side by a committee of Pasadena Quarterly Meeting, including Seth W. Pearson, Mary G. Cooper, Margaret B. Smith and Amos Walton. Levi Gregory preached, David Hare served as clerk, and the names of 24 charter members were read. Permanent officers, appointed at a later session, were: David Hare, clerk; Nettie Beeson, assistant; Preston Mills, treasurer; Martha Denby, John F. McLamore, James and Elizabeth Rice, overseers; Matilda Brown, elder. A little later the work at the mission was relinquished to another denomination and the monthly meeting was held at the building on Figuerora Street.

The next work was to provide a permanent church home, and in this Friends here had the valuable counsel of Charles E. Tebbetts and Eleazer Andrews, who took a deep interest from the start. These two Friends, in company with Wm. P. Brown and wife and David Hare and wife, when one day looking over the different sites offered, knelt upon a vacant lot and prayed for direction, after which they felt united in choosing the lot at the corner of Third Street and Fremont Avenue, offered at $600. Sarah C. W. Nordhoff, who before going East had contributed $50, was communicated with, and responded with the needed $550. Rhoda M. Hare, released from the duties of pastor by Ervin G. Taber taking the place for a time, led in the campaign for subscriptions. When $600 was secured, work on the new meeting-house was commenced, T. K. Bufkin serving as foreman and Charles E. Tebbetts assisting greatly in the planning. The enterprise was a heavy undertaking for the little band of Friends, but Third month 17, 1901, found them ready for dedicatory services, which were conducted by David Hadley, assisted by Rhoda M. Hare.

In First month, 1902, Levi D. Barr was chosen pastor, and he was succeeded in order by Frank Cornell and H. Edwin McGrew. Thomas Armstrong, Charles E. Tebbetts and W. Mahlon Perry all filled the place at times, pending the regular appointment of a pastor. Wallace E. Gill, Ohio, entered the work something less than a year ago. He is one of several pastors in this yearly meeting who were not originally Friends and who, in pursuing Gospel work under the auspices of our Society, at a considerable sacrifice in some ways, signify their convictions as to the importance of the mission of Quakerism to the world. Wallace E. Gill's initial work as pastor was at Camp Chase, Columbus, and he later served most acceptably at Alliance and Damascus, Ohio. In the meantime he also gave a year to the work of field secretary of the Foreign Missionary Board of Ohio Yearly Meeting. The Ministerial Association of Los Angeles has honored him by making him its secretary, and he is meeting the exacting demands made upon a pastor in a great city with devotion and efficiency. A Bible school of notable interest is maintained in this meeting under the superintendency of Prof. Arthur C. Brown, a striking feature being that children constitute fully one-half the membership.

This meeting is well represented in the public schools by Arthur C. Brown, Alice Ball, Olive Howard and Alice and Emily Johnson. Prof. Arthur Brown has a principalship that brings 1,000 students under his direction.

Prof. Robert C. Root, of this meeting, is doing notable work in the peace cause. As yearly meeting superintendent of peace and as secretary of the Pacific branch of the American Peace Society, his work embraces our entire Pacific coast, and is prosecuted with a system and energy which give it an outlook that is full of promise.

Anna Hill, whose membership is here, is teaching in connection with a mission in Yokohama, Japan, and Wilfred and Della Rowntree, among the active members of this meeting, are well known by their missionary work in Palestine in years past.

The opportunity for missionary work among the Japanese, numbering 5,000 in the city, has claimed the serious attention of the meeting, but the financial demands of the undertaking are beyond the means at its command. Two Japanese missions are conducted in the city by other denominations, but a section of several blocks not far from the business center, wholly occupied by Japanese, is without any settled work of this kind. The establishment of a Christian home and school in this district offers an inviting field to some Friend, or Friends, whom the Lord has blessed with abundant means, especially as the 20,000 Japanese in southern California would largely come in touch with this center of their population and business interests.

A Medical Missionary's Professional Call

BY DR. WM. W. CADBURY.

As the work of the university medical school becomes better known, calls come from Canton and the neighboring villages, but because of our limited number and the calls at home, we hesitate to visit these patients unless the people can make a remuneration. A few days ago one of the boys in the college asked me to visit his mother, who resides half a day's travel from here. This boy became a Christian about a year ago, but on account of the opposition of his father to this faith, he has not confessed it to his family, with the exception of his mother and sister. He is a member of a family of 12 children. He has a brother in business in Shanghai, and one a student in Japan. We started out about 5.30 A. M., crossed the river in a rowboat, then took a 'ricksha to a passage boat, on which we were to be towed by a steam launch to the village. The ride was most attractive. As one left Canton in the distance, the aspect of the country changed from low-lying rice fields, submerged in water, to high land covered with mulberry trees, with many ponds interspersed in which fish are extensively cultivated. About 10 o'clock in the morning we had our breakfast. My hunger made it easy to manage chop-sticks, and three bowls of rice were readily disposed of. That is to say, my appetite was good, for, instead of asking how one is, the doctor inquires how many bowls of rice you can eat. One bowl signifies a poor appetite; two bowls, fair, while three bowls is normal.

At noon the launch slowed down to permit a small boat to come alongside to take us ashore, after which a walk of one-half mile brought us to the spacious home of my patient. I was ushered into a large reception-hall, where the head of the household, an elderly man, was seated, reading. He arose on my approach and we bowed, and tea was served. The eldest son, who had returned from Shanghai on account of his mother's illness, and several other relatives came in. Mr. Maak (for that is the family name) seemed quite delighted to find that I could speak his tongue a little, and he discoursed at length on the virtues of the analects of Confucius and the writings of Mencius and other Chinese classics. I accepted his statements as politely and truthfully as I could. After an hour's conversation, it was announced that the patient was ready. Mr. Maak has two wives, and it was the first or chief wife who was ill. My young friend who had brought me to see his mother is the son of the second wife or concubine. The bedroom was unusually well ventilated for a Chinese house, and the lady was reclining on a Chinese bed. One daughter was seated tailor-fashion on the bed beside her, another daughter was seated at the head of the bed, while two other daughters were seated beside it; and the eldest son was also present. After a careful examination, I found that the patient was suffering from an early case of tuberculosis. Careful directions were given, and I was pleased to see my patient, later in the day, seated on a small veranda.

The visit over, my young friend took me to see the ancestral hall of the head of the Maak family. This was indeed a most imposing structure. In front of the main entrance rose the tall degree poles of the ancestors who, under the ancient system of education, had acquired high degrees of scholarship. Behind the hall was a grove of banyan trees and a high artificial mound raised to ward off evil spirits. Above the massive portal one might read, in large Chinese characters, "Main Ancestral Hall of the Maak Family." Within, the hall was seen to consist of three great pavilions. The first is the entrance lobby. The second is used two or three times a year, when the members of the clan meet together at great feasts. The last and highest pavilion shows the ancestral tablets arranged in tiers. In the highest tier there are two tablets representing the man and his wife who came from a distant province and settled in this village many hundreds of years ago. My companion expatiated on the folly of this adoration and worship of ancestors, but I could not but be reminded of the enthusiasm with which many of my friends in England and America devote themselves to making out ancestral trees. Would it not be wiser to plan for brilliant accomplishments of our successors rather than to spend the time in glorying over the achievements of our ancestors?

On returning from our walk, I found another relative waiting to be examined. The poor fellow was in the last stages of consumption. His sleeping-room, I discovered, was absolutely devoid of any ventilation of any kind except for a very small aperture in the high ceiling. At 7 o'clock my friend and I sat down to the evening meal, which was composed of rice in bowls, hashed chicken, pork, fish, fried shrimps, finely-chopped vegetables and mushrooms. After dinner the elder brother came in, and we had a most interesting talk. He is quite a man of affairs, having traveled in Japan, Peking and elsewhere in China. After he had left, the brother who had brought me to see his mother and I read a chapter from the Chinese New Testament and had a little time in prayer together.

It seems hard to think of this young man, one of two Christians in this town of 10,000 souls and the only Christian in his home. I noticed that he kept a New Testament in his mother's bedroom, and he told me that his sister was reading it. Afterwards we had a good little talk together and the sister came in for the final directions in regard to her mother for the night. I was weary, and found the springless bedstead a very comfortable resting-place. The next morning, after a brief visit to each of the patients, and a good breakfast, I got aboard the steam launch and so returned to Canton.

One cannot appreciate the difficulties that the Chinese Christians must meet until he visits them in their homes. How different the situation is with us, who receive the strongest impulses for right living from our parents and relations. Fortunately in our work here in Canton the students are living right with us most of the year, during the most important period of their lives, and, with the help of God's Holy Spirit, I believe an impression is made on many of them that even the influence of a heathen home cannot efface.

After such visits as this which I have just described, one feels more than ever the grave responsibilities which are imposed upon each one of us who has received Christian training in a Christian home.

The Cox Family in America

The Cox family is one of the oldest of the colonial families of America. Its earliest representative, one William Cox, emigrated to Virginia in 1610. Under various spellings, as Cock, Cocks, Cox and Coxe, the name is of frequent occurrence in the early annals of Virginia and of New England, and, a little later, in those of New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. In fact, wherever English colonies were planted, whether in the West Indies, on Long Island, or along the Atlantic coast from Maine to the Carolinas, the family appears to have been numerous represented.

To outline the history and genealogy of distinct families of the name, and to record the achievements of such individuals among them as have left something more than "footprints on the sands of time," is a task which has been already, in some measure, accomplished.

It is proposed to issue, as soon as practicable, a volume of from 300 to 500 pages which shall contain the results of some years of historical and genealogical research. It will deal to some extent with the question of the English ancestry of the numerous Cox families in America, but more particularly with the genealogies of those which have been long established. It will include biographical sketches of many whose names are widely known, and of others who have made but little stir in the world, but whose records are not less interesting and worthy of preservation. This part of the book will be edited by [Rev.] Henry M. Cox.

This book will include the "Genealogy of the Cock, Cocks, Cox Family," as descended from James and Sarah Cock, whose first appearance in America seems to have been at Southold, Long Island, N. Y., in 1659, coming thither, according to tradition, from England by way of the Bermuda Islands. The records of New York Monthly Meeting give: "The children of James and Sarah Cock of Killingworth:

Mary Cock.....	was born ye 1st day of ye 11th mo. 1655
Thomas Cock.....	was born ye 15th of ye 8th mo. 1858
Martha Cock.....	was born ye 7th mo. 1661
John Cock.....	was born ye 22d of ye 11th mo. 1666
Hannah Cock.....	was born ye 5th of ye 6th mo. 1669
Sarah Cock.....	was born ye 20th of ye 7th mo. 1672
James Cock.....	was born ye 4th of ye 2d mo. 1674
Henry Cock.....	was born ye 1st of ye 2d mo. 1678
Martha Cock.....	was born ye 13th day of ye 2d mo. 1680

This part of the book will be edited by George W. Cocks.

Of the Pennsylvania branches of the descendants of James and Sarah, little is yet known. Their daughter, Hannah, married, 1682, James Delaplaine, and settled at Germantown. Among their descendants are Simpsons, Ridgways, Hollands and others. Martha Cock, born 1680, married Isaac Deaves (pronounced, and now spelled Davis), and removed to Germantown. Their children were: 1. Sarah, born about 1710; married John Gummere, an ancestor of Francis B., of Haverford. 2. Hannah. 3. Thomas, born about 1714; married, 1735, his cousin, Hannah Cock. 4. Joseph, born about 1717; married, 1738, Elizabeth ———. 5. Samuel, born about 1719; married Mary Thomas. 6. Abraham, born 1721; married, 1747, Priscilla Thomas, of Williston (a cousin of Mary). 7. Mary, born 1723, married ——— Streeter.

Benjamin Cock, son of Henry, and grandson of James and Sarah, married, 1737, Ann, daughter of Joseph and Martha (Pierce) Brinton, of Thornbury. He was recommended as a minister by Concord Monthly Meeting, 1729, and discontinued, 1777, for drinking to excess. Their children were: 1. James, born 1732; married, 1761, his cousin, Dorothy Cock, who returned to Long Island after his death. 2. John, born 1735; disowned 1761, perhaps for marrying out. 3. Benjamin, born 1737; married, 1766, Mary, daughter of Samuel and Susannah (Powell) Talkington, of Concord. 4. Mary, born 1739; married, 1765, Josiah Haines. 5. Moses, born 1742; married, 1766, Hannah, daughter of Nathaniel and Elizabeth Evinson; and disowned 1775. 6. Ann, born 1745; married, 1769, Thomas Marshall, of Pennsbury Township. 7. Joseph Brinton, born 1755; married, 1782, Elizabeth ———; and disowned by Birmingham Monthly Meeting.

The descendants of these are not yet traced, and this is published in the hope that it may reach the eyes of some of them and lead to correspondence. The name has probably been changed to Cox in these branches as in many of the branches far removed from Long Island. There are descendants also of the names of Lamborn, May and Harvey. As the book will soon go to press, clues of any kind are much desired at once.

The other Quaker families of Cock, Cocks and Cox, in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and the South are being traced by Rev. Henry H. Cox, who desires correspondence with them.

The success of the undertaking, which has already involved no small expenditure of time and money, will depend largely upon the number of advance subscriptions which may be received.

The book will be illustrated with portraits and otherwise, and printed on good paper, in clear type, and will be substantially bound in cloth or morocco, as subscribers may prefer.

To advance subscribers the price has been fixed at $5.00 per copy, bound in cloth, and $8.00 per copy, bound in morocco; carriage, 30 cents. The edition will be limited and these prices are subject to advance after the date of issue. Orders may be sent to George W. Cocks, Glen Cove, Nassau County, N. Y.; or to John Cox, Jr., 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

E. Howard Brown attended the meetings of Bangor and Stanford, Iowa, the 23d ult., in the interests of education.

* * *

Orin Hutchins and wife, of Valton, Wis., expect to leave their pastoral work Sixth month and enter the evangelistic field.

* * *

C. J. Bowles and wife have taken charge of the church at Stockport, Iowa, where meeting had been discontinued for some years.

* * *

Andrew Young, of Colby College Y. M. C. A. attended meeting at Oak Grove the 23d ult. and talked in a helpful and inspiring way.

* * *

Ralph and Ruby Clem, pastors in Pleasant Ridge meeting, near Coon Rapids Iowa, are fitting into the work nicely and are giving very satisfactory service.

* * *

The meeting at Bear Creek, Iowa, has unanimously called W. S. Hitch to remain as pastor another year. He has already served the meeting two years.

* * *

The special meetings were held recently in Prairieville meeting near Marshalltown, Iowa. A Bible School has been organized and regular services will be held hereafter.

* * *

I. Warren Fox was greatly appreciated in the ministry at Winthrop Monthly Meeting held at Manchester, Me., the 27th ult. He is doing excellent service as pastor in this meeting.

* * *

Friends at the Silsbee Street Meeting, Lynn, Mass., recently welcomed nine members into their midst, all by request. Eight of these are from the Bible School and six belong to the Christian Endeavor Society.

* * *

The news of Charles H. Wood's death will come as a sad surprise to a number of Friends. He was hurt by falling from a ladder and survived only three days. His sons, Walter H., and George, were with him before he passed away.

* * *

Miss Lewis, secretary for New England secondary schools, was present at the Y. W. C. A. meeting the evening of the 30th ult. Her presence and help were a blessing to the members of the association, who gladly welcome her to Oak Grove.

* * *

William Jasper Hadley, Superintendent of Evangelistic Work in Iowa Yearly Meeting, has returned to his home in Marshalltown from Haviland, Kans., where he was called on account of his wife's illness, she having been taken sick while visiting their daughter and family.

The Penn College Glee Club has completed their annual series of engagements. Since First month 20th they have given entertainments at Richland, West Branch, Muscatine, Wright, Oskaloosa, Marshalltown, LeGrande, New Providence, Hubbard, New Sharon, and Lynnvile. The boys are well trained, and are a credit to the college which they represent.

* * *

Cyrus Harvey, of Kansas, is visiting with Friends in and about Philadelphia. First-day the 30th ult. he was present at an appointed meeting in Mt. Holly, N. J., where the public were generally invited. Walter T. Moore and Nathaniel Jones also took part in the vocal service.

* * *

Oak Grove people are always pleased when Charles Woodman visits the Seminary, and they gladly listen to the messages which God gives him for them. His sermon during the recent Board conference was particularly adapted to the congregation to whom it came as an uplifting spiritual blessing.

* * *

The meeting at Woonsocket, R. I., is manifesting new life. William J. Boyce has been doing pastoral work in the meeting during the past year. Five new members were received at the recent session of the monthly meeting, four of whom have been regular attenders of the Round Table during the winter. Altogether seven active and three associate members have been received during the year.

Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood conducted the services very acceptably at the Friends Meeting, Boston, Mass., Fourth month 16th, the occasion being his last meeting with Boston Friends before moving to Washington, D. C., the new headquarters of the American Peace Society. He has been in the meeting nineteen years, and a large number of Friends in and around Boston were present wishing him increased usefulness in the new field.

Dr. William L. Pearson of Friends University, finds time in addition to his work at the University, to agitate the subject of simplified spelling. We have just received a marked copy of the Wichita "Daily Beacon" with a spicy article which he had furnished on the "Simpler Way to Spell,"—the point of the article being that English spelling is a human invention with human aggravations, and can be reformed just as soon as a favorable sentiment on the subject can be created.

Friends of Mount Pleasant, Ohio, held services commemorating the Ter-Centenary of the authorized version of the Bible on the evening of Fourth month 23d. A passage of Scripture was read and prayer offered by the pastor, I. L. Kinsey, who also stated briefly the purpose of the meeting. A paper entitled "1611-1911" was read by Paul H. Wright, Principal of the local High School. Twenty-one of the young people gave an impressive missionary exercise on "The Bible in All Lands." E. B. Jones read William Thornberry's poetical tribute to the book. Special music was rendered appropriate for the occasion.

Surry Quarterly Meeting of Friends convened at Westfield, N. C., Fourth month 22d. During the opening meeting for worship Eli Reece, of Greensboro, preached a very helpful and interesting sermon. During the intermission which followed a splendid dinner was served by some ladies of the church, then the meeting on Ministry and Oversight convened, and following this came the business session. The clerk being absent, Samuel R. Pickett was appointed clerk for the day. The most important business transacted was the setting up of a monthly meeting at Blue Ridge Mission, Va. Samuel

R. Pickett told something of his work in Elkhorn, West Va. On First-day morning Eli Reece gave a missionary lecture. He used charts and maps, which made it quite interesting.

The ministers present at quarterly meeting were Eli Reece, Wesley Wooten, Jasper Cain and Samuel R. Pickett.

Friendsville Quarterly Meeting, held at Maryville, Tenn., the 21st to 23d ult., was favored with the presence and ministry of Levi Mills, of Wilmington Yearly Meeting, and Margaret Graves and Sister of Ohio Yearly Meeting. The latter are now in charge of a mission school in North Carolina.

The commencement exercises at Friendsville Academy took place the 25th to 27th ult. The school has had a good year with an enrollment of 125, eight of whom have just completed the course. All the entertainments were exceptionally good, with large appreciative audiences to enjoy them.

Prof. D. W. Lawrence is retained as principal.

For the first time in over thirty years Scipio Quarterly Meeting was held at Union Springs, N. Y., the 28th to 30th ult. The sessions were held at The Oakwood Seminary and were well attended. Margaret A. Holme, a Friends Missionary for fifteen years at Luh Hoh, China, and M. K. Ts'en, of Chungking, West China, were visiting Friends present. They both spoke very interestingly and instructively at the Missionary Conference on Seventh-day evening. M. K. Ts'en is a former pupil of Robert L. Simkin and is one of the 'Indemnity Fund' students sent to Cornell University by the Chinese Government. The quarterly meeting was an occasion of blessing and uplift and was fittingly brought to a close by a gospel meeting on First-day evening in charge of Richard R. Newby, Yearly Meeting Superintendent of Evangelistic Work. By the courteous invitation of the Baptists, the meeting was held in their church building and the Methodists and Presbyterians also joined in Christian fellowship.

As announced last week, arrangements have been perfected for transferring the work of the Friends Africa Industrial Mission Board to the American Friends Board, but final transfer of property, etc., will be delayed, possibly, a couple of years.

The work is now under the care of a Field Committee appointed by the American Board and it will report to them, and all funds will pass through the Treasurer of the American Board. The former Treasurer of the F. A. I. M. will continue to collect funds but will transfer them to our Treasurer and all payments will be made through our Treasurer.

The names of the Field Committee are as follows: Peter Raidabaugh, Wm. C. Taber, Emma B. Malone, Henry H. Sutton, Harry R. Keats, Eliza C. Armstrong, Charles Roberts and Edgar H. Stranahan.

This committee met and organized by appointment of Wm. C. Taber as chairman, and Emma B. Malone, secretary. The outlook for the future of the work is very encouraging.

Oak Grove Seminary has increased its enrollment this year. The Board of Managers met recently at Vassalboro, Me., and reviewed the work of the institution. They are endeavoring to increase the religious and educational efficiency of the school and to correlate its work with that of the town of Vassalboro, thus bringing the Seminary into touch with the life of the neighborhood. For this purpose they have asked Elam and Elda Henderson to reside in the Seminary and assist in this work. The school is well organized for Christian culture and activity. Every student has two recitations per week in the Scriptures and is required to maintain a standing in this as in other subjects, there being regular monthly tests. There are meetings on First and Fourth-day mornings. Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. meetings First-day evenings. A missionary class for girls and a Bible reading company of boys, which meets daily.

Arrangements have been made to labor in conjunction with East Vassalboro Friends during the summer.

The 23d ult. was a day long to be remembered by the Friends of Knightstown, Ind., it being the thirty-fifth anniversary of the dedication of their house and establishment of the local meeting. Suitable arrangements had been made to appropriately celebrate the occasion. After the opening exercises of music, scripture reading and prayer, an interesting history of the origin and early struggles of the congregation was read by Sophia Keys. Docie Byrket read a number of letters received from absent members with messages of greeting for the occasion, some of them containing substantial evidence of abiding interest in the church in the form of a thank offering. A letter of especial interest was the one from John Henry Douglas, of Pasadena, Cal., who assisted in dedicating the meeting house thirty-five years ago. Mary B. Charles called the roll of members, 293 in all, the responses being texts of Scripture. Seth Stafford, of the Clear Spring neighborhood, expressed his great pleasure in being present, having attended the dedication as a member of the committee appointed to establish the meeting. It seemed manifest to all of the large congregation that praise and gratitude to God were due for his manifold goodness to this church.

The following evening there was a social gathering at the meeting house which was attended by the members, and a few invited guests. An interesting program was given at that time. Dr. T. R. Woodard read some thoughts appropriate to the occasion, arranged in poetical form. George Bird gave a brief talk on the early history of Friends in this county, especially around Raysville. M. C. Pearson, a former pastor here, spoke of the high appreciation of the friendship and fellowship of the church and community, and gave some helpful words of counsel about future work of the church. It will be remembered that he started the remonstrance fight here some years ago, and he took occasion to encourage every voter to vote against the open saloon. Some information about the early struggles of the membership to build the house was given by John Keys. Light refreshments were served and the social part of the occasion was greatly enjoyed by all. Under the efficient leadership of the present pastor, Esther Cook, the church is taking on new life and all will remember this anniversary as a delightful event.

The International Bible School Lesson

SECOND QUARTER, LESSON VIII.

FIFTH MONTH 21, 1911

SONG OF THE VINEYARD.

(Temperance Lesson.)

ISAIAH 5: 1-12.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink. Isa 5: 22.

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fifth month 15th. Song of the Vineyard. Isa 5: 1-12.

Third-day. Captivity of drunkenness. Isa 5: 13-23.

Fourth-day. Crown of pride. Isa 28: 1-13.

Fifth-day. Bring and let us drink. Amos 4: 1-13.

Sixth-day. Wine in bowls. Amos 6: 1-11.

Seventh-day. Shall come to poverty. Prov. 23: 1-21.

First-day. Woes of the drunkard. Prov. 23: 29-35.

Time.—Uncertain, but probably soon after Isaiah began to prophesy (749 B. C.).

Place.—Jerusalem.

Kings.—In Israel, Menahem; in Judah, Ahazor; Jotham (?); Assyria, Asshur-dan III.

Contemporary prophets.—Hosea, Micah, possibly Amos.

Beautiful and inspiring and comforting as parts of Isaiah are, there are warnings and reproaches and foretellings of evil as well. This lesson is one of the latter. As a piece of literary and rhetorical composition it is very effective. The parable with which the chapter opens is tender in its touches and picturesque in its presentation. Many a vineyard such as he portrays could be seen from the walls of Jerusalem to point the lesson of his words.

1. "Let me sing for my well beloved." R. V. Vineyards were on hillsides.

2. "And he made a trench about it." R. V. "Built a tower." A watch tower from which the watchman could see any thieves or wandering animals which might injure the vines. "Hewed out a wine press." R. V. This was made in the rocky ground. Lower than the press was the vat to contain the juice which ran out from the press above. These vats were about four feet square and three feet deep. After all the care and expense which the owner had expended, his crop was wild, that is, sour grapes unfit for good wine.

3, 4. He appeals to the men of Jerusalem to give their opinion as to what should be done, but without waiting, he goes on, implying that there can be but one answer.

5. "And now go to." "And now, I will tell you." R. V. "Go to" is an obsolete expression. The hedge shall be taken down and the vineyard shall become pasture ("it shall be eaten up"). The stone wall shall be broken down and the place return to its former wild condition. The allegory evidently refers to Judah. Compare Psa. 80: 8-16.

6. It shall not simply be dismantled and left to itself, but it shall receive special punishment—the allegory turns into a scarcely veiled prophecy which in the next verse is openly proclaimed as applying to the house of Israel.

7. The open application of the parable. The original has a remarkable assonance of words which is not possible to translate. It has been attempted in a paraphrase as follows: "And I hoped for good rule, and behold blood rule, And for law-keeping, and behold law-breaking." The lesson is that nations as well as individuals are called upon to bring forth fruits of righteousness. Continuance in selfishness, luxury, sin, bring about in the long run destruction. No civilization is secure if it tolerates sin and vice. History is full of examples—Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Greece, Rome, Spain, all fell because of unrighteousness in some shape. It is just as sure as that continued course in vice ruins an individual.

8. There now follows a series of strophes—seven in number—each of which begins with "Woe!" and is directed against some special corrupt phase or vice of society. The first woe is against the selfish greed for land. The land of the poor is bought up or seized by the rich, one of the features of a corrupt civilization. It has been well said, "In every civilization the two main possessions of the human heart, love of wealth and love of pleasure, the instinct to gather and the instinct to squander, have sought precisely these two forms denounced by Isaiah in which to work their social havoc—appropriation of the soil and indulgence in strong drink. Every civilized community develops sooner or later its land question and its liquor question." The economic conditions and laws of the Hebrews rendered such methods as Isaiah denounces not difficult of fulfilment. Compare Micah 2: 1-9.

9. The result of joining house to house and laying field to field.

10. A statement of how production falls off under such a system. The measures are approximately rendered—the exact meaning of the Hebrew words is not known. An acre here is literally a "yoke," meaning as much as a yoke of oxen could plow in a day. This is more than a modern acre. A "homer" is equivalent to about 85 gallons; a "bath" is about 8 gallons; an "ephah" is about the same. That is, that 85 gallons of seed only yield 8 gallons of a crop. A certain mark of divine displeasure.

11. A second and worse "woe"—that against the use of intoxicating liquor. "That tarry late into the night." R. V. From early morning till late at night. Men wholly given over to the use of liquor.

12. The harp, the lute, the tambourine beguile the hours. Compare Amos 6: 1, 3-6.

13. "Therefore," etc. "Nothing kills the conscience like steady drinking to a little excess." The picture is completed in the succeeding verses. Stronger language could hardly be used. "Temperance reformers are often blamed for the strength of their language, but they may shelter themselves behind Isaiah." If his words were true of fermented liquors, what would he have said of the modern distilled spirits!

Notices

At the annual meeting of Friends Freedmen's Association, the principal of Christiansburg Industrial Institute appealed for contributions of partly worn clothing and shoes, which are very much appreciated at the school. The sewing school and shoe cobbling department are ready to put these things into good shape before they are sold or given to very needy recipients. New material for the sewing school is especially appreciated. All contributions to be sent should be at Friends Institute, 20 S. 12th Street, Philadelphia, not later than Fifth month

FOOD IN SERMONS

FEED THE DOMINIE RIGHT AND THE SERMONS ARE BRILLIANT.

A conscientious, hard-working and successful clergyman writes: "I am glad to bear testimony to the pleasure and increased measure of efficiency and health that have come to me from adopting Grape-Nuts food as one of my articles of diet."

"For several years I was much distressed during the early part of each day by indigestion. My breakfast seemed to turn sour and failed to digest. After dinner the headaché and other symptoms following the breakfast would wear away, only to return, however, next morning."

"Having heard of Grape-Nuts food, I finally concluded to give it a trial. I made my breakfast of Grape-Nuts with cream, toast and Postum. The result was surprising in improved health and total absence of the distress that had, for so long a time, followed the morning meal."

"My digestion became once more satisfactory, the headaches ceased, and the old feeling of energy returned. Since that time I have always had Grape-Nuts food on my breakfast table."

"I was delighted to find also, that whereas before I began to use Grape-Nuts food I was quite nervous and became easily wearied in the work of preparing sermons and in study, a marked improvement in this respect resulted from the change in my diet."

"I am convinced that Grape-Nuts food produced this result and helped me to a sturdy condition of mental and physical strength."

"I have known of several persons who were formerly troubled as I was, and who have been helped as I have been, by the use of Grape-Nuts food, on my recommendation." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

17th, plainly marked, "For Christiansburg Industrial Institute."

The trustees of Hesper Academy, located at Hesper, Kansas, are desirous of securing a competent person to fill the position of principal of the school and also as pastor of the meeting.

The prospect for the ensuing year is encouraging.

Anyone wishing to make application will please do so at an early date.

Prayer for Peace

Dedicated to the Third National Peace Congress

God of our fathers, God of the nations,
Sovereign supreme over all the wide world,
Here would we praise Thee with heartfelt oblations
Here while the banner of peace is unfurled.

Lord of the centuries, pardon the ages
Dark with the terrors of battle and blood;
Give forth Thy light and unfold the bright pages—
Glorious era of true brotherhood.

Judge of all people, still with us pleading,
Teach us Thy justice and reason and right;
Give us the courage to follow Thy leading,
Children of liberty, children of light.

Rise, O America, rise in thy splendor,
Lead forth the nations to war against war;
Stand for the highest, be Freedom's defender,
Brotherhood, justice and peace evermore.

Seventh-day. The effect. Acts 2: 41-47.

How did Japan first reject, then accept, the gospel?

What effects has the gospel produced in Japan?

Tell of gospel triumphs in Korea.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE MISSIONARY COMMITTEE.

1. The Missionary Review of the World for March, 1911, has two articles on this topic: "First Impressions of Korea," by Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D.D., and "Christianity in Japan and Korea," by Bishop M. C. Harris. Two very interesting papers might be written on these articles.

2. Draw a large map of Korea and Japan on the blackboard and place it before the meeting. The size, population and history of these two peoples can be found in any encyclopedia.

3. The last one hundred years in Japan is a subject worthy of much thought and will reward investigation.

4. Consider the position of Korea in view of the recent Russian-Japanese war. Korea is now united to Japan. Many thought seriously that this union would affect the progress of Christianity in Korea, but the direct opposite has been the result.

* * *

Korea measures 600 miles from north to south, has an area of 80,000 square miles and its population is estimated at 14,000,000.

* * *

The Korean Christians are especially active in Christian work. They do not stop with personal piety and faith, but seek out and eventually reach their acquaintances, neighbors and friends; in all times of the year and in all places of concourse and intercourse public and private. Many of them accept personal abuse and ostracism for their fidelity. It is not too much to say that a Korean church-member is quite uniformly a Christian worker and will freely give his services to extend the knowledge of Christ. Pastors say that sometimes one-third of their members will be found on the streets on the afternoon of the Lord's day visiting from house to house and personally working among their unconverted friends and neighbors. One recently converted man recited the entire Sermon on the Mount without a verbal error; and when commended for his memorization, he said that he found it wouldn't stick until he practised its teachings; then he found that he could retain it in his memory.

* * *

Disciples in Korea continue to pledge themselves to a certain number of days to be taken out of their working time, for voluntary preaching of the good tidings. In one station the sum of these days exceeded 8,000. It is not surprising to learn that there was a monthly average of 453 conversions. The Korean Church aims to become self-governing, self-supporting and self-propagating. The material condition of the Koreans is one of abject poverty. The daily wage runs anywhere from fifteen to forty cents. To save anything is almost impossible and because the Koreans have so little to give in money, they give what is more valuable, they give personal work into which they put their whole hearts.

* * *

Christian missions have been in Japan fifty-two years, in Korea twenty-six years. In Japan, Christianity has spread to all the principal cities and towns of the empire. The work of the Young Men's Christian Association in bringing practically every Japanese soldier in the Russian war under the influence of Christianity for a little at least was of untold value in carrying familiarity with the Christian message into practically every part of the empire. There are 80,000 church members in Japan with 300,000 church adherents. In Japan, Christianity began with the students and has been slowly percolating down to the masses. In Korea the movement has been and is a mass movement.

* * *

The revival in the churches of Korea began about three years ago. Its first effects were seen within the Church itself, and almost wholly within Christian circles. It was a baptism of purity. The revival rapidly spread to all parts of the empire. Tens of thousands were enrolled as seekers, and became regular attendants of the Church. About one year ago a movement was launched under the name of "A Million Souls for Jesus in One Year." This has spread into an effort to win the whole land for Jesus. The special workers numbering over 700, met in the city of Seoul early in October, and launched the campaign. They were divided into 350 teams, consisting of two each; they went from house to house preaching the word, distributing the Gospel and enrolling seekers. The result of a three week's work was the enrollment of 10,000 seekers and the conversion of several thousand. Following this the campaign was to be carried on in every provincial city and county seat. Indeed it includes the visitation of every home in the land. The ingathering of such a large number during the first quarter of a century of Christianity in Korea stands out as one of the marvelous things in the life of Christianity, but the most interesting thing in connection with this movement is its effect upon the churches in China and Japan. The revival fire has spread not only into both of these countries but also into Manchuria with equally remarkable results.

It would be well for every Christian Endeavorer to watch the daily and religious papers for information about the "Men and Religion Forward Movement," which is already being organized for a campaign in the United States next fall, extending from ocean to ocean and touching over eighty cities.

* * *

An effort is being made in Japan to double the membership of the churches. There are probably about 30,000,000 Japanese who have never heard of Christ except in the most general way. There are three provinces containing 3,800,000 people without a resident missionary. At the end of fifty years of Christian missions, Japan has 800 missionaries, 80,000 Protestant Christians, 1,300 Japanese pastors and other workers and 186 Christian schools. (Facts gleaned from "The Endeavorer's Daily Companion," by Amos R. Wells. A book worth owning.)

* * *

Shintoism, Buddhism and Confucianism are the three prevailing religions of Japan. They are not, like our Christian sects mutually exclusive. A man may and usually does belong to all three at the same time. Japan tolerates all religions. There are missionaries in Japan representing about forty different denominations. Among Protestants the English church is strongly represented. There are also many American Baptists and missionaries of the American Board. The Friends Mission is located at Tokio.

News in Brief

The new Anglo-Chinese agreement for the immediate reduction and final suppression of the opium traffic in China, was signed in Peking the 8th inst.

Jacob M. Dickinson has resigned as Secretary of War on account of the demands of his personal business, and Henry Lewis Stimson of New York has been appointed his successor.

The long awaited edict abolishing the Grand Council in Peking and substituting a constitutional cabinet of ten members, has been issued. The Cabinet, as announced, however, is made up of the present grand councillors with the addition of Liang Tun Yen, the former president of the foreign board, who is now travelling in the United States. Prince Ching becomes premier and minister of foreign affairs, and Na-Tung and Hsu Shih-Chang are made vice prime ministers. Liang Tun Yen is named second foreign minister. Otherwise the presidents of the various boards become the ministers respectively of their departments.

The change is in line with the demands of the National Assembly for a constitutional cabinet responsible to that body instead of to the throne, but in what respect the new ministry is made responsible to the Assembly has not been promulgated.

Edward Grubb on The Personality of God*

There are many persons in the world who live undisturbed by problems. They cannot understand the agonizing struggles through which other persons pass who are differently constituted from themselves, and they are prone to consider all questioning and probing and doubting to be due to the work of Satan. They go the even tenor of their ways and live in a peaceful faith while the world of thought is raging around them and they never take the trouble to learn the significance of the new ideas which are remoulding the world. When they hear of some profound argument to prove immortality or to demonstrate the Personality of God, they look up, surprised, and ask why anyone should need to prove what is so obviously true. "I never had any doubts of immortality," they say; "I never questioned the Personality of God."

We should be very tender of such simple and unquestioning faith, and we should not be over eager to stir up their quiet rest or to hatch out for them the brood of problems which make life so complex for us.

"Leave thou thy sister when she prays,
Her early heaven, her happy views;
Nor thou with shadow'd hint confuse
A life that leads melodious days.

Her faith through form is pure as thine,
Her hands are quicker unto good:
O, sacred be the flesh and blood
To which she links a truth divine!"

But there are others who cannot by any possibility live in this quiet Eden of undisturbed faith. The world forces its problems upon them. They live in a world of nature, with its mighty laws and forces, and they feel constrained to understand "what makes the world go round"; why "the bands of Orion are not loosed"; why "the lightnings go forth"; why "the lioness hunts for prey"; why "the raven seeks for food when the young ones cry," and all of Job's other questions. And these questions carry with them deeper questions about the ultimate nature of things, the origin of life and consciousness and moral purpose, and thus, before one knows it, he has many questions which he must square with his soul's faith.

It is for persons of this second type that books like this of Edward Grubb's are written. He is not thrusting unnecessary questions upon our attention; he is attempting to help solve, constructively, questions which have been raised and are already here. Those who start from the side of nature and take the scientific method of approach soon discover that in the field of science, everything is to be explained by "natural causes," and no matter how far back you push, you find only "forces"—not personality. Here, then, the question rises: What ground have we for believing in a God who is personal?

Edward Grubb points out that science assures us of "an infinite and eternal energy from which all things proceed," and that this energy, in the last resort, is one energy, though expressing itself in many forms and manifestations. Next comes philosophy, which compels us to realize that the ultimate Reality of the universe is a Mind or Consciousness. Ethics, with its mighty fact of "oughtness," of moral obligation, with its ineradicable distinction of right and wrong, points to a Supreme Righteousness, manifesting itself in individual conscience. We feel that "Our wills are ours, we know not how,

Our wills are ours to make them Thine."

Beyond all these branches of knowledge comes, next, the approach of personal experience, which psychology studies. Here come to light great, unmistakable facts which show that there are unsuspected depths in our own personal consciousness within which the soul has direct relations with a More than itself. There is, too, that impressive fact that man feels impelled to seek for strength and help beyond himself—the fact that man prays and feels bound to conceive the Power to which he prays in personal terms—as Thou, and not it.

He touches impressively upon "the fundamental and far-reaching fact" that Jesus Christ was perennially conscious of God as Father and that those who come into a true relation to Him are raised to a measure of this same consciousness of God, and cry, as He did, "Abba, Father." It is thus through Him that we get for the first time a full and satisfying conviction of the Personality of God.

*The Personality of God and other Essays in constructive Christian Thought, by Edward Grubb, published by Headley Bros.

Edward Grubb well points out that no religious truth can finally be arrived at by mere logic. We arrive at our truths only through some degree of personal illumination and the awakening thereby of conviction within us. The step to truth is always through the will. It is when we arise and go to the Father that the real conviction and power of His Personality sweep over us and envelop us.

This section of the little book covers only 30 pages. Then follow suggestive studies of other equally fundamental questions: "What is revelation?" "Jesus and the Christ of experience?" "The weakness of Unitarianism," etc. Those who want a fresh, honest, thoughtful consideration of these vital matters will find this book helpful. I do not always agree with the writer's argument. In some matters here discussed I hold quite different views from him. But at every point I am in sympathy with his spirit, I am helped by his reverent and fearless words, and I feel that he is moving toward conclusions that are sound, solid and constructive.

Current Events and Comments

Third National Peace Congress

In opening the Third National Peace Conference in Baltimore the 3d inst., President Taft defined our national mission in the following words: "We have a magnificent domain of our own, in which we are attempting to work out and show to the world success in popular government"; and he added: "We need no more territory on which to show this." This came as a word of assurance from the nation's head that our government has no design on the Latin-American republics nor on any other quarter of the globe. As a strong and vigorous nation, we cannot shun the responsibility for peace in our part of the world "if," as he continued, "we can do that peacefully and effectively." He asked that the friends of peace be moderate in their expectation concerning the forthcoming treaty with Great Britain.

It is a step only, and we must not defeat our purposes by enlarging the expectation of the world as to what is to happen and by then disappointing it. We must realize that we are dealing with a world that is fallible and full of weakness, with somewhat of wickedness in it, and that reforms that are worth having are brought about little by little, and not by one blow. I think that we are likely to make more progress if we express our hope with moderation and realize the difficulties that are to be overcome than if we claim that we have opened the gate to eternal peace with one key and within one year.

Dr. J. A. Macdonald, Canada, was more enthusiastic. "If that arbitration treaty between your country and England is ratified," said he, "the name of William Howard Taft will be remembered in world history so long as man loves peace." Other speakers were sanguine in their references to the subject. Hamilton Holt, president of the congress, considered it the initial step in bringing about a federation of the world—first, unlimited arbitration; second, a league of peace; third, world federation. A resolution was passed urging our Government to enter upon negotiations with other powers looking toward the formation of a league of peace planned to settle by amicable means all questions of whatever nature which may arise between the contracting powers. The proposed celebration of the one hundred years of peace between the two great English-speaking nations was approved, and the congress pledges its support to the movement. Under the name The American Peace Congress, the congress voted itself a permanent institution, with meetings to be held once in two years. This action was taken to meet the need for a central representative body which shall serve to co-ordinate the efforts of all the societies in America devoted to the settlement of international disputes by methods other than war. Educational work for peace, and the peace movement viewed from the business man's standpoint were important features of the program. The congress closed Seventh-day, the 6th, with a prevailing conviction that the peace movement had been given a decided impetus.

Reassurance from Japan

A source of constant annoyance exists in the bugaboo of Japan's warlike attitude toward the United States. The rumor is as persistent as Banquo's ghost, and yet from every authoritative source come words of reassurance. A few nights since the Association of Friends of America in Japan gave a banquet in Tokio celebrating the ratification of the new Japanese-American treaty. Among the 130 guests were Ambassador O'Brien, Marquis Komura, the foreign minister; Prince Tokugawa, president of the House of Peers; ex-Governor Fort, New Jersey, and others. Viscount Kaneko presided, and, in a speech, roundly scored what he terms "the criminal breeding of mischief between two nations whose manifest destiny is to guard the control of the Pacific together." Remarks in a similar vein were made by Komura, Tokugawa, Takahashi and Ozaki, and they were replied to in kind by Ambassador O'Brien, ex-Governor Fort and E. W. Frazar. A reference to the possibility of a Japanese-American Universal Arbitration Treaty was greeted with applause.

A resolution was adopted to send a cablegram to the Third National Peace Congress in Baltimore, assuring the American people that the sentiment of all Japan is friendly and peaceful, and that the two countries should unite "to muzzle the mischievous peace breakers."

A Famous Reply

Whether the President be right or wrong in his estimate of the Canadian reciprocity measure, we cannot question his motives. His reply to a delegation of Grangers, who told him that he and his party would go down to defeat if they continued to support the measure, should be indelibly stamped on the hearts of our people. He said:

But my conviction with respect to the advantage of this treaty is very deep. So far as the effect of this on my personal political fortunes, it ought not to influence me and does not influence me in the slightest. I believe this treaty to be the best thing for the whole country, including farmers. * * * I am willing to abide the judgment of history—the judgment that will come after the event.

Too often, in considering political issues, our people have looked at their personal advantage and immediate results. Would that we had more men who took the larger view. We would not avoid mistakes, but we would be in a fair way to remedy them.

Diaz Losing Ground

Events in Mexico seem slowly moving toward the downfall of President Diaz. Although he has offered to resign as soon as order is restored sufficiently to insure a peaceful change of administration, he reserves the right to decide when this situation is reached. With this uncertainty, it is hardly probable that satisfactory arrangements can be made with Madero; and while negotiations have been pending, Madero's lieutenants have become impatient. Juarez, opposite El Paso, Texas, has been captured by the insurgents and a provincial government has been established. Two provinces are now practically under their control.

The most encouraging aspect of the situation is to be found on this side the border. The tone of the country and press has been excellent. Patience and cool-headedness are much more in evidence than they were even a few weeks since. If credit is largely due to President Taft, it is also due to the people for their ready responsiveness to sane and humane leadership.

The World in Boston

The missionary exhibition known as "The World in Boston" is now in its fourth week. Day by day, in all departments, the attendance has increased. The exhibition hall in all parts has entertained from 12,000 to 15,000 daily, with a considerable increase on Seventh-days. New features have come into the courts; in fact, even new exhibits have been added. The stewards, upon whom so much depends, have by this time become familiar with their parts, and are performing splendid service.

The Pageant of Darkness and Light

The most popular feature of "The World in Boston" is "The Pageant of Darkness and Light." It is instructive and possesses a happy artistic touch. It consists of a scene from missionary history in each of the four quarters of the globe, and closes with a beautiful processional and a final tableau of 1,000 participants in the attitude of worship and triumph.

The first episode is in an Indian camp in the Northwest. The chief and his wife are in distress over the loss of their little daughter who has strayed away. A band of Esquimaux comes to trade, and the "medicine man" incites the Indians to kill the visitors. Just then a missionary brings the chief's little daughter into the camp, and, having gained the chief's good will, preaches to the people his message of light.

The scene shifts to Africa, at a spot where Livingstone, the famous missionary, is resting. Here Stanley finds him and begs him to return to England, but Livingstone determines not to go until his work is done. At this news his men break into a song of thanksgiving.

The East episode is in a city of India. A funeral procession is seen leading a young widow to the funeral pyre. Just as the pyre is about to be lighted, however, an English official rushes in with a proclamation prohibiting the burning of widows, and the missionaries break into a jubilant chant.

The most dramatic episode of all opens on a coral beach in Hawaii. In the background the volcano Kilauea towers, while a wedding party rejoices. A priest of the Goddess Pele approaches and chooses the bridegroom and a child as victims to be thrown into the volcano as a sacrifice. The Christian queen, Kapiolani, appears and bids defiance to the goddess. She taunts Pele, but there is no answering wrath from the crater of fire, and the power of the goddess is broken forever.

The music for these episodes was written by Hamish MacCunn. There are gloomy Indian chants and blood-thirsty war songs, jubilant missionary choruses and hymns of praise, fanatical invocations of medicine men and native priests, and many solos of every description. The music is scored for full orchestra and chorus, and the composer has made plentiful use of all modern instrumentation in order to express the wild character of scenes and setting.

First Printed Bible Brings $50,000

An incident to be remembered in connection with the 300th anniversary of the authorized English Bible is the fabulous price paid for the famous Gutenberg Bible, supposed to be the first book printed with movable metal type. It was part of a collection of rare books owned by the late Robert Hoe. New York, and was sold at auction to Henry E. Huntington, California, for $50,000.

Links Binding North Carolina and New England Friends

BY JULIA S. WHITE.

When New England Yearly Meeting issued the announcement that this (1911) was to be its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary and invited all the yearly meetings on the continent to have a part in the celebration, many Friends perhaps were thus awakened to the fact that New England is the mother of American yearly meetings—mother not from the fact that all the others have been derived from it by the process of “setting up,” but rather by a priority in years. It has been a long time since 1661, and New England Friends of today have an interesting history behind them. The retracing of these years will, no doubt, reveal all along many vital relations between this mother and other American Friends—relations no less intense than those first, when upon New England soil the Friends landed on this continent and when upon Boston Common the only Quaker martyrs of our country were brought to the scaffold.

To show how much North Carolina has derived from New England during these years is the object of this paper.

So far as known, the first religious service of any kind in North Carolina was a Friends meeting. This was called by the Irish Friend, William Edmundson, who was the first “travelling” Friend to come to the State. This meeting was somewhere in Perquimans County, and probably within eight or ten miles of the present Piney Woods Monthly Meeting. When Edmundson arrived in “Albemarle,” he found one family of Friends, that of Henry Phillips; and they wept for joy at the coming of Edmundson, “not having seen a Friend for seven years.” Phillips “and his wife had been convinced of Truth in New England, and had come here to live.” Now this was in 1672, which means that Henry Phillips must have left New England about 1665. That he came to our borders on account of persecution is by no means an established fact, but such is easy to conjecture; and if so, this is the only foundation for the assumption that North Carolina Quakerism was born of persecution. Save Henry Phillips, most or all the other families which formed the nucleus of the church were converts to Quakerism after coming to this province.

This is the first link binding North Carolina to New England Friends. The second is certainly an equally important factor in the history of North Carolina Quakerism. From 1771-1777 there were few sessions of New Garden Monthly Meeting when certificates of membership were not received from Nantucket meeting. In the men’s minutes there were during that time certificates for 30 individuals and 11 families, the families having sometimes as many as 6 children. These Friends were named Coffin, Macy, Worth, Gardner, Beard, Gifford, Sweet, Stanley, Bunker, Starbuck, Russell, Barnard, Swain, Davis, Clasby, Coggeshall, Way and Barney. A rather amusing circumstance occurs with reference to the certificate of one Barzillai Gardner. He and his would-be bride pass meeting once without difficulty. When they appeared the second time, said Barzillai’s certificate of membership had not yet arrived. Friends had made “proper inquiry,” etc., however, and while they did not “want to set a precedent,” they allowed the Friends to proceed. The following entry also occurs at this monthly meeting (Second month, 1774): “Richard Williams, Zachariah Dicks, William Stanley and Thomas Thornburgh, Jr., is appointed to write to the monthly meeting of Nantucket and inform it what disadvantages we have lain under concerning some of their members that hath come without certificates.”

The Nantucket records show that during the year (1774), said Zachariah Dicks twice visited the island. At any rate, Barzillai’s certificate came to New Garden in Eleventh month, which was some eight or nine months after his marriage.

One naturally questions why the Nantucket people came to Carolina in such numbers and in such quick succession. Perhaps no better authority can be found than the “Early Settlers of Nantucket,” compiled by Lydia S. Hinchman. This says, “Very early in its history, the people of the island (Nantucket) had undertaken whale fishing,” which business steadily increased “Until to every wind of heaven

Nantucket’s sails were spread.”

“About the year 1771 the gathering clouds on the political horizon made the more timid question seriously the wisdom of continuing their business.” * * * “At the time preceding the Revolution, trade (whale oil, etc.) was carried on to a considerable extent directly with London, and if the threatened storm were to break, it may readily be imagined to what peril would be subjected the only industry which had brought gain and comparative wealth to Nantucket.

“After deliberate weighing the matter, a large number of citizens removed to North Carolina,” and elsewhere. The fact that our State is first mentioned may indicate that it received the largest exodus, but by no means proves the same.

Elijah Coffin says of the exodus: “The Island of Nantucket being small, and its soil not very productive, a large number of people could not be supported thereupon * * * (and) many of the citizens turned their attention to other ports.” Obed Macy, writing of the period around 1760, says that, because of the failure of the whale fishery, some went to New Garden, North Carolina, which agrees more or less with the Hinchman statement.

How Nantucket Friends came to know of the opportunities afforded in Carolina is also a question. Investigation proves that prior to the coming of the first Friend from Nantucket, the following “travelling” Friends from North Carolina had visited the island: Zachariah Nixon (1734), Henry Stanton, Jr. (1740; 1764, twice), Zachariah Dicks (1767), Thomas Thornburgh (1767, twice), William Hunt (1767, thrice; and 1771). The last three named were residents of the section to which the New Englanders came, and the frequency of their visits shows a decided interest on the part of Friends of New Garden.

Of the visits of William Hunt and his nephew, Thomas Thornburgh, we have the following record in his "Memoirs": "This (Nantucket) seems to have been a place of remarkable exercise to William Hunt; for of the seven meetings which he attended during the nine days he was there, the first four he says he 'sat under a cloud of thick darkness, in which he felt the mystery of iniquity work in a wonderful manner.' * * * His concern, at the time of his third visit, was chiefly to the ministers and elders, most of whom he visited in their families." He afterward appointed a meeting with them, which was held in perfect silence. Another meeting with the ministers alone proved a heart-testing time; for it is said that William Hunt "delivered a close, searching testimony, pointing out the danger of nourishing wrong births, by handing forth food not duly seasoned with heavenly salt and consecrated by the living Word."

When the Nantucket Friends came to Carolina, they found themselves preceded some thirty years by Friends from Pennsylvania, Virginia and Maryland. These, with the Nantucket Friends, made what is called by Weeks "the replanting of Southern Quakerism," and to which he attributes such importance as to say, "For had not this movement taken place, Quakerism would hardly be an appreciable factor in these States today." At any rate, it was not long after these settlements from the North before Quakerism in central Carolina became strong enough to have to form several of what later came to be the strongest monthly meetings in the State—Cane Creek (1751), New Garden (1754), Center (1773), Deep River (1778) and, a little later, Dover (1815), the latter place being the stronghold of the Starbucks. The Coffin family remained around New Garden, as did also the Worths. A large number of members with Friends, and also others of the residents, particularly of Guilford County, tell with pride of their descent from the Gardners or Starbucks or Coffins or Worths or Folgers or Macys or others of Nantucket fame.

While these surnames have almost disappeared from North Carolina, a most cursory survey will find that in the Middle West they are to be found in abundance. The migratory spirit which led the Nantucket fishermen to the hills of Carolina as they heard the rumblings of the war cloud of the Revolution, moved within their grandchildren and led them from their Carolina homes to the "free" territory beyond the Ohio when the clouds of civil war were hovering upon our Southland. At the present there is not a single member of New Garden meeting named Coffin, and only two named Macy, and they live in Kansas. There is one Starbuck, but several Worths.

The way these Nantucket people intermarried, even after they came to Carolina, makes it more remarkable that so many of the names have dropped out. In the Center records—from which alone it was possible to secure accurate data—out of a total of seventeen marriages, only six surnames appear other than those of Nantucket origin. That means that a Barnard marries a Coffin, or a Swain marries a Macy, or a Folger marries a Worth, or some other such combination.

That these people from Nantucket were a valuable addition to our State goes without saying. The minutes of our meetings show them active in all matters of Church interest, and thoroughgoing, straightforward citizens as far as the standards of the times demanded. One Jonathan Worth was twice made Governor of our State, and that in the most critical years of its history (1865-1869). Many of the leaders of North Carolina today are of Nantucket extraction—President Hobb's grandmother was a Reece; the Mendenhalls are descended from the Gardners, the Pettys from the Macys, the Ballingers from the Coffins, beside those who still bear the name of Worth.

The name Coffin is indelibly associated with the anti-slavery movement, and the work of Levi and Addison Coffin in the promotion of the "underground railroad" is too familiar for repetition. The following may not be known: A manumission society of Guilford and Randolph Counties was organized in 1816, with "Moses Swain in the chair." He was made permanent president on the first ballot. One Thomas Swain was secretary. Of the four sections uniting in the organization, three were those in which the Nantucket people lived; and of the 25 representatives from those three, 16 bore either the name of Swain, Barnard, Worth, Coffin, Gardner or Macy. Nor did their interest abate as the years proceeded. In 1831 there is the following minute in North Carolina Yearly Meeting, which shows that these transplanted Friends were materially aided in their work by those who had remained in New England:

"This meeting's treasurer informs by letter from Rhode Island Yearly Meeting that they have sent to the care of this meeting $1,351.50 to be applied any way that this meeting shall think proper for the removal of people of color under its care to free governments."

(To be Concluded.)

A Heart-breaking Incident of Slavery Days

BY HENRY W. COFFIN.

A slaveholder, living in Virginia, owned a beautiful slave woman who was almost white. She became the mother of a child, a little boy, in whose veins ran the blood of her master, and the closest observer could not detect in its appearance any trace of African descent. He grew to be two or three years of age, a most beautiful child and the idol of his mother's heart, when the master concluded, for family reasons, to send him away. He placed him in the care of a friend living in Guilford County, North Carolina, and made an agreement that he should receive a good education and, at a suitable age, be taught some useful trade. Years passed; the child grew to manhood, and, having received a good common school education and learned the shoemaker's trade, he married an estimable young white woman and had a family of five or six children. He had not the slightest knowledge that there was a drop of African blood in his veins, and no one in the neighborhood knew that he was the son of an octoroon slave woman. He made a comfortable living for his family, was a good citizen, a member of the Methodist Church, and was much respected by all who knew him. In course of time his father, the Virginia slaveholder, died, and when the executors came to settle the estate, they remembered the little white boy, the son of the slave woman, and, knowing that by law he belonged to the estate and must be by this time a valuable piece of property, they resolved to gain possession of him. After much inquiry and search, they learned his whereabouts, and the heir to the estate, accompanied by an administrator, went to Guilford County, North Carolina, to claim his half-brother as a slave. Without making themselves known to him, they sold him to a negro trader, and gave a bill of sale, preferring to have a sum in ready money instead of a servant who might prove very valuable but who would, without doubt, give them a great deal of trouble. He had been free all his life, and they knew he would not readily yield to the yoke of bondage. All this time the victim was entirely unconscious of the cruel fate in store for him.

His wife had been prostrated by a fever then prevalent in the neighborhood, and he had waited upon her and watched by her bedside until he was worn out with exhaustion and loss of sleep. Several neighbor women coming in one evening to watch with the invalid, he surrendered her to their care and retired to seek the rest he so much needed. That night the slave dealer came with a gang of ruffians, burst into the house and seized their victim as he lay asleep, bound him, after heroic struggles on his part, and dragged him away. When he demanded the cause of his seizure, they showed him the bill of sale they had received and informed him that he was a slave. In this rude, heartless manner the intelligence that he belonged to the African race was first imparted to him, and the crushing weight of his cruel destiny came upon him when totally unprepared. His captors hurried him out of the neighborhood and took him toward the Southern slave markets. To get him black enough to sell without question, they washed his face in tan ooze and kept him tied in the sun, and to complete his resemblance to a mulatto, they cut his hair short and seared it with a hot iron to make it curly. He was sold in Georgia or Alabama to a hard master, by whom he was cruelly treated.

Several months afterwards he succeeded in escaping and made his way back to Guilford County, North Carolina. Here he learned that his wife had died a few days after his capture, the shock of that calamity having hastened her death, and that his children were scattered among the neighbors. His master, thinking that he would return to his old home, came in pursuit of him with hounds, and chased him through the thickets and swamps. He evaded the dogs by wading in a mill-pond and climbing a tree, where he remained all night. Finally he made his way to the house of Stanton White, a Quaker, the father-in-law of Levi Coffin. In after years the latter became the most famous active abolitionist of his time in aiding escaping slaves to freedom in Canada. West of the Alleghenies, whence he had moved, he was known as the president of the Underground Railroad. It is known that the heart-breaking incident here recorded was one of the most potent instrumentalities in developing the resolution in young Levi Coffin's mind to devote his life to the cause of freedom for the slave. He was prosperous in business and gave without stint of his means, and helped over 4,000 slaves to reach Canada.

The white slave remained concealed in the house of Stanton White several days. Dr. George Swain, a man of much influence in the community, had an interview with him, and, hearing the particulars of his seizure, said he thought the proceedings were illegal. He held a consultation with several lawyers, and instituted proceedings in the slave's behalf. But the unfortunate victim of man's cruelty did not live to regain his freedom. He had been exposed and worried so much, trailed by dogs and forced to lie in swamps and thickets, that his health was broken down, and he died before the next term of court.

Hannah Whitall Smith's Last Greeting to Her Friends

I expect that, first of all, some of you may want to know just how I am and what are my surroundings and my life. I am living with my son and my two granddaughters in a beautiful home on the banks of the Thames, not far from Oxford, with frequent visits from my daughter Mary from Italy, and at least a weekly visit from my daughter Alys, now living at Cambridge. I could not ask for a lovelier refuge in which to pass the last years of my life, nor for better company. I am, as no doubt you all know, very much of an invalid, and am obliged to sit in a wheeled chair, both day and night, as my many infirmities prevent me from much lying in bed. But I am very comfortable in my chair, and get plenty of sleep. I cannot either read or write much, and often am not well enough to see my friends. In fact, I have very little energy for anything, and am not even able to go on with a half-finished book that I was in the midst of writing when I was taken ill. My old activities have all had to be laid aside, and I am only waiting and longing for the blessed call to my heavenly home. But I am glad to tell you that I am very happy and contented in my narrowed life, and with my lessening capabilities, and can say, "Thy will be done" to my divine Master from the very bottom of my heart.

I knew once an old colored aunty who had been very active in mission work for many years, but who was at last laid aside from it all by a severe cough that racked her day and night. One might think she would have been unhappy at being so set aside, but, on the contrary, she was always bright and cheerful. A friend who had known her in her days of activity asked her how she was able to be so happy. "Why, honey," she replied, "in course I's happy. Once the Lord used to say to me, 'Nancy, come here and do this,' or 'Nancy, go there and do that,' and I knew His will was good and I went and did what He said, and in course I was happy. And now He says, 'Nancy, lie here and cough,' and I know His will is good just the same, and I lies here and coughs and am just as happy." And in my measure I feel as Nancy did. Once my divine Master sent me on His errands, and I knew His will was good, and was happy in trying to do it. And now He has shut me up to an invalid life, and tells me to sit in my wheeled chair, and to be content to let others do His errands and carry on His work, and I know His will is good just the same, and am happy in trying to accept it.

I feel sure that the secret which made Nancy love the will of God and be happy in doing it was the same that has made me love the will of God and be happy in trying to do it; and this secret is only that we have both come to a knowledge of the character of God that has convinced us, beyond all possibility of doubt, that His will is, and cannot help being, the best and sweetest thing the universe contains.

Do not think for a moment that this is because Nancy and I are extra good and pious people, for we are not at all, but are just like most of the Christians around us, and probably are not half so good and pious as many. But we have found out from the Lord Jesus three things about God which have convinced us that it is to our own best interest to trust and obey him.

* * * * *

It will not take many words to tell what were the three things about God that Nancy and I discovered in the Bible and upon which we pinned our faith. They are not in any way mysterious nor at all hard to understand. They are simply comprised in three statements, namely: God is wise; God is good; God is love. And yet what more could one ask of the God whom we are commanded to worship and trust and obey than that He should be just this—wise, and good, and loving?

* * * * *

Some of you may think I am talking platitudes when I say all this—that every Christian, of course, believes it all. But do they? Who among us really believes that God is wise and good and that He loves us—believe it, I mean, enough to depend on it as an actual, incontrovertible fact? Do not even some Christians believe things about Him that are entirely contrary to this? Do not some of them attribute to Him feelings and actions that, if they themselves or anyone else should feel or do them, they would consider it to be unkindness, or selfishness, or meanness? To be wise and good and loving must mean the exact opposite to these things, and if we attribute to God what we would scorn to do ourselves, or would despise in others, it is to make Him out to be a God who is very far from good, when judged by the standard He Himself has set before us as the ideal we must seek to reach. If we are to be kind and unselfish and generous, and if we are to love others better than ourselves, and are not to seek our own glory, but only the glory of others, if we are to forgive until seventy times seven, if we are to do unto others as we would want others to do to us, surely He Himself can do no less.

Now, dear friends, is this the character we attribute to our God, this splendid, magnificent character that once to know must enchain our hearts forever? Why, dear friends, if we did really believe that our God was this sort of a God, we should all be millionaires in grace; nay, more, multi-millionaires, rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

Nancy and I do believe it, and we are multi-millionaires, rich in nothing of our own, but rich beyond words in the wisdom and goodness and love of our God. "Thou, oh God, art all we want; more than all in Thee we find." This God is our God, and He is enough!

This is my greeting for 1911; and, since it is so late, a birthday greeting as well, as I was seventy-nine a few days ago.

May all to whom I send this message say, Amen and Amen!

Yours in loving fellowship,

H. W. PEARSALL-SMITH.

"Men and Religion"—Yes, It Is Big!

"Well, I had no idea of its being as big a thing as all that!"

This surprised gentleman had heard before of the Men and Religion Movement, but so vaguely that it failed to clutch his interest. "Movements" have been coming along pretty fast of late, and he had grown a bit weary of them. This, he supposed, was just another number in what threatens to be an interminable succession. His concern for it had been very languid.

But as he listened now to a clear, crisp outline of what "Men and Religion" really means, "he sat up and began to take notice." This thing, he saw suddenly, is something more than merely another division in a procession already tiresomely long. Its idea is larger; its scope is larger; its operations are to be larger, and there is sane reason for expecting its result to be larger.

Yes, "Men and Religion" is "as big a thing as all that!"

Just in geography it is too big to ignore. That, of course, is not such a distinctive point, for other religious enterprises have covered the United States and Canada successfully—notably the Laymen's Missionary Movement. And "Men and Religion" is frankly indebted to the Laymen's Missionary Movement for much of its method in weaving its continental ocean-to-ocean blanket.

But experience always enlarges, and with the benefit of experience in this case, the Men and Religion Movement will bring its impulses to bear on all sort of communities, big and little, near and far, in every State of the Union and every province of Canada, more completely than any single religious stimulus ever before affected the same area.

The national committee of the enterprise engages to touch between 80 and 90 of the biggest American cities. The local committee in each of these places is pledged to pass on the same thing to lesser cities surrounding, and these in turn are trusted to repeat to outlying villages, and finally the villages to the country.

In universality therefore—in frank democracy to which town people and country people are exactly the same worth—this movement appeals impressively to men who think in national terms.

But geographical bigness was not really the bigness that surprised the gentleman already quoted. It was rather the movement's big grasp of the whole round of outstanding Church obligations—its daring to attack them all at once.

Other Church movements have boomed specialists—young people's work, Sunday-school work, adult Bible classes, temperance, fraternity with working-men, missions and so on—one each. But "Men and Religion" proposes to tackle them all together.

Each of these specialist affairs has been big; the affair that takes them all in will have to be colossal. No wonder the instinctive American admiration for size is lured by this.

Yet it must not be supposed that the comprehensiveness of the Men and Religion Movement is a reflection on the specialist movements. Quite to the contrary, it is a recognition of their thoroughness and effect; it follows in the way they have prepared.

Because these special agitations and promotions have generated so much enthusiasm along their own lines, it is time now to sum up their separate activities in one great generalizing activity.

For this reason it is planned in every place where the "Men and Religion" forces enter, to stir up Church men about Bible classes, evangelistic effort, mission liberality, boy-training, social helpfulness, friendliness to labor, civic Christianity and everything else pertaining to the Church's present-day duty. It will be an all-round summons to "get busy on the job."

"Awful confusion of things," some will say. "Better take one thing at a time." But all these things need attending to at one and the same time—which is right now. Somehow the Church has got to multiply itself to the point of doing everything all the while.

Letting other things wait while one matter—like missions or Christian citizenship—is attended to, won't meet the situation. The whole task of the Church must be taken care of comprehensively.

The Men and Religion Movement after all amounts to just this—a plan for sending a practically simultaneous message of four parts to all the Christian men of North America. The four parts of it are these:

1. That the thing which Christianity is under obligation to do in the life of America is a thing great enough, real enough and imperative enough to justify earnestness about it. Let men who call themselves Christians quit dawdling.

2. That the Church's task deserves intelligent and painstaking attention to develop improved methods to meet new conditions. No man on earth can run a big business without studying it everlastingly to see where changes will bring in greater efficiency. The Church is worth just the same kind of thought. Following an old-fashioned routine grind just because the Church's men are too lazy to study out better and broader ways of doing things is inexcusable.

3. That the task of the Church is big enough and varied enough to use all sorts of different talents and all kinds of true men. There is somewhere in the multiple details of the job one thing which each particular Church man can do better than anybody else. In common honesty to God and humanity he ought to get about doing it quick.

4. That the work for which the Church is put into the world is a work wherein there can be no reason for division between any two denominations that follow Jesus Christ in the faith that he can save the world. Differences among denominations don't touch their duty to serve. There they can have unity, for there there is unity now. Let everybody go in to enjoy it.

A performance, a stunt, a spectacle, a grand Church maneuver—if "Men and Religion" amounts to nothing more than these, it won't be worth your time; you are quite right about that.

But if the Spirit of God works through it to renew Church men in a great fresh passion to make religion tell for all it's worth, you can't afford to miss feeling its stimulus—nor miss contributing your own force to the intensity of it.

How can you tell which it will be? Well, the first thing to do, now in these months of preparation, is to get into the movement yourself, and by God's grace spend all your influence to make it real with a mighty spiritual reality.—The Continent.

Esther Baird, of Friends Mission, Nowgong, India, arrived in San Francisco the 28th ult. She attended meeting in Berkeley on the 30th and spoke to the Christian Endeavor Societies in the evening. From there she went to Portland, Ore., and goes from there eastward.

Van Wert Quarterly Meeting was held at Rockford, Ohio, the 5th and 6th inst. Fred E. Smith, pastor at Fountain City, Ind., was present and presented the needs of Southland College. A subscription and collection for the institution was taken. On account of sickness, and the busy time among the farmers, the meeting was small.

The announcement is now out for "The Quakers in the American Colonies," by Rufus M. Jones, Isaac Sharpless, and Amelia M. Gummere.

This volume is divided into five books. Book I. deals with the Quakers in New England; Book II. with Quakerism in the Colony of New York; Book III. with the Quakers in the Southern Colonies; Book IV. deals with the early Quakers in New Jersey, and Book V. with the Quakers in Pennsylvania.

Berkeley, California, is one of the most beautiful of San Francisco's neighboring cities, lying as it does on the east side of the bay, adjoining Oakland on the north, and directly opposite the Golden Gate. Friends here are looking forward with anticipation to the International S. S. Convention, to be held in San Francisco in Sixth month, and hope to see many eastern Friends at that time. Berkeley meeting has recently extended to their pastor, Mead A. Kelsey, an invitation to continue with them another year, being the fourth, the present year concluding the last of the Sixth month.

The current number of the FRIENDS ORIENTAL NEWS presents a much better appearance than former issues. The reason seems to be a change of printers. The "Publisher" says: "On account of the closing of the office in Nanking where the FRIENDS ORIENTAL NEWS has been printed during the past three years, it has been necessary to make other plans for publication. Accordingly arrangements have been made to have the work done at the Methodist Publishing House, Shanghai, beginning with the present number. We expect to give greater satisfaction in the improved presswork.

W. Carlton and Alice C. Wood, after nearly a year abroad, including six months' sojourn in the Holy Land, are returning to America. They wrote from Jerusalem, Palestine, Fourth month 25th as follows:

"Palestine is the best commentary on Bible study we have found and do heartily recommend it to all lovers of the Bible. It contains lengthy but ever-fresh chapters on the manners and customs of the people of Bible times, topography, climate, etc. It is accurate in every detail and always up-to-date.

Our six-months stay in Jerusalem has been happily interrupted at times while we went on trips through the country and especially while we visited the Friends Mission at Ramallah. This school for boys and girls for its standard of excellency in intellectual, moral and religious training is conceded by all here to be second to none in Palestine. Every Friend who visits the school not only receives an inspiration and gets new enthusiasm for missions, but feels a sense of pride that his society is carrying it on. President and Mrs. Rosenberger and their corps of teachers with New England Yearly Meeting for backing are investing their lives in that labor of love which shall, as time goes on, add more of the transforming leaven to a nation and people where Christian progress and gospel living has stagnated for centuries. If there is any Friend who is ignorant of the Mission at Ramallah there are surely hundreds of others, not Friends, who, touring through the country, admire and praise its virtues every year.

We shall embark from Jaffa for our homeward journey on Fifth month 2d, and pass through France and sail from Havre the 13th for New York on the S. S. "La Savoie" (Savoy) of the Compagnie General Transatlantique Line, landing at New York the 20th."

Corinth Academy closed for the year the 28th ult. On the evening of the 27th an excellent program was given by the students for the entertainment of a large audience. Commencement day was beautiful and a large company of people gathered. Homer J. Coppock, principal of the school, presided over the exercises, which were opened with prayer by Alonzo E. Cloud. Paul Scarborough, editor of the "Tide-water News," spoke for a few minutes on correct and incorrect ideals of education. Prof. Oscar L. Shewmaker, District School Examiner, delivered an address on education in its higher appeal to life. He cited interesting statistics on the wonderful increase in the value of school property and the effect of public schools in the State of Virginia, and paid high tribute to the people who, through their untiring efforts and great sacrifices, had founded and maintained Corinth Academy. He declared that if other communities had done what the Corinth people have done, the cause of education in Virginia would be ten years ahead of what it is today.

During the noon hour an old-fashioned southern picnic dinner was served.

The afternoon session was opened with a song by the school, followed by the graduating essay of G. Emerson Raiford on "Forest Conservation." Robert E. Pretlow, of Brooklyn, was the speaker of the afternoon. The subject was "Educational Debts and How to Pay them." He showed how the best intellectual efforts of bygone centuries in Philosophy, Literature, and Science, are placed within the reach of the boys and girls of today; and that while the debt runs back through the ages, the payment must be made to the present and future in love and service.

In closing the exercises, Prof. Coppock spoke of the past year's work in the academy. G. Emerson Raiford, one of the graduates, was on the honor roll for eight months and received the Guilford College scholarship. Other honor roll students were Howard Babb and Abbie Monfort, for seven months; Clyde and Geneva Babb for six months; and Thelma Cloud, Wister, Robert, and Walter Raiford for five months. The enrollment for the year was a 10 per cent. increase over that of the previous year. An increase of the teaching force is being seriously contemplated. During the year the School Committee was reorganized into a Board of Trustees with some additional members and new life and interest characterizes the present work of the school.

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

In an article recently published in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, upon the Origin of the Uniform Discipline, I credited Barnabas C. Hobbs and Western Yearly Meeting of 1870 with the initiative. Yesterday in looking for another matter I found minute 14, page 6, of Indiana Yearly Meeting in 1866 the following: "The subject of some plan, being adopted by which greater unity of action may be brought about amongst the different Yearly Meetings of Friends and which would lead, if possible, to the adoption of a Uniform Discipline, and tend to attach the several yearly meetings more nearly together, having been introduced and considered the meeting unites in appointing the following Friends to deliberate thereon and report their judgment to our next yearly meeting." Then follow the names of twenty-five men (all but three deceased) and twenty-four women (all deceased but one). No mention is made as in what manner or by whom this subject was introduced—probably by Daniel Hill "who had understanding of the times, etc." as his name appears first in the list.

Minute 35, page 32, in 1867, is as follows: "The committee appointed at last yearly meeting, in reference to a Uniform Discipline, etc., report as follows—which has been read and accepted."

"To the Yearly Meeting:

"The committee appointed at last yearly meeting to deliberate upon the subject of proposing some plan by which greater unity of action may be brought about amongst the different Yearly Meetings of Friends, and which might if possible lead to the adoption of a Uniform Discipline and tend to attach the several yearly meetings more nearly together, report: That after a free interchange of sentiment upon this important matter, way did not open to propose any action by the yearly meeting upon the subject at this time."

This report was signed by Timothy Nicholson and Hannah Arnett.

This was three years before the first action of Western Yearly Meeting.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

We shall be glad if you will allow us, through the columns of your paper, to say "Farewell" to the many new friends we have been privileged to make as we have travelled in this great country.

It is with much regret that, owing to ill-health, we must abandon, for the present at least, many of the visits planned.

We expect to leave New York on Fifth month 13th, reaching London, we hope, in time to return our minute before the close of the yearly meeting.

Will you, dear friends, accept our heartfelt gratitude for your prayerful sympathy, and for all the kindness and love shown us in so many ways. These have greatly helped us, and have contributed largely to the joy of service for our Master.

We shall follow with deep interest the work of the Society of Friends in America, appreciating, as never before, your large opportunities, as well as the difficulties that confront you in some places.

We pray that the students in your colleges may be well equipped mentally and spiritually, to take their places in the Church Militant, from whose ranks so many are being called to the Church Triumphant. May your young people ever be willing to surrender to the call of our Heavenly Father through the Holy Spirit to the ministry of the Gospel.

Our hearts go out in loving sympathy to the invalid and aged, and to many sorrowing and lonely ones amongst you.

May we ever by unbroken communion with our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, manifest to the world His almighty power and boundless love, and be wise to win souls.

With praise for the many mercies experienced during these months, and desiring a continued interest in your prayers,

Yours in the love of Christ,

The International Bible School Lesson

SECOND QUARTER. LESSON IX.

FIFTH MONTH 28, 1911.

MICAH'S PICTURE OF UNIVERSAL PEACE.

(International Peace Lesson.)

MICAH 4: 1-8.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Nation shall not lift a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Micah 4: 3.

DAILY READINGS FOR PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fifth month 22d. Universal peace. Mic 4: 1-8.

Third-day. Wounds incurable. Mic. 1: 1-16.

Fourth-day. Jehovah their king. Mic. 2: 1-13.

Fifth-day. Jehovah in the midst. Mic. 3: 1-12.

Sixth-day. Thou shalt be rescued. Mic. 4: 9-5: 1.

Seventh-day. Shall feed his flock. Mic. 5: 1-15.

First-day. Who pardoneth like unto God? Mic. 6: 1-7: 20.

Time.—Micah prophesied during the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah who reigned from B. C. 749 to 695, or 754 to 695.

Place.—It is not known where Micah lived, but probably at his native town Moreshethgath, not far from Jerusalem, to the southwest, on the borders of Judah and the plains of Philistia.

Prophets.—Contemporary, Isaiah and Hosea.

Monarchs.—In Israel Pekah, Hoshea, (Israel fell, 722 B. C.) In Assyria, Tiglath-Pileser III, Shalmaneser IV, Sargon, Sennacherib. Contemporary with the first forty or forty-five years of regal Rome.

The short prophecy of Micah forms one of the books of the "Twelve Prophets," or "Minor Prophets," so called because their works are shorter than the greater prophets, such as Isaiah, Jeremiah, etc. Short as the book is, there are a number of difficulties presented which lead some students to claim different authorship, and different dates for parts of the book. On the whole, however, there is good ground for believing, that with some possible brief exceptions, the book is the work of Micah.

Like Amos, Micah was a man of the country. He must have been a striking character whose words carried great force. Compare Jeremiah 26: 17-19.

Unlike his great contemporary, Isaiah, he has nothing to say about political affairs or foreign politics. He confines himself to great moral questions, upon which he speaks strongly, almost fiercely. Compare 3: 2, 3. More than most of the prophets, his chief office seems to have been to warn his countrymen of judgment. The present lesson is one of the exceptions. Chapters 4 and 5 should be read together. The fact that Micah 4: 1-3 agrees almost word for word with Isaiah 2: 2-4 gives rise to questions of authorship. Did Isaiah or Micah write it? Did each quote from an earlier source? Did one quote from the other? Has the passage been inserted in each book by some editor? It is impossible to answer these questions decisively. Conservative opinion rather inclines to the view that Isaiah quotes Micah. Whoever may have first given voice to the passage, it is one of the most beautiful and comforting of the prophetic pictures of the Old Testament.

1. "But in the latter days." R. V. "In the issue of the days," or "In the days to come," not "last days" in the sense of the end of the world. "Mountain of the Lord's house." R. V. Jerusalem. "And peoples." R. V. Nations, others as well as Jews.

2. Jerusalem as the religious metropolis of the world. Compare Isa 11: 10; Jer. 3: 17; Zech. 2: 11; 8: 22, 23. "The law." Not the Law, technically, but rather "teaching" or "instruction." Compare Deut. 17: 11.

3. "He shall judge between many peoples." "Rebuke." Rather, "be umpire for," or "arbitrate." This prophecy seems nearer fulfillment now than at any period since it was uttered. It is certainly a great cause for hope and encouragement. Then follows the famous and oft-quoted metaphor. For the reverse picture see Joel 3: 10. This illustrates how the same thing may be used for totally different purposes. Man's mind, possessions, endowments of every kind, can be used for good or for evil, for war or for peace. With him rests responsibility of choice. The Talmud says: "In the Messianic age arms will not be considered even an ornament: they will be out of place as a candle in daylight."

4. Micah, being a man of the country, uses country figures. But the statement means more than an idyllic picture—it means that every man will have a just share in the use and advantages of the land. Great landholders will no more oppress, or hold land simply for their own selfish pleasure or aggrandisement. In other words, that in "the latter days" justice and righteousness will reign. "None shall make them afraid." There shall be true peace, because it rests not on force, but on righteousness. "The mouth of the Lord," etc., "and therefore will surely bring it to pass."

5. This verse does not fit in very well with the context. It seems to mean something like this: "For at the present time all the nations are walking each in the name of his God, but we go in the name of Jehovah for ever and ever."

6. With this verse begins a new section, but similar in spirit with what precedes. "In that day." Some time during "the latter days." Compare Micah 2: 12; Ezek. 34: 16.

7. "I will treat Israel, in spite of her halting condition, as the 'remnant' to which the Messianic promises belong."

8. "And thou, O tower of the flock, the hill of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, yea, the former dominion shall come, the kingdom of the daughter of Jerusalem." R. V. Jerusalem is here meant. "The town of the flock" means the tower which a shepherd used as a refuge against robbers.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS

Never in the history of the world have the evils of war been so clearly recognized or set forth as now. Never has the longing for genuine peace been so great. To those who can look back fifty years the change in public sentiment, and the growth of the Peace sentiment is simply amazing. Such a meeting as was held the other day at Baltimore in the interests of Peace would have been impossible fifty years ago, and words which are now listened to with approval would then have been considered chimerical. All this is encouraging in the highest degree, but it should never be forgotten that while economic reasons for peace are valid and should be dwelt upon, yet the only true basis for permanent peace is the Christian basis—war is wrong because it is against the teaching of Christ.

Let each one do his part in helping to hasten the day.

"When peace shall over all the earth

Its ancient splendors fling,

And the whole world send back the song

Which now the angels sing."

SECOND ANNUAL SUMMER ASSEMBLY OF YOUNG FRIENDS.

From Seventh month 26th to Eighth month 2d the Second Annual Summer Assembly of Young Friends of America will be held at Winona Lake. The purpose of this meeting is to train the members of the Friends Young People's organizations for leaders in all branches of Christian service.

Up to this time the following speakers have been obtained: D. A. Poling, Field Secretary for Ohio; Albert J. Brown, President of Wilmington College; E. H. Stranahan, of Friends University; Chas. E. Tebbetts, Secretary for the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions; George H. Moore, Kokomo, Ind.; C. O. Whitely, Carthage, Ind.; Daisy Barr, Muncie, Ind.; Levi T. Pennington, Richmond, Ind.; E. Leona Wright, Indianapolis, Ind.

The rates of tuition will be $1.50 for the course. Lillian E. Hayes, of Dunreith, Ind., is in charge of the arrangements for the Assembly. She is the general secretary. Other officers making up the advisory board are Harry Reeves, Richmond, Ind.; Levi T. Pennington, Richmond, Ind., and Dorothy Luther, Fairmount, Ind.

The daily program for the Assembly has been prepared as follows: 7 A. M., rising bell; 7.30 A. M., Breakfast; 8.15 to 8.50 A. M., quiet hour; 8.55 to 9.50 A. M., delegates divide into classes for the purpose of instruction on Methods of Mission Study, and Friends History and Doctrine; 9.50 to 10.10 A. M., informal conferences; 10.10 to 11 A. M., simultaneous classes on "Methods for use in the Bible School." "Methods for use in Junior and Intermediate Societies" and "Methods of Personal Work;" 11.10 to 12 noon, period for study of Methods to be used in all branches of Christian Endeavor work; 12.15 P. M., dinner; 1 to 6 P. M., recreation and study; 6 P. M., supper; 7.45, vesper service by the lakeside; 8 to 8.15 P. M., song service; 8.15, inspirational address.

Winona Lake, Ind., where the Assembly is to be held, is on the Main Line of the Pennsylvania railroad and near the junction of the Big Four (New York Central) and Pennsylvania railroads. It also may be reached by inter-urban railroad from any direction.

Winona Lake is not a summer resort in the usual sense. It has for its purpose the highest ideals. While it gives

FEED YOUNG GIRLS.

MUST HAVE RIGHT FOOD WHILE GROWING.

Great care should be taken at the critical period when the young girl is just merging into womanhood that the diet shall contain that which is up-building and nothing harmful.

At that age the structure is being formed and if formed of a healthy, sturdy character, health and happiness will follow; on the other hand unhealthy cells may be built in and a sick condition slowly supervene which, if not checked, may ripen into a chronic condition and cause life-long suffering.

A young lady says:

"Coffee began to have such an effect on my stomach a few years ago that I finally quit using it. It brought on headaches, pains in my muscles, and nervousness.

"I tried to use tea in its stead, but found its effects, even worse than those I suffered from coffee. Then for a long time I drank milk at my meals, but at last it palled on me. A friend came to the rescue with the suggestion that I try Postum.

"I did so, only to find at first, that I didn't fancy it. But I had heard of so many persons who had been benefited by its use that I persevered, and when I had made it right—according to directions on the package—I found it grateful in flavour and soothing and strengthening to my stomach. I can find no words to express my feeling of what I owe to Postum!

"In every respect it has worked a wonderful improvement—the headaches, nervousness, the pains in my side and back, all the distressing symptoms yielded to the magic power of Postum. My brain seems also to share in the betterment of my physical condition; it seems keener, more alert and brighter. I am, in short, in better health now than for a long while before, and I am sure I owe it to the use of your Postum." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

attention to the physical and mental welfare, its ultimate purpose is to foster spirituality, and to this end it is dominated by no church or denomination, but is open to use by all churches and all denominations, and courts the inspection and interest of all.

From Seventh month 2d to Eighth month 20th this year, the Winona Chautauqua season will be held. During this time the best of talent will be heard from the platform of the Winona auditorium and the most expensive spectacles will be given on the lake. Among the latter will be the flights by Glenn H. Curtiss, in his hydro-aeroplane, the machine that is both boat and airship.

Following the Chautauqua season the Bible Conference will be held. This is the largest Bible Conference in the world, and will attract this year a number of the most eminent men in the cause of Christian service, including Gypsy Smith. The full list of ministers who will attend and take part in the conference is not completed, but the tentative list includes G. A. Johnston Ross, of Bryn Mawr, formerly of London; James Y. Simpson, successor to Henry Drummond, of Glasgow; Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton; William A. Sunday, of Winona Lake; W. E. Biedewolf, of Monticello, and many others of equal prominence.

After this conference is completed, the International Lyceum Association will hold its annual convention at Winona Lake. This is the organization of the lecturers and entertainers with the different lyceum bureaus, and the program given by this organization is considered the best that the talent itself can arrange.

During the season, also, there will be a number of smaller conferences and conventions, almost too numerous to note.

The charges at Winona Lake are reasonable. In this respect the community holds a unique position among organizations of its kind. It is not a money-making institution, but is supported largely by gifts. Board and room and the usual accommodations are at average prices for services received.

The meeting of the Young Friends was held last year at Winona Lake.

Can't Get Away From It

Is it possible to nourish, strengthen and Rebuild the Brain by Food?

Every man who thinks uses up part of the brain each day. Why don't it all disappear and leave an empty skull in say a month of brain work? Because the man rebuilds each day.

If he builds a little less than he destroys, brain fag and nervous prostration result sure. If he builds back a little more each day, the brain grows stronger and more capable. That also is sure. Where does man get the material to rebuild his brain? Is it from air, sky or the ice of the Arctic sea? When you come to think about it, the rebuilding material must be in the food and drink.

That also is sure.

Are the brain rebuilding materials found in all food? In a good variety but not in suitable proportion in all.

To illustrate: we know bones are made largely of lime and magnesia taken from food; therefore to make healthy bone structure we must have food containing these things. We would hardly feed only sugar and fat to make healthy bone structure in a growing child.

Likewise if we would feed in a skillful manner to insure getting what the brain requires for strength and rebuilding, we must first know what the brain is composed of and then select some article or articles (there are more than one) that contain these elements.

Analysis of brain by an unquestionable authority, Geoghegan, shows of Mineral Salts, Phosphoric Acid and Potash combined (Phosphate of Potash) 2.91 per cent of the total, 5.33 of all mineral Salts.

This is over one-half.

Beaunis, another authority, shows "Phosphoric Acid combined" and Potash 73.44 per cent. from a total of 101.07.

Considerable more than one-half of Phosphate of Potash.

Analysis of Grape-Nuts shows: Potassium and Phosphorus (which join and make Phosphate of Potash) is considerable more than one-half of all the mineral salts in the food.

Dr. Geo. W. Carey, an authority on the constituent elements of the body, says: "The gray matter of the brain is controlled entirely by the inorganic cell-salt, Potassium Phosphate (Phosphate of Potash). This salt unites with albumen and by the addition of oxygen creates nerve fluid or the gray matter of the brain. Of course, there is a trace of other salts and other organic matter in nerve fluid, but Potassium Phosphate is the chief factor, and has the power within itself to attract, by its own law of affinity, all things needed to manufacture the elixir of life."

Further on he says: "The beginning and end of the matter is to supply the lacking principle, and in molecular form, exactly as nature furnishes it in vegetables, fruits and grain. To supply deficiencies—this is the only law of cure."

The natural conclusion is that if Phosphate of Potash is the needed mineral element in brain and you use food which does not contain it, you have brain fag because its daily loss is not supplied.

On the contrary, if you eat food known to be rich in this element, you place before the life forces that which nature demands for brain-building.

Mind does not work well on a brain that is broken down by lack of nourishment.

A peaceful and evenly poised mind is necessary to good digestion.

Worry, anxiety, fear, hate, etc., etc., directly interfere with or stop the flow of Ptyalin, the digestive juice of the mouth, and also interfere with the flow of the digestive juices of stomach and pancreas.

Therefore, the mental state of the individual has much to do (more than suspected) with digestion.

Brain is made of Phosphate of Potash as the principal Mineral Salt, added to albumen and water.

Grape-Nuts contain that element as more than one-half of all its mineral salts.

A healthy brain is important, if one would "do things" in this world.

A man who sneers at "Mind" sneers at the best and least understood part of himself. That part which some folks believe links us to the Infinite.

Mind asks for a healthy brain upon which to act, and Nature has defined a way to make a healthy brain and renew it day by day as it is used up from work of the previous day.

Nature's way to rebuild is by the use of food which supplies the things required. Brain rebuilding material is certainly found in

The Basis of Religion

AS in the past, so in the future, the primary concerns of serious men will be spiritual concerns: how to become allied with God, how to enjoy Him forever, how to overcome the fleeting and temporal by the power of the permanent and eternal, how to build into reality that unquenched faith in a Kingdom of God which all true prophets have helped to kindle. The curve is not backwards, but forwards. There is a steady irresistible onward push toward further development. We are not called to fan a flickering flame or to nurse a dying hope. It is not our mission to prop a tottering ark, or to bolster up an artificial system. We have to deal, rather, with the aptitudes and hungers of the soul itself, and with religion grounded in the very nature of things.

- Second-day, Fifth month 29th. A mother's influence.
I Sam. 1: 19-28.
Third-day. Youthful piety. I Sam. 3: 1-11.
Fourth-day. A preacher. I Sam. 7: 1-6.
Fifth-day. The self-effacing servant. I Sam. 8: 22; 12: 19-25.
Sixth-day. Reprover of kings. I Sam. 15: 10-22.
Seventh-day. Willing to withdraw. I Sam. 15: 34, 35.

Mention other lessons from Samuel's life.

What helps you most in Samuel's life?

What is the difference between Samuel and Eli's sons?

Old age dwells much upon the past and the future, little upon the present. Memories and hopes fill the horizon of experience. From the summit of his life crowned with many years and bright with the sunset radiance, Samuel looks backward over the long road he has travelled. The mile stones are marked; a mother's influence, temple service, obedience to the call of God, a just judge, a faithful ruler, a true prophet. What an unsullied record he looked upon! How fearlessly he appealed for the people's verdict! Old age was confident because youth had been true. Old age was serene because youth had been pure. Old age was victorious because each day's battle had been fought well and valiantly. The crown we wear in life's maturity is made of the materials we gathered as we travelled the varied roads of life's experience.

* * *

"A little child shall lead them." The pictorial setting suggested by this verse is the little child leading the lion, the lamb, the wolf and the calf. Let us imagine a picture of the age of Samuel with its crude selfishness, its roughness, its materialism, and its unspirituality in the background, the child Samuel in the foreground, and underneath the same title, "A little child shall lead them." The twentieth century might truthfully be portrayed in the same way. The child in his simplicity, his spirituality and his potentiality is more the concern and center of the thought of the humanity than ever before in the history of the world. Beneath this picture I would place the Master's words: "Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of Heaven."

Neither theology, nor creed nor dogma is the key to the Kingdom of Heaven. The spirit of childhood is its doorway and the spirit of childhood is its center. God taught this to humanity as early as "Samuel ministered unto Jehovah." I Sam. 3.

* * *

"It (Christianity) professes to make old things new, in other words, to let us see the old things as they looked, when they were new, and so to give us a true sense of their power and beauty. What is this but to recreate in us the life of Samuel? What is this but to that the true seer must ever be a child, that, however grown-up he be, it is by the survival of his childhood that he sees the Kingdom of God! Little Samuel is no miracle. He reveals the normal law of faith. He is the first of the prophets because he is the first of inspired children. He is a representative man in religion because he is a representative child. All seers of God's Kingdom have seen it by the light of their childhood. We do not drop our childhood when we become men; we carry it with us into the life of men. Every sage bears within his bosom a little Samuel—an instinctive child-life which concludes without reasoning, adores without arguments, worships without symbols, prays without words. The man who listens to this voice is a prophet of the Kingdom."

* * *

Samuel to the Children of Israel represented God. Through him they spoke to God; through him God spoke to them; through him God worked upon them and for them. There have been times when sacrifices, symbols, dogmas and ritualistic ceremonialism played this rôle. That generation has been nearest God where a man has stood in the gap between humanity and divinity. As God's representative, Samuel purified public worship, rooted out idolatry, judged the people, humbled the pride of Israel's enemies, made and unmade kings. Nothing pained him more than to feel the heart of the people moving away from God; nothing pleased him more than to feel their hearts growing warm toward God who yearned over them with a heart more tender and solicitous than that of Samuel himself. What a place for a man to hold, what a mission to fulfil! He was "as the shade of a great rock in a weary land." Jesus filled this place. He honored it with His presence and forever dignified and hallowed it as the divinely appointed means of linking earth and heaven, the human and the divine, time and eternity, the material and the spiritual. "As my Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." "We are ambassadors therefore on behalf of Christ."

* * *

Samuel began his service for God by doing a hard thing. I Sam. 3: 10-14. It was not easy to bring before the high priest the wickedness of his family. It promised the loss for Samuel of high priestly prestige, and dismissal from the tabernacle service. It appeared to run across the very purpose of his life, but he did it because it was duty. "The divine life had always run counter to a worldly principle, and has required to make its way in conflict with that principle. The road of individual pleasure is not parallel with the road of virtue. They will diverge with you as they diverged with Samuel—at the very point where duty calls. The hour of his spiritual promotion was precisely that hour which presaged his material degradation. The experience of the first prophet will be the experience of all Christian seers." This happened not only at life's threshold, but later when he chose Israel's king it was against his own will, it cast a shadow over prophetic prospects in the nation, it was a silent rebuke on the part of the people to the regime of the judges of which Samuel was one. Samuel was a judge and a prophet. In him the ruler of men and the speaker for God were combined. The statesman-preacher finds his noble type in Samuel. Politics were molded by a prophet's personality. There are men like this in the country today. Name some of them. The greatest cry of our country today is for more such men.

News in Brief

There is a bill pending in the House of Representatives favoring the admission of Arizona and New Mexico providing certain changes are made in their proposed constitutions. Among other things, the bill proposes a system by which the citizens of New Mexico shall have an opportunity to amend their constitution within a stated period and another paragraph removes the much controverted provision for the recall of judges, contained in the Arizona Constitution.

* * *

Another woman's enfranchisement bill has been introduced in the House of Commons by George Kemp, Manchester. The measure confers the right to vote on every woman possessing the "household qualification" which requires occupancy as owner or tenant of a house, or part of a house, in which the landlord or superior tenant does not reside. Married women are not permitted to vote in the same constituency as their husbands. The bill passed the second reading by a vote of 255 to 83. If it becomes a law it will enfranchise about a million women.

In more ways than one, Cardinal Gibbons's part in the opening of the Peace Congress at Baltimore was peculiarly impressive. He had been asked to open the exercises with prayer, but made a brief address to the Congress instead. "I thought," he said, "that a formal invocation was unnecessary on the present occasion, for every discourse uttered today will be a prayer in the sacred cause of peace." In no way could he have more signally testified his feeling of the identification of religion with the cause of peace.

The August Character of Law

We are sometimes inclined to think that there are no solid pillars under the social structure, that corruption reigns everywhere, and that laws are made, interpreted and unmade to suit those who have wealth and influence. For those who hold this yellow view of things, the decision of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case should furnish food for reflection.

Here the most powerful trust-corporation that has ever existed is declared to be dissolved because it is found to be "a conspiracy and monopoly in restraint of trade." It can safely be asserted that not a dollar of the immense funds at the disposal of the Standard Oil Company has been used to corrupt the great court which has been sitting upon the case, and no intelligent person suspects that anything except calm judgment has determined the momentous decision. There is on the one hand such an enormous aggregation of capital that it baffles imagination, and on the other hand the unsullied majesty of law.

There are, no doubt, many influences at work in our country which have lessened the respect due to law and authority. There are unmistakable evidences that some men use their position as law-makers for commercial ends, and vote as they are paid to vote; and it is well known that some persons who are raised to places of dignity and authority think only of the opportunity which their high places give them of feathering their nests; but we must not in our haste conclude that "the trail of the serpent" is over all public men and that the old-fashioned regard for public honor and righteous doing in high places is dead and gone. I do not believe it is so.

There is still among us a solid remnant of that old spirit, which was so strong in the Puritans, and in the Quakers, the spirit of obedience to the deep ground swell of righteousness, that spirit which made a man ready to die before he would deviate from the strait, hard path of duty. And we are, too, having almost constant evidence that the law still holds its august and unswerving sway. All the influences of corruption, which sometimes seem irresistible, were powerless to save the men who juggled with the public funds in building the Harrisburg Capitol. The slow, somewhat leaden-footed march of justice finally brought these men "to their own place," and taught them that the divine plumb-line, which Amos saw in his vision, is still hanging in the universe, though now and then a person appears to dodge it for a time.

We have an instance of the augustness of law in the suppression of lotteries and gambling. Not many years ago a great lottery was entrenched in our country and, like an octopus, stretched its tentacles into almost every township. It had an enormous corruption-fund at its disposal, it appealed to the selfish interests of a multitude of persons, but the silent, irresistible force of law has swept it off our soil. The gigantic influence of the racetrack in New York seemed able to defy public sentiment and was cunning enough for a long time to circumvent all laws made to destroy it. It is now stamped out of existence by the invisible but irresistible force of law.

We have made many pitiful failures in our attempts to wipe out the saloon, and the dallying with the law in prohibition States is a very dark blot on our name and on the respect due to law. The time should come, and come soon, when every State should either execute its prohibitory laws to the last limit or adopt some other method of dealing with the traffic. Every glaring case of disrespect for law, every instance of winking at the existence of the thing which the law says shall not be there is disastrous, for it tends to sap the moral vitality of our people and tarnishes our most precious jewel. We are winning no victories by writing down laws which we treat as empty words and which we calmly nullify in practice.

Let us guard as one of the most precious assets of our national wealth a deep and abiding respect for law, and let us rejoice over every instance like this present one, when the law exhibits its majesty and carries its august power in issues where such enormous amounts of money are involved. Swarthmore Lectures

The significance of the Swarthmore Lectureship, founded by the Woodbrooke Extension Committee in 1908, cannot be overemphasized. Each year, on the eve of London Yearly Meeting, someone selected by the committee delivers a lecture "on some subject relating to the message and work of the Society of Friends." The purpose of the lecture is two-fold: "Firstly, to interpret further to the members of the Society of Friends their message and mission; and, secondly, to bring before the public the spirit, the aims and the fundamental principles of the Friends."

We have thus an annual presentation of some great religious theme by one of our best scholars—a perennial interpretation of religious truth. These lectures, of which the fourth is to be delivered this week, have been made available in book form, and can be secured from the New York Friends Book and Tract Committee (see announcement elsewhere in this issue). To those who wish to obtain clear, modern, scholarly presentation of religious truth, we especially commend these little volumes. They are as follows:

First, Quakerism: A Religion of Life, by Rufus M. Jones. In it the religion which found its fulfillment in Jesus of Nazareth is buttressed in the fundamental needs and functions of the human soul. A paragraph from the lecture appears on the cover page this week.

Second, Spiritual Guidance in Quaker Experience, by William C. Braithwaite. Our profession along this line has been high; our experience halting and imperfect. A broad study of the subject is therefore of first importance. We need to face our errors and limitations in order to know our sure ground of confidence. This the lecturer does, and points the way to higher and safer paths than those we have trodden in the past.

Third, The Communion of Life, by Joan Mary Fry, in which the active principle of Christianity is defined as communion—with God it is worship; with man it is fellowship; and with nature it is appreciation. The ideal set forth gives one a very vivid realization of what it means to be a true Friend.

The fourth lecture is to be given by Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, on Human Progress and the Inward Light. Here again we have the promise of a broad and helpful discussion of a vital Quaker doctrine.

Raising Earlham's Debt

A campaign is now in progress in Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings to liquidate the Earlham College debt, which amounts to about $52,000. More than 200 men and women are devoting themselves to the work, and they hope to have the full amount in hand by commencement time next month. The yearly meetings have been divided into districts, and the work so organized that the entire territory will be covered within the specified time. Morton C. Pearson has been released from his pastoral duties in Indianapolis to act as chairman of the campaign committee, and has established headquarters in the library building at the college.

With the announcement, on the 12th inst., of the beginning of the campaign came also the information that practically $10,000 of the required amount was already pledged, the Senior class of Earlham having subscribed the first $1,000; the members of the Earlham faculty subscribed $3,000, and Jos. A. Goddard, Muncie, a member of the board of trustees, pledged $2,000. These pledges, with the money raised at the May-day celebration, make up the $10,000.

All money is being subscribed on condition that the full amount be raised. In speaking of the situation, Pres. Kelley says:

We are dreaming great dreams for the future.

Men of means are interested in Earlham's permanent prosperity. We hope to increase the endowment very materially, but the debt at present blocks the way to this desirable end. If it can be demonstrated that Earlham has the vitality to throw off the present congestion, her system will be cleared and there is good reason to believe that pure food will be forthcoming in quantity and richness, which will insure red blood and strong tissue in the years to come.

Certainly now is the time for the friends of Earlham to act.

Supreme Court Decisions

On the 15th inst., the Supreme Court of the United States handed down three important decisions. Of first interest was an order for the dissolution of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, commonly known as the "Oil Trust," which was found to be a conspiracy and monopoly in restraint of trade. For accomplishing this, the court sets a period of six months, and the company is not to be excluded from interstate commerce pending the transformation.

In its general interpretation of the anti-trust law, the court holds that it is necessary to distinguish between "reasonable" and "unreasonable" restraint of trade. The law thus construed does not apply to all combinations, contracts or acts in restraint of trade, but only to those which are shown to be unreasonable and in which the intent to form an unlawful conspiracy or monopoly can be proved or inferred. This introduces an element of uncertainty in the application of the law, since it will be necessary for the courts to decide in each case whether or not a particular combination is "unreasonable." The effect of this interpretation as viewed by Justice Harlan, who dissented from this part of the decision, is to read into the law the word "unreasonable." In so doing, he feels that the court overstepped its constitutional bounds. Some apprehension is felt concerning this feature of the decision, but the general effect has been reassuring to business.

A second decision of special significance was the approval of a sentence for contempt imposed on C. C. Wilson, president of the United Wireless Telegraph Co., for refusing to bring the company's books into court, lest they would reveal facts prejudicial to himself and his associates.

By this decision the Federal Government has won a far-reaching legal controversy, in that officers of corporations cannot refuse to give up possession of corporation books for examination by grand juries, lest they themselves be incriminated thereby.

A third decision sets aside the sentences of imprisonment imposed by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on Samuel Gompers, John Mitchell and Frank Morrison for alleged disobedience of a boycott injunction. The court unanimously held that the only penalties that could be imposed upon the labor leaders were fines, and advised that the case be dismissed. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, however, has disregarded the recommendation and has again instituted proceedings for contempt.

Basis of Unlimited Arbitration With England and France

No little surprise was occasioned last week when the State Department announced that France as well as England would be invited to consider unlimited arbitration with the United States. The inclusion of France in this invitation should have a wide moral influence, since it makes plain that our Government seeks no narrow alliance with our English-speaking kinsfolk, but stands ready to negotiate with any nation which is prepared to make an honest effort to substitute law and reason for the mailed hand in the adjustment of international differences.

With this announcement came an outline of the plan submitted to England and France as a basis for further negotiation. It is proposed that every question plainly capable of judicial settlement, such as matters of fact or the interpretation of existing laws or treaties, is to go, as a matter of course, to the international tribunal at The Hague, as under the existing arbitration treaties. The new treaties, however, will recognize no reservations of matters affecting "national honor or vital interests." When differences arise which either or both countries think impossible of judicial adjustment, a joint commission of inquiry, composed of nations who are members of The Hague Court, is called into being to pass upon the question, and a decision by that commission directing arbitration is to be binding upon both.

It is conceivable that, in the event of a decision against arbitration, the final resort to war might not, after all, be averted, but a treaty along the lines outlined by the State Department would effectually prevent a hasty or passionate appeal to force. In a majority of cases it would probably point the way to a peaceful solution.

Veto Bill Passed

The Lords' Veto Bill passed its third reading in the House of Commons last week by a vote of 362 to 241. It is practically certain to become a law, since the king has promised to create a sufficient number of Liberal peers to override any hostile majority that may assert itself in the Upper House. The bill provides, first, that the House of Lords shall have power neither to reject nor to amend any bill which, in the judgment of the Speaker of the House of Commons, falls into the category of money bills, and, second, that any measure which shall have been passed by the House of Commons at three sessions during a period of not less than two years shall, upon the assent of the Crown, become law, even though the House of Lords shall have refused each time to pass the measure.

This action so alarmed the Conservatives in the House of Lords that a counter-proposition has been submitted, far more radical than anyone would have dared to expect a month ago. The measure, known as the Lansdowne Bill, proposes to abolish the present House of Lords, which is largely hereditary, and substitute in its stead a body of about one-half its present size, chosen as follows: First, 100 Lords of Parliament elected by the entire hereditary peerage from among those of their own number who have had experience in public affairs; second, 120 Lords of Parliament to be elected from outside the hereditary peerage by an electoral college composed of members of the Lower House; and, third, 100 Lords of Parliament to be appointed by the Crown on the recommendation of the Cabinet. In addition to these three categories, the House would include the princes of the blood royal, two archbishops, five bishops, instead of twenty-four as now, and sixteen law lords.

There is now no hope that the Lansdowne Bill will checkmate the veto bill, but its measures may be taken up later, after the present reform is in operation. The next thing on the Liberal program is home rule for Ireland.

A Provisional Government Controls Mexico

A provisional government is in control of Mexico, Pres. Diaz and Vice-pres. Carral having decided to withdraw for the sake of peace. De la Barra, Minister of War, is, under the constitution, acting President, and Madero, the insurrection leader, has been consulted in the reorganization of the Cabinet. While, for constitutional reasons, the terms of peace do not mention the fact, the insurrectionists are to advise with at least one-half the provincial legislatures in the selection of new Governors. A general election is to be called at an early date, and a new election law, fixing the presidential term at seven years and greatly extending the right of franchise, will probably be enacted.

Happiness

A maiden stood in love's fresh glow;
Her eyes pledged all that love can give;
"Each breath is bliss," she whispered low;
" 'Tis happiness to live!"

A dying woman, old and lone,
Said, "Thank Thee, Lord," with a glad sigh;
"Thou now wilt give me back my own,—
'Tis happiness to die!"

An angel, watching Age and Youth,
Said gently, from his place above,
"These two but speak a single truth,—
'Tis happiness to love!"

The Story of a Garden

BY RUFUS M. JONES.

When the world was very fresh and new, there was a beautiful garden, named Eden, in a place where four rivers met. Everything that was lovely to look at and beautiful to smell and delicious to eat grew in this garden. There were so many flowers in it that you could pick them all day long and then not notice that there were any fewer. There were so many kinds of fruits that you could find a new kind everywhere you walked, and the odors from all over the garden blended together and made a perfume too wonderful to be described. By the banks of the four rivers it was cool and delicious, and the sounds of the rippling water mingled sweetly with the songs of the birds who had their nests in the trees.

There has never been such a lovely spot anywhere else since the world was made, and you would suppose that the people who lived in this delightful garden were the happiest people the world has ever seen. There were no thorns on their roses, no briars on their vines. The animals were all gentle toward them, and they themselves were never ill and never had any pains and never wept over any sorrows. There were only two persons in this happy place, and all the great garden was theirs. There was a man whose name was Adam, and a woman whose name was Eve. Although they were tall and full grown, they were exactly like two children, for they had never been any littler, because they had come into the world all grown up. They never were tiny babies; Adam never had been a little boy, and Eve never had been a little girl. They just found themselves all made, without having to grow the way the rest of us do. At the very first, Adam had been alone in the garden. He never knew how he got there; one day he discovered himself all made. He had no one to talk with, no one to walk with, no one to help him take care of the flowers. But when he woke up from a sleep in the morning, he saw a beautiful woman sitting near him as though he were seeing her in a dream; but when he had rubbed his eyes awake he found that she was a real live person and was to stay with him all the time and be his companion, and that they two together were to have the garden for theirs.

Little by little they found out that God had made them. When it was all still and quiet in the cool of the evening, when the birds were asleep in their nests and the breezes hardly moved the leaves, they could hear God speaking to them. He seemed to come down to them from the sky, but they never could quite tell where He lived or how He came and went. They only knew that He really did speak to them. His voice was sweet and gentle and full of love and tenderness like a mother. They knew that He was kind and good, and they loved Him because He made them such a beautiful home to live in and made them so happy together and was so gentle and loving to them.

The garden was so large that it took them a very long time to get over it all, and as they wandered about, they kept discovering new flowers and new birds and new animals. They were never afraid, for no animals ever hurt them, and they would walk in among them and name them, for, you see, nothing had ever had a name before. Sometimes it made them laugh to see such queer, funny animals as they found in the woods, and it took them a long time to think of names that would fit them. One day, as they were walking along together, as happy as two little children on a May morning, they saw a strange, new tree. There was no other tree like it in the garden; and right near by it was a wonderful Tree of Life, whose top went clear up to the sky and whose branches grew out into heaven itself. This strange, new tree was covered all over with two kinds of fruit, one kind beautiful and the other kind very ugly and disagreeable. They found out, after a while, that this was "Good and Evil Tree." The evening after they had found these two trees and were thinking about them, they heard God speaking to them in a voice as gentle as a mother, and they listened to hear what He would say. They heard Him say that Good and Evil Tree was a very dangerous tree, and that they must not touch it, for, if they did, they could not stay in the happy garden any longer. God told them that every other thing in the garden was for them, that they might have all the fruit and all the flowers they wanted, but that if they picked the fruit on Good and Evil Tree, their life would be changed, their peace and joy would leave them, and they would not be able to hear Him speak to them any more the way they had heard Him before.

"Oh, no; we will never touch it," they said to each other. "We have a great plenty without that tree, and then, too, some of the fruit on that tree looks very rough and prickly and ugly. We will let it all alone and stay in our happy garden and do what God has told us to do." But they couldn't help thinking how lovely the beautiful, golden fruit looked on Good and Evil Tree, and they just wondered how it would taste! At night they dreamed about it, and during the daytime they often walked about Good and Evil Tree and looked at the fruit and looked at it again. "That is a strange tree!" they would say to each other. "If we could eat just one kind of the fruit, the lovely kind, and leave the other prickly kind alone, it would be very nice, wouldn't it?" "I think we had better let it all alone," the other would say, "for that beautiful Voice which we hear talking to us in the cool of the evening told us not to touch it, and whenever we walk over here I hear a gentle whisper inside, which tells me to keep away." "But it would not do any harm to take some of the fruit in the hand and feel of it. I should like very much to know how that wonderful yellow fruit feels!" "I am afraid to touch it," the other would reply; "before we think, we might put it in our mouths. No; let us go far away to another part of the garden and watch the wonderful bees make their honey. They never want to do any wrong."

And so, hand in hand, they walked together and found the bees humming on the clover blossoms and carrying the sweet-smelling honey away to their hives. They also watched the spiders spinning their fine, silky webs, and they sat for a long time seeing the ants carry their food into their tiny cellars. It was a perfect world to live in, but every now and then they would suddenly remember the fruit on Good and Evil Tree and wish they had not been told not to take it! While they were quietly resting after their dinner, one of them—you may guess which one it was—heard a light whisper which seemed to say, "You had better taste of that fruit on Good and Evil Tree. You will like it very much. It is a shame never to try it." It did not sound at all like the gentle Voice which they heard in the cool of the evening, but the one who heard it listened and listened, and the voice kept saying the same thing over and over—"Try it, try it, try it." And, I am sorry to say, the one who heard this whisper finally got up and went to the tree and took some fruit and ate it and brought some back for the other one to eat, and they both did it—just because they couldn't help thinking about it and wishing for it!

But as soon as they had tasted it, they felt the food give them sharp pricks, and everything began to look different. They tried to feel the same as they used to feel, but they could not. There seemed to be something inside them they could not do what they wanted to with, and everything outside looked changed. They sat down and wept for the first time in their lives. Then they began to feel afraid. They were afraid of everything—even of the bees and the spiders and the ants that had been so lovely before, and they felt afraid of each other. And they dreaded to have night come, and they wondered if the Voice would speak again.

It did speak when the evening was come. It told them that they had themselves spoiled their garden. They could never be happy in it again. They had lost it because they did what they were told not to do. They had heard the good Voice and they had heard the bad voice, and they had followed the bad voice, and so the garden, with its pure and lovely things, was no longer theirs. They must go out into the hard world, where there were thorns and thistles, and where they could have only what they worked hard to get. Weeping, they walked away to the gate, which swung out on its great hinges as they came toward it, and they went through and then it swung back and fastened them out. They had lost their garden.

The Graded Lessons in the Junior Department

BY MARGARET T. CAREY.

I am very glad to have the opportunity of saying a few words in regard to the graded lessons, because I have found them so helpful in the class which I teach. In our school we adopted, two years ago, the graded lessons for beginners, primary and juniors, and this year began the intermediate graded lessons.

My class of ten boys, their ages being from ten to thirteen years, are restless, active youngsters, and need to be well kept in hand if they are to learn anything; hence it is important to find out what will interest them, or, in the words of pedagogical phraseology, to find "the point of contact." This is done for the teacher exceedingly well in the teacher's book, which always begins the treatment of the lesson with a most interesting story taken from real life, which attracts the attention of the boy immediately and makes him get the basal truth of the lesson. A memory verse is given and the lesson story simply and interestingly told. It is important for the teacher to be so full of the lesson before going to the class that the book can be entirely left aside, and I, for one, feel very strongly that the lesson should be read by the pupil out of the Bible. The pupil is given a paper to fill out, on which are often general questions about the Bible which should be known by everyone. In some classes this work is done in the teaching period, when that is long enough; others require the pupils to do this work at home, which gives them greater familiarity with the Bible, as they must look up the questions. I have found that a simple reward when the work is well done is very stimulating.

The lessons chosen for the juniors are well adapted for the age of the pupils. In these lessons the idea of moral heroism is brought out by the heroes of the Old Testament, and Jesus' power and majesty are revealed in the portions chosen from the Gospels. Then Jesus' followers are shown, going forth in His strength to do His work, both by lessons from the Acts and by those drawn from the lives of more modern Christians.

The first year comprises the stories from the beginning of the Old Testament, through the journeys of Moses, with eight lessons on the stories that Jesus told.

The material for the second year consists of eight lessons from the conquest of Canaan, nineteen lessons from the life of Christ, followed by the account of the early followers of the Lord Jesus, and then of the later followers of Jesus, ending with eight stories of the Judges.

I have tried to impress the facts of the lessons on the boys' minds, and one day, at the close of the nineteen lessons on the life of Christ, gave them a written examination containing twenty-five questions which could be answered briefly, yet, when taken as a whole, gave a comprehensive view of the life of Christ. Those who had been regular in attendance did very well, so that they evidently had learned a good deal, as the answers were given without any special preparation.

Besides teaching the facts brought out in the lessons, there is the grave responsibility of trying to bring the pupil to a definite decision for Christ and to enter into His service. Those who have gone deeply into the matter seem to think there are two distinct crises in a young person's life—at thirteen and at sixteen or seventeen—and an attempt has been made by those who have prepared the junior lessons to keep this first crisis in view and to lead up to it by appropriate studies.

The lessons succeed very well in bringing out the responsibility for right choices and of giving the pupil a vision of what it means to be a Christian.

In neither the teacher's book nor in the papers given to the scholars is there any sign of denominational teaching, so that any school may use them; and I think that we as Friends should use every means of drawing our scholars to see the truth as we believe it is set forth in the Bible. The First-day school should be the direct road to membership in the meeting, and this can be done through the graded lessons as well as in any other way.

My conclusion is that every school would be benefited very much by grading the scholars and using the graded lessons prepared by the international committee.

Links Binding North Carolina and New England Friends

BY JULIA S. WHITE.

(Concluded.)

Much as might be said further of these Nantucket Friends in the early years and their contribution to the sturdy integrity of our State today, there remains yet one other instance in which New England Quakerism has made a lasting addition to our well-being here in Carolina. It is this: When North Carolina Friends were struggling to establish New Garden Boarding School, we find many subscriptions from New England Friends. The carefully preserved list of donations, both from persons in the State and elsewhere, is an interesting manuscript. Of the New England entries, we have the following:

Stephen Gould of Newport, R. I., Barclay's Apology.	$ 1.50
Friends of New Bedford, Mass., per George Howland.	179.00
E. Wing, of Tiverton, Mass.	100.00
Friends of Lynn and Salem	82.00
Friends of Nantucket Monthly Meeting have given a box of bed clothing.
Anna Jenkins, of Rhode Island	200.00
Mary Atmore Robinson, of Rhode Island	5.00
Joseph Metcalf, of Rhode Island	10.00
Obadiah Brown's benevolent fund	100.00

Enoch Breed, of Rhode Island	5.00
Silas Earl, of Massachusetts	10.00
William Jenkins, of Rhode Island	85.00
Trustees of Obadiah Brown benevolent fund sent books to the value of	35.00

The following note appended shows the accuracy with which the record is kept: "These books were sent from Providence, R. I., in a box with J. S. Slocum's books in 1837, but the list was brought on by Percy Peck."

In 1838, "George Howland paid for school $1,000.00." Eleventh month, 1841, "Donation from George Howland, $1,000.00." There is another entry in 1839, thus, "George Howland paid $1,000.00," but whether this means an added $1,000.00 or the payment of the first $1,000.00 is not quite clear. When the committee on education makes its report to the yearly meeting, we find summaries like the following: In 1834, "Friends in the Northern and New England States furnished beds and bedding furniture for the house to the number of 75 to 80 beds. * * ! Seeing the interest that other yearly meetings are taking for the establishment of our boarding school, and believing the institution to be of vital importance to the members of our Society, we very much desire that all our members may unite harmoniously in the concern and be willing to pay not only what they have subscribed, but to contribute generously of our substance that a bountiful Providence has pleased to bestow upon us."

In 1836, "The committee has received since last yearly meeting, contributions

From our own members	$423.20
From New England Y. M.	280.00

(Showing that, next to our own, New England Yearly Meeting was the largest contributor)."

In 1837 a final summary report is made. Donations are shown to have been made as follows for the three years 1835-1837:

From England	$2,444.44
Philadelphia and New York	148.00
New England	1,361.00
North Carolina	1,247.18

At that yearly meeting, North Carolina Friends added $915.00 more. So, outside North Carolina, New England stands second among American Friends in the promotion of the educational interests among us in its pioneer days. This sum probably included George Howland's first $1,000.00; and it was at this yearly meeting that his agent promises the second $1,000.00, provided Friends here would raise a like sum, and, as already stated, they raised $915.00 of this.

Necessary as was the material equipment, and grateful as Friends were to their Northern helpers, as shown in the letters of Nathan Hunt to George Howland, yet this was not all. In the first report of the operation of the school is the statement, "Four competent teachers were obtained, three of them from New England." These three were Jonathan Slocum, Harriet Peck and Catherine Corvell. While in succeeding years the school did not draw so heavily upon our Northern Friends for its teaching force, yet from time to time there were valuable additions from New England. Notable among these was Ezra Meader.

While thus citing what New England Friends did for the boarding school, we are not unmindful, neither are we ungrateful, for what others did; but that is not the matter under consideration in this article, hence the specification.

It would hardly be complete to pass over the statement of the trustees, who declare a purchase of 100 acres of land for the school, and add, "Elihu Coffin has given to the institution a tract of land adjoining, containing 70 acres." To be sure, he was a resident of Carolina, but his "name betrayeth him" as being of Nantucket origin.

Aside from the work of the boarding school, it is worthy of mention that Rebecca (Marble) Thomas did an excellent work in Eastern Carolina among the Up River Friends. William Symmes' work in Belvidere Academy deserves special mention, for it was he who was a telling inspiration in the lives of many of the leading men and women in our State today. Lawyers, teachers, doctors, financiers, both in the Friends church and elsewhere, in our own State and elsewhere, are either students or "grand students" of his. With a wasting vitality, but a quickened mind, he was much to Carolina.

A beautiful life came to us from Rhode Island in the person of Ellen (Bassett) Nicholson, wife of our honored friend, Josiah Nicholson, and her frail but spirit-filled body was one of the shining lights in the ministry of North Carolina Yearly Meeting a generation ago.

This paper has purposely been a citation of facts, and we believe such facts have revealed a strong undercurrent of kindly interest and helpfulness and a proof of the truth that we are one in interest, however widely scattered in territory. In those pioneer days, New England, as the home of American Quakerism and at that time better favored in financial successes than some others, and still aglow with the burning zeal which persecution had kindled, was not unmindful of its duty; and for what she did for North Carolina, we would give due credit and a grateful "I thank you."

No doubt there are many other things which deserve mention in a paper titled as this. To have them brought to light would be what the present writer would be glad to see done, and thus add other links to the chain which binds us together in one bond of Christian fellowship.

Marching Orders*

BY FRED. CARTER.

"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Mk. 16: 15-16.

"Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren—" Matt. 25: 45.

"Go ye into all the world." I like this text, for it has such a sweep to it—it says "go," and doesn't leave anyone out.

When He delivered this command to His followers, He was on His way Home. I believe He looked with joy to that home-going, glad it was "finished." But for all that, He did not forget the heathen. Matchless love!

Gethsemane, with its hours of agony and blood, was over. He could now look beyond it. He had been brought before Pilate and the Sanhedrin, and had been tried and condemned. All that was past. Calvary, with its hour of horror, was gone forever. And the empty tomb lay behind Him.

It was there on Mt. Olivet, with a little body of believers (missionaries), a mere handful of men around Him, that He gave them His parting words—a mission. It was the Captain of our salvation, telling His warriors what to do after He was gone.

For almost two thousand years the heralds of the Cross have been crossing seas and fording rivers, enduring hardships, persecution, preaching the truth of the Gospel to the people. And today we live in an open land as free as the air. We owe our freedom from heathenism and superstition to missionary effort.

The missionary tours of the apostle Paul were directly responsible for the Gospel being taken to the countries north of the Mediterranean Sea. And from there Gregory sent missionaries to our barbarian forefathers. Suppose, as Paul started out from Antioch, he had gone south into Africa instead of north. We would have been living in savagery today. Surely we are debtors to the barbarians. Let those who are against missionary effort remember that the only reason they are not in heathen darkness and superstition is because some missionaries heeded the command of Jesus, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

"Every dollar you give to convert the heathen world, God gives $10.00 worth of purpose to deal with our heathen at home." "Why did you put your $5.00 gold-piece in the missionary collection, Johnny?" a little boy was asked by his mother. "Because," he answered, "the congregation were singing 'Bring forth a royal diadem and crown Him Lord of all,' and I imagined I could hear His steps coming down the aisle to receive His crown, and I did not want Him to wear a copper crown or a silver crown, but a gold crown." Part of our work in missions is to give our gold for Christ's coronation.

David Livingstone uttered prophetic words when he said, the night before he started for Africa, "The time will come when rich men will think it an honor to support whole stations of missionaries instead of spending their money on hounds and horses." This has literally become true. Men are learning to put Christ's Kingdom where it ought to be. The great Laymen's Missionary Movement is a proof that men are awake on the subject of missions. Thousands of the world's best business men are actively engaged in missionary effort. Missionary work is no longer left to the women and children, for men have gotten ashamed of seeing the women bearing the burden in the heat of the day, and at last they have risen to the task in earnest.

And if you don't believe in missions today, you are very much behind the times. Someone has said, "Wherever you hear a man say he don't believe in missions, take a good long look at him, for he belongs to a species that is fast becoming extinct."

Who of our Lord's disciples caught the spirit of the Master? They who obeyed Him, or the one who betrayed Him? The only one of the twelve apostles who did not become a foreign missionary was Judas, the traitor, who betrayed his Master with a kiss and sold Him for thirty pieces of silver. You don't believe in missions? Neither did Judas. I would get in better company if I were you.

Great are the missionary activities today. Christ's forces are being brought into line for action—Y. M. C. A., Student Volunteers, Laymen's Movement, Bible societies.

Great are the missionary activities today in Korea. During some revival services recently held in one of the largest cities in Korea, a man confessed that he was a highwayman; he said to the missionary that he had decided to accept Christ, and asked what he should do. The missionary told him that he ought to go to the magistrate and confess his crime. This he did, and the magistrate remarked that it was a most wonderful thing, and had him detained in a warm room. He told him that if he had been captured that he would have been instantly beheaded, but he would refer it to the governor of the province. The governor wrote back that never before in the history of the province had anything like it happened, and therefore, in this special case, he would pardon the man. The magistrate said to the criminal that he was glad there was a religion that would change a man's heart so that he would do as the highwayman did.

From the beginning of the great revival in Korea, the Bible has been the one great book of the Christians. Dr. James S. Gale tells of one man who traveled 100 miles to see him, and when asked the purpose of his visit, replied, "I have been memorizing some verses of the Bible, and came to recite them to you." The man recited, without an error, the entire "Sermon on the Mount." Dr. Gale told him that if he merely memorized it, it would do him no good, but he must apply its teachings to his life. Then the man's face lighted up, as he replied, "That is the way I learned it."

The Bible is the missionaries' book. How many of the 27 books of the New Testament were written by missionaries. Name over the entire 27, take out the books written by missionaries, and see how much of a message you have left. Without the writings of the missionaries we would have no Gospels, for the four Gospels were penned by missionaries, one of them by the first medical missionary, Dr. Luke. The Acts of the Apostles were also written by this same medical missionary—the acts of missionaries.

Every book in the New Testament was written by a missionary. Without the writings of the missionaries we would have no New Testament. Every epistle is a letter written by a missionary to a mission church. Every personal letter is a letter written by a missionary to another missionary. The Bible is a missionary book. Its central theme is missions.

Some people think that missionary work is a phase of the Church work. They are wrong. Missionary work is not a phase of the Church work. It is the whole of it. The Church has no business in the world aside from its missionary enterprise. It is the whole business of the Church to carry the Gospel to the world. The whole work of Christ was missionary work. He was the first great Missionary.

We all have a part in this work—each one of us. "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethern, ye did it unto me." Inasmuch as ye did it unto one. If the world is ever to be won to Christ, it must be done by personal work. It must be won by one.

Peace as a Preventive of Poverty*

BY J. W. MAGRUDER

GEN. SEC. FEDERATED CHARITIES
BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. Marburg, in his letter inviting me to speak upon this subject, enclosed a circular letter containing a statement which to those which are uninformed must be nothing short of astounding, that "for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1910, the United States expended on the navy, the army and on pensions, which are the result of past wars, $447,620,723.65, constituting 68 per cent. of the ordinary disbursements of the Government, including postoffice deficiency." This means nearly $5.00 per capita for every man, woman and child in the United States, Alaska, the Philippines and all our colonial possessions. It means for every family of five an annual tax of nearly $25. It means for the average wage-earner with a family of six or seven, a tax of $30 or $35 or more.

Nor does this tell the whole tale, for the enormous expenditures of more than two-thirds of the nation's income goes into an absolutely non-productive, I need not say destructive, business; the men who are engaged in it are, or should be, the natural breadwinners of families, and yet every one of them is a consumer and not a producer of wealth.

The only and inevitable effect of this superimposed burden upon the rank and file of the nation is to depress below the poverty line and sink to the level of dependency that marginal contingent of the population which, but for this fixed charge upon their narrow income, would escape the sting of having to accept alms and themselves becoming an additional burden upon the already burdened community.

That the contingent of population on this borderline is by no means small is evidenced by the fact that in a city as unusually prosperous as Baltimore undoubtedly is, there has been for the last three years, and is likely to be for some time to come, an average of one in twenty of the population in such straitened circumstances that they are forced to appeal to the Federated Charities, one-third of them being in need of material relief and two-thirds barely escaping from dependency. This, too, in an era which, as Professor Patten has recently pointed out, is characterized not by deficit, but by surplus.

In other words, there are hundreds of thousands of people in these United States who are suffering from underfeeding, overcrowding, ill health, debility, inefficiency, discouragement, failure, all because of an army and navy consuming $447,620,723 annually of the people's wealth.

This is not merely a matter of dollars and cents; it is a matter of flesh and blood; it is a human concern; it affects the poor vastly more than the rich or well-to-do. To narrow it down to the taxpayer is to overlook the fact that the taxes of this country are paid not by the taxpayer technically so-called; only the smallest fraction of the burden falls upon him. The real incidence of taxation is upon every man, woman and child who eats a mouthful of food, or wears a stitch of clothing, or uses a stick of furniture, or lives under a roof, or lives at all. Even a nursing baby has to pay tribute; and to this exaction is chargeable some of our excessively high mortality rate. The ultimate consumer pays the bills either in the coin of the realm or in his own life blood.

How is it that we have been so long coming to this peace conference and to the judicial settlement of our international differences? Is it not largely because our war taxes are indirect? "My people perish for lack of knowledge." The man in the streets does not know he is paying these bills. The intelligent wage-earner, the bread-winner with a family to support, does not realize how much of his money, if any of it, is going into the nation's war chest. Were it a direct tax upon us, there would be 101,100,000 thoroughly aroused Americans praying with their faces toward this Baltimore Peace Conference and enlisting for the war against war.

Let us turn on the light. Let us educate our children. Let them see what it all costs, not merely in treasure, but in human life and blood, even in piping times of peace. Let them come to understand that to disarm means to transform an army of consumers into producers of wealth. It means the deliverance of one more entire stratum of the population from poverty and dependence and the permanent enlargement of the area of self-dependence and self-respect. It means more and better food, clothing, housing, education, leisure for everybody; it means life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness for more of the poor.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

Sugar Creek Meeting, Iowa, is succeeding very nicely under the leadership of Glenwood Stanley as pastor.

* * *

Arthur and Eliza F. Dann have returned to their English home. They sailed from New York the 13th inst.

* * *

William Kirbe visited Oak Grove Seminary, Vassalboro, Maine, and attended the meeting the 16th inst, and gave a very helpful talk.

* * *

Newton R. Franklin, who has served as pastor in the meeting at Upperville, N. Y., for six years, has accepted a call to Trumansburg, N. Y., where he will begin his pastoral duties the first of next month.

* * *

* * *

The school year at Lawrence Academy, Gate, Okla., closed the 12th inst. with three graduates. Henry C. Fellow has been principal of the school during the past year, while his wife, Melissa S. Fellow, has been his able assistant. Through their efforts the school has improved both in equipment and enrollment.

Word has been received of an injury to the wife of Sylvester Newlin in Pasadena, Cal. While walking in her yard she fell and broke her forearm. Although the injury was very painful, no subsequent complications arose to make the hurt of a permanent nature.

* * *

The Friends Academy at Fowler, Kan., will not employ teachers for this coming school year. The board gives for their reason that they could not afford to run the school in opposition to a free high school which the present city school board is planning to put in.

* * *

Elwood Scott, superintendent of Marion Quarterly Meeting, attended Barber's Mill Monthly Meeting, at Keystone, Ind., the 6th inst., and preached in the morning and evening meetings. The following day he was with Friends at Barber's Mill morning and night. His services were under the power of the Spirit and were very helpful and much appreciated at both places.

Albert A. Bailey, Vassalboro, Maine, passed his eightieth birthday the 14th inst, and he was remembered by some 50 cards and letters from his children in Wyoming and Kansas. His niece and nephew, Elam and Elda Henderson, presented and his friends in Maine. His niece and nephew, Elam and Elda Henderson, presented him with a beautiful birthday cake.

Lynngrove Quarterly Meeting, Iowa, met the 13th and 14th inst., at Sugar Creek Meeting-House. Considering the fact that it was corn planting time and farmers were very busy, there was a fair attendance. Prof. Clarence M. Case, of Penn College, Oskaloosa, was present with a very acceptable message on Seventh-day. He also presented the subject of the Penn College endowment to the quarterly meeting.

* * *

Grand River Quarterly Meeting convened at Lowell, Kan., the 6th and 7th inst. No visiting ministers were present, but a number of Friends from Spring River Quarterly Meeting were in attendance. William George, Jeremiah Hubbard and others were used in the ministry to the edification of those present. Achsa C. Kenyon returned the minute liberating her for service in Texas. She reported a satisfactory trip. A basket dinner was served on First-day.

For its age and size, Bryn Mawr College awards a large number of fellowships and scholarships. The Board of Directors has just approved 10 resident fellowships, 5 English and 3 German scholarships, 30 graduate scholarships and 15 undergraduate scholarships. The resident fellowships are of the value of $525, and the resident graduate scholarships of the value of $200. No services are required of the holders which prevent them from devoting their uninterrupted time to study and research in the college. Bryn Mawr's graduate school numbers 84 students. Of this number, 11 come from abroad, including Canada, England, Ireland and Germany.

Puget Sound Quarterly Meeting, Wash., was held the 5th and 6th inst., at Tacoma, Wash. Harry Parry, Victoria Monthly Meeting, Victoria, B. C., also Caleb Jenkins, North Yakima, both ministers, gave very helpful and inspiring messages. After the usual business of the monthly and quarterly meetings a general discussion followed on the topic, 'Why Should the Society of Friends Exist?' introduced by J. Edgar Williams, Seattle. The Sixth-day evening meeting was helpful, being conducted by Chas. Replogle. The topic was "The Biography of a Sunbeam."

On Seventh-day evening, May Replogle gave an interesting missionary address with stereopticon views of Alaska. The quarterly meeting was largely attended and a great interest was taken in the business, various reports showing growth in the work.

Two addresses of great interest and value have recently been given to the pupils and teachers of Friends Select School, 140 North Sixteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. On Fourth month 27th, Professor Hubert Lockwood Willett, Ph.D., of the University of Chicago, spoke on the subject, "The King James English Bible and Its Place in Literature and Life." The lecturer drew the school's attention to the fact that this year is the three hundredth anniversary of the publication of this translation, and paid a worthy tribute to the dignity and influence of this great book. Following the lecture several groups of pupils were taken to Friends Library at different times to examine the valuable collection of Bibles of various translations, kept under the custody and shown by the courtesy of George Vaux.

The other address was by Joshua L. Baily, on Fifth month 18th, the anniversary of the establishment of the Hague Peace Conference. The subject was "The Development of the Peace Movement." It was a clear and forcible presentation of the present situation of the world in regard to peace.

The following announcements give some idea of the two chief social events in connection with London Yearly Meeting:

The Swarthmore Reception, Third-day, Fifth month 23, 1911.—A reception at the Hamilton Hall, Great Eastern Hotel (nearly opposite Devonshire House), has been arranged to precede the Swarthmore Lecture, and to welcome the yearly meeting to London. All Friends are cordially invited.

It is hoped that London Friends will do their utmost, by attending early, to ensure a welcome to those coming from other parts of the country.

The reception will be from 5.30 to 7; the lecture, on "Human Progress and the Inward Light," will be given at 7.30 in Devonshire House, by Thomas Hodgkin, D.C.L., D.Litt.

Yearly Meeting, Seventh-day, Fifth month 27, 1911.—A visit has been arranged to Jordans and the Chalfonts, "The Country of the Penns and Peningtons." Tea will be served at Jordans meeting-house, and Friends will be admitted on production of the tea ticket. Old Jordans farm is quite close, and there will be ample time for Friends to see it. During the afternoon Anna L. Littleboy will give a short account of Jordans' historic past, and Ernest Warner will speak of Jordans' present and future.

Western Quarterly Meeting was held at Graham, N. C., the 13th inst. Visiting ministers in attendance were James R. Jones, of Surry Quarterly Meeting; Thomas Hodgkin, of Eastern Quarterly Meeting, and Enos Harvey, chairman of the Yearly Meeting's Evangelistic Committee. There was great freedom and helpful messages were delivered by both visiting and home ministers.

The meeting at Graham is the product of four years' earnest self-denying service, of David E. Sampson and wife, Sarah M. Sampson. In this time they have gathered and organized into a monthly meeting a congregation of earnest Christian workers; and built and furnished a substantial meeting-house, which is nearly paid for. This was the first time the quarterly meeting had met at this place. An interesting and impressive feature of the business session of the quarterly meeting was the granting of a certificate of unity and concurrence with the expressed concern of David E. Sampson and wife to visit Nebraska and California Yearly Meetings. Under a very precious sense of the Divine presence many expressed themselves in terms of affection and unity, mingled with a sense of loss at the prospect of their going. An impressive farewell service was held on First-day evening in which David E. Sampson gave his parting counsel based on the thirteenth chapter of first Corinthians, and many others took appropriate part.

After telling of the death, early life, education and marriage of Hannah Whitall Smith, The Springfield Republican gives the following brief statement of her work and family:

"For some years Mrs. Smith conducted Bible classes in Philadelphia, and her home was the rallying point for religious movements. In 1873 she and her husband went to England and held religious conferences at Broadlands, Lord Temple's country seat, and also at Norwich, Oxford, and Brighton. Many congregations in Germany trace their origin to these conferences. In 1888 two daughters married Englishmen, and the whole family moved to London. For many years Mrs. Smith was president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and she was also a prominent advocate of equal suffrage. Besides her autobiography entitled "Unselfishness of God," she wrote many books and tracts on religious subjects, some of which have been translated into German and French. The late William James has referred to her anticipations of pragmatic doctrines in "The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life," which has been translated into Chinese as well as into every European language. She is survived by two daughters, Mrs. Bernhard Berenson, wife of the distinguished art critic and herself a writer on art, and Mrs. Bertrand Russell, wife of the famous Cambridge mathematician, herself an influential worker for suffrage and other reforms; and by a son, Logan Pearsall Smith, a writer on literature and history, who made his home with her."

Assisted by several thousand former students and other friends of the institution, Earlham College celebrated May Day, the 12th inst., with all the quaint ceremonies that have marked the custom since the olden time.

The college campus was the stage and the auditorium in one. Players and spectators mingled in true imitation of the old English celebrations. It was the occasion for reunions, and scores of Earlham graduates who had not visited the school in years returned and renewed acquaintances almost forgotten.

A new and increased significance was given to the event by the formal announcement that plans had been matured which insure that by commencement day Earlham would be free of debt.

The day was ideal, and the campus decoration resplendent. The pageant, headed by heralds and consisting of the "Ladie of the May" and attendants, milk maids, chimney-sweeps, fiddlers, jacks-in-the-green, shepherdesses and other characters of ye olden English days. Shakespeare's "Pyramus and Thisbe" and the "Plaie of St. George and the Dragon," bore the mark of painstaking rehearsals, and the spectators enjoyed the tragedy of the one equally with the comedy of the other.

In the evening "The Masque of the Queens," a seventeenth century play, was presented, followed by "a fairy revel."

Stephen Swett, whose obituary appears elsewhere, was a minister in the meeting at Lawrence, Mass., since its beginning, some twenty-seven years ago. This meeting started with a Friends Adult School. Some half-dozen of its members desired to meet and worship according to the customs of Friends. They met in private homes at first, then rented a room from the Y. M. C. A., and finally built a meeting-house at a cost of $10,000. The meeting now has a membership of over 100, a good Bible school, a Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and a Junior and Senior Christian Endeavor.

Stephen Swett was by occupation a farmer, and the membership of the meeting which he was so instrumental in building up is composed largely of textile workers. He and four others were the only birthright Friends in the meeting, most of the others were natives of England and Scotland. They loved music, and, although Stephen Swett's early training was against it, the practice of congregational singing became a permanent part of the worship. He was ever loving and tolerant all through his ministry, and in the early years of the meeting was greatly blessed in smoothing out many knotty situations in the meeting.

His wife, Sarah Swett, survived him only nine days. They had been companions for more than half a century, and she was a great help and encouragement to him in his service as minister of Lawrence particular meeting. She was a faithful wife, a good neighbor, and her quiet life and gentle spirit made their appeal to those about her and endeared her to the members of the meeting to which she belonged.

Correspondence

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FRIEND:

From time to time statements have appeared in THE AMERICAN FRIEND, setting forth the crisis in Iowa Yearly Meeting brought about by the financial condition of Penn College.

For the past year the management of Penn College has been carrying on a campaign to add another $100,000 to the endowment. About $75,000 of this has been subscribed. For excellent reasons, this amount should be completed by the first of Sixth month. Failure to do this will seriously hinder the progress; while success in this particular will bring increased prosperity. In the opinion of those best situated to judge, Penn College is at the parting of the ways, one road leading to prosperity, the other to death. On Sixth month 1st, Penn College will take one or the other of these roads. Which one she takes will depend upon the attitude of Friends.

For the past three years Penn College has had in addition to tuition receipts an income equivalent to 5 per cent. on $200,000. This was made possible by a "Sustaining Fund," which was raised three years ago. At the end of this college year this "Sustaining Fund" will be exhausted. Penn College will then return to a $100,000 basis—the amount of permanent endowment now completed—unless this new endowment of $100,000 be secured by Sixth month 1st.

Money is the life-blood of any business; an undersupply means an underdevelopment of the business. Thinned down below a certain point means death. To reduce the life-blood of Penn College one-half will be fatal.

If any Friends with means should read this statement of the case, I urge them to assist us as liberally as possible. We have secured about all we can from our limited resources, and if failure is averted, outside assistance must be had. Remittances may be sent to Henry D. Lane, treasurer of the college, or they may be sent to the undersigned.

With an earnest appeal to interested Friends to render such assistance as they can, I am

Sincerely thy friend,

DAVID M. EDWARDS.

WINDER.—To Seneca and Alberta Winder, Marion, Ind., Fifth month 15, 1911, a daughter, Rebecca Jane.

Died

GREGORY.—Near Alton, Kan., Fourth month 26, 1911, Hannah, wife of Omar Gregory, aged seventy years. She was a life-long member with Friends.

HUNNICUTT.—At her home, in Whittier, Cal., Fourth month 23, 1911, Elsie May, wife of Jesse F. Hunnicutt (deceased), aged thirty-five years, a devoted and useful member of Whittier Friends Meeting.

SWETT.—At Amesbury, Mass., Fifth month 7, 1911, Sarah Swett, passed away in her eightieth year. The deceased was a birthright Friend and for many years an elder in Lawrence Monthly Meeting, which station she held at the time of her death. Her passing on but nine days after her husband, Stephen Swett, impressed Friends as especially fitting and beautiful.

SWETT.—At Amesbury, Mass., Fourth month 28, 1911, Stephen Swett, aged eighty-six years. The deceased was an honored minister of New England Yearly Meeting.

The International Bible School Lesson

SECOND QUARTER. LESSON X.

SIXTH MONTH 4, 1911.

ISRAEL'S PENITENCE AND GOD'S PARDON.

HOSEA 14.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger. Neh. 9: 17.

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Fifth month 29th. Penitence and pardon.

Hos. 14: 1-9.

Third-day. Jehovah will heal. Hos. 6: 1-11.

Fourth-day. Ephraim a cake not turned. Hos. 7: 1-16.

Fifth-day Seek Jehovah. Hos. 10: 1-15.

Sixth-day. I loved Israel. Hos. 11: 1-12.

Seventh-day. Ephraim feedeth upon wind. Hos. 12: 1-14.

First-day. Israel's destruction. Hos. 13: 1-16.

Time.—The period of the prophesying of Hosea extended over about B. C. 743-736.

Place.—Somewhere in the Kingdom of Israel.

Kings.—In Israel, Jeroboam II, Menahem and Pekahiah; in Judah, Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah.

Prophets contemporary.—Isaiah, Micah, and possibly Amos.

Of the life of Hosea very little is known. His father's name was Beeri (Hos. 1: 1). Whether the name Gomer (1: 3) was the name of his wife, or whether the story there given is an allegory, has been a question much discussed, and cannot be entered into here. It has been beautifully said of him, "The other prophets explored the Kingdom of God: it was Hosea who took it by storm (Matt. 11: 12). He is the first prophet of Grace, Israel's earliest evangelist." "He proclaimed Love to be the ultimate element in religion, not only because it moves man to a repentance and God to a redemption more sovereign than any law; but because if neglected or abused, whether as love of man or love of God, it enforces a doom still more inexorable than that required by violated truth or by outraged justice."

The lesson is taken from what may be called the Epilogue in which the prophet sees in the dim future the return of joy and peace to the truly repentant. He draws his picture as one familiar with wood and stream, mountain and meadow. "His sacraments are the open air, the mountain breeze, the dew, the vine, the lilies, the pines; and what God asks of men are not rites or sacrifices, but life and health, fragrance and fruitfulness, beneath the shadow and the dew of His presence." This fourteenth chapter rises above all national and temporal considerations, and carries us up to the eternal Cross and the eternal Saviour, calling men to repentance.

1. The opening plea. To realize that we have fallen by our own iniquity is the first step to true repentance.

2. "Take with you words, and return unto Jehovah: say unto Him, 'Take away all iniquity and accept that which is good: so will we render as bullocks the offering of our lips.'" R. V. This is much clearer than the old translation. "Words" here is in contrast to the meaningless dumb ritual of sacrifices. It is the outpouring of the heart.

3. "Asshur." Assyria. "We will ride upon horses." That is, Egypt. No reliance upon alien strength will help you. "Work of our hands." Idols. Compare 1 Kings 10: 28; Isa. 30: 2-16; 31: 1; Ezek. 17: 15; Psa. 10: 14, 4-6. In these verses we have "God's reply to the words of penitence and trust." Note how the promise is forgiveness for the past; love for the present and future; and increasing growth and strength for the future. "The dew." To a dweller in Palestine the heavy dews in summer are almost their only hope for moisture. "He shall blossom as the lily." R. V. An image of fruitfulness and beauty. Compare Isa. 27: 6. But the lily has not a strong root, and the figure is carried on and changed to a symbol of abiding strength—the roots, as it were, of the mountains of Lebanon. Here not what is ordinarily known as Lebanon is meant, but Anti-Libanus—and specially Mount Hermon with its foot hills like great roots. "To be like this deep-rooted, steadfast, far-seen and much-loved mountain were better than to be like the fairest of its flowers and the stateliest of its trees." Compare Psa. 92: 12; Isa. 35: 2.

6. Israel shall be like a tree also—a cedar of Lebanon with spreading branches. "Olive tree." The olive tree is evergreen and its silver-gray foliage is a beautiful image of the unfailing grace of God. Psa. 52: 8; Jer. 11: 16. "His smell as Lebanon." "The lower slopes of Lebanon are clothed with aromatic shrubs, myrtles, lavender, and fragrant seeds." "As you enter the valley between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon the scent meets you."

7. This verse is probably spoken by the prophet.

8. Jehovah speaks. The verse is a difficult one. It has been translated thus:

"Ephraim, what has he to do any more with idols!

I have spoken for him, and I will look after him,

I am like an evergreen fir;
From Me is thy fruit found."

It is a fact that after the return from captivity the Jews never worshipped idols. It is very unusual to compare Jehovah to a tree, and it seems strange when just above Israel has been compared to one, but it is not unique, see verse 7, "From me is thy fruit found." Compare 2: 8, 23; John 15: 4, 5.

9. This verse does not resemble Hosea's style and would seem to have been added by some later writer. But whether by Hosea or another hand it is a fitting close to the book. "Wise."

In the Biblical sense that is "discernment," the power of distinguishing between the true and false, the good and evil. "Prudent." Having clear vision. See John 13: 17.

the world, is planning to open an office of her own. Heretofore she has conducted her business from the offices of the National Park Bank, the Commercial Bank, and other institutions in New York. She now expects to concentrate her business at 115 Broadway on the sixth floor of the Trinity Building. Her son, E. H. R. Green, will have charge of the business.

Hetty Green is now in her seventy-sixth year, and is estimated to be worth $100,000,000. This is the first time during her life that she has had an office of her own.

On the sixth Inst. Andrew Carnegie received at Washington, D. C., what he called his greatest mark of honor, when twenty-one American republics bestowed upon him a gold medal bearing on one side the words: "Benefactor to humanity," and on the other, "The American republics to Andrew Carnegie." According to John Barrett, director-general of the pan-American union, it was the first time in history that such a tribute from so many nations had been paid to FEED YOU MONEY.

Feed Your Brain, and It Will Feed You Money and Fame.

"Ever since boyhood I have been especially fond of meats, and I am convinced I ate too rapidly, and failed to masticate my food properly.

"The result was that I found myself, a few years ago, afflicted with ailments of the stomach, and kidneys, which interfered seriously with my business.

"At last I took the advice of friends and began to eat Grape-Nuts instead of the heavy meats, etc., that had constituted my former diet.

"I found that I was at once benefited by the change, that I was soon relieved from the heartburn and indigestion that used to follow my meals, that the pains in my back from my kidney affection had ceased.

"My nerves, which used to be unsteady, and my brain, which was slow and lethargic from a heavy diet of meats and greasy foods, had, not in a moment, but gradually, and none the less surely, been restored to normal efficiency.

"Now every nerve is steady and my brain and thinking faculties are quicker and more acute than for years past.

"After my old style breakfasts I used to suffer during the forenoon from a feeling of weakness which hindered me seriously in my work, but since I began to use Grape-Nuts food I can work till dinner time with all ease and comfort." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

This country will soon have opportunity to demonstrate its friendly feeling for Japan by showing honor to three of the Mikado's most distinguished subjects. It has been announced at Washington that Prince Fushimi, General Nogi and Admiral Togo, the latter two heroes of the Russo-Japanese War, plan to make their return trip from the coronation of King George V, where they have been accredited special ambassadors of Japan, by way of the United States. Although the arrangements have not been completed, it is said the officials, representing imperial, military and naval Japan, purpose calling on the President, to whom they are not strangers, he having met them on several occasions during his long stay in the Far East.

In Simple Sketches of Christian Work and Travel, our well-known English Friend, Mrs. M. A. Marriage Allen, has given us a very interesting account of what she saw and did in connection with some of the important events and humanitarian movements of the past fifty years.

Beginning with the slums of London and of Dublin, then bringing relief to the victims of the Franco-Prussian war and of the Commune, we see her next giving instruction again and again to the ignorant and neglected negroes in the South. Later on we find her organizing and administering help and comfort to the survivors of the terrible massacres in Armenia and Macedonia, subsequently to the Doukobors in Cyprus, and lastly bringing cheer and encouragement to missionaries in India, Japan and elsewhere. There is much variety in incident and expression, and an effort to keep the ego in the background as much as possible. There are glimpses of nations and peoples in a

A Morning Hymn for June

THE world is red with the bars of dawn;
Was ever light so fair?
The sunrise dips to my lowly lips
And foldeth my life in prayer.

My eyes are lit with the flame of day;
My soul is touched with fire;
To heav'n I raise, in a flood of praise,
The passion of my desire.

O Heart of dawn, O Heart of my life,
Thy flaming love I see;
My soul I lift as a morning gift
Of worship and praise to Thee.

How do you show your love to Christ.

How did Christ show His love to men?

How can we increase our love to Christ?

Helen Kellar, when recently asked to give a definition of love, answered, "Love is that which everyone feels for everyone else." If that were true we would now be living in the millenium instead of in the midst of the sordidness, the selfishness, the hatred, and the jealousy of the present generation. Her expression is idealistic and yet doubtless real from her point of view. Shut out from the world as we know it, her single avenue into the life of human relations has been the sense of touch and this has been guarded by a friend so faithful and true that absolutely nothing but the lovely and the lovable has been allowed to approach her soul. She has been taught nothing but love and has therefore felt little but love, and concludes therefore that "love is that which everyone feels for everyone else." This is surely the Christian ideal and its accomplishment Christianity's program. What is more worth striving for than human relationships characterized by this spirit? Reach it and every vexed problem of human affairs is settled forever.

* * *

St. John 20 is a chapter which illustrates in a concrete example a love for Christ which is memorable. Note the following verses and what they tell us about love. Vs. 2, love's conviction; vs. 11, love's sorrow; vs. 12, love's vision; vs. 15, love's presumption; vs. 16, love's perception; vs. 18, love's message. Look up these verses and verify the above features of love's expression.

* * *

"Personal love," says Prof. Griggs, "is the most powerful regenerative influence known to man, not excepting the inspiration of religion." Christianity, when it comes before us in its clearest terms, is always a personal relationship and one founded on love. It is doubly strong because it combines personal love with religious inspiration. "He loved us and gave Himself for us." "We love Him because He first loved us."

* * *

"Look at man's limitless possibilities in affection. Take your questions why God is mindful of humanity into the sick-room, where a little one lies stretched in weakness and weariness and pain, and watch the mother minister there day and night, becoming almost independent of sleep, never tired, or never confessing it, giving out her very life drop by drop, drop by drop. Or go into the law-court with your question, and see the husband charged by the police with abusing his wife, and see the wife become the advocate for her husband, affection welling up like a spring in the desert sands; you may choke it, but it flows again! Or take your question further afield, and see the noble service of man for man. Go among the lepers in Samoa or in Almora, and mark the men who have laid down everything that is accounted pleasant and worthy, and who have gone to stand between these sons and daughters of affliction and the fierce wind that continually beats upon them."—Jowett.

"Let me remind you for one thing that in that world which is nearest to us, in which we live—in the kingdom of love—mere size does not count; the foot-rule is an impertinence. You ask a mother, for example, to measure a child in inches. You say to the mother that the house is bigger than the baby and of more importance. No doubt it is bigger, but if the baby were as big as the house perhaps the mother would not love it quite as much, for in love's arithmetic it is sometimes the very frailty, the littleness of the object, that makes love most tender. Yes, a little thing of flesh and blood that cannot talk nor stand erect, nor know its mother's face, and yet if you put the Himalayas in one scale and the child in the other, in love's logic the child outweighs the mountains."—Fitchett.

* * *

This illustration of the "Hidden Heart" teaches the impossibility of the so-called secret Christian life.

The heart-shaped wedge of iron which was to form part of the new machinery had been carried away almost red-hot from the furnace—stolen by those opposed to the new invention—and buried in the ground. Search was made at once; but snow had fallen, and all trace of the hiding place was lost. But the hot iron warmed the earth above it and melted the snow; and when morning came there was an odd little patch of bare ground that told its own story to observant eyes.

"Did they really suppose they could hide that red-hot heart under the snow and have it stay hid?" sneered a foundryman as the wedge was dug out.

And yet so often we are gravely told of the warm heart hidden under an icy exterior; of the affection, tenderness, and general kind-heartedness that never manifest themselves in words and deeds. Forms of expression may vary, but some expression there must be; love cannot exist and throw no warmth around it. The heart that is aglow with tenderness and sympathy for others will send some sign to the surface. If it never does, we need not flatter ourselves that we are "really warm-hearted under a cold exterior." If the inner warmth does not thaw its way outward, the outer cold freezes its way inward.

* * *

Love for Christ expresses itself in an ever increasing circle of activities. What used to satisfy the conscience is not adequate today, as we seek to measure up in our love to the love of Christ. Prof. Coe has said it finely. "Not merely how much we spend, but how we get; not merely how much we give, but also how much we retain; not merely how little harm we do, but also how much good we might do; not merely how much is mine, but how the 'mine' can best serve humanity—these questions are coming home alike to capitalist and to laborer, to him whose wealth is in things, and to him whose wealth is in capacities of muscle or of mind."

News in Brief

Sixth month 12th, has been fixed by the United States Senate as the date for voting on the resolution submitting to the States an amendment to the Constitution providing for the popular election of Senators.

* * *

Henry J. Duveen, of the firm of Duveen brothers, art dealers, has been fined $15,000 in the United States Circuit Court. He plead guilty to undervaluations of imports, and his firm has already paid $1,200,000 to the Government in settlement of further civil suits.

* * *

The action taken by the House in the matter of Arizona's Constitution opens the way to a logical solution of the problem. The people of Arizona are to be enabled to vote upon the recall of judges as a measure apart from the rest of the Constitution, and can thus go clearly on record. If it should appear that the people of Arizona still insist on the recall, the only wise thing is to let them have it and learn from experience. Arizona, once admitted into the Union, cannot be prevented from amending the recall into her Constitution if she so desires.

* * *

Washington is the first city to avail itself of the generous offer of Julius Rosenwald of Chicago, to contribute $25,000 toward the erection of a $100,000 building for a Colored Young Men's Christian Association in any city which would raise the remaining $75,000. The athletic, educational, and social features of a flourishing Young Men's Christian Association, housed in a spacious, attractive, and dignified building, supply an element that is perhaps more acutely needed than any other for the development of morale among the colored youth of our cities, at a time that is in many ways the most critical in their lives.

The Center of Our Faith

I have just received a letter from a worker in the Chinese mission field, in which the writer says: "Our boys are showing in a wonderful manner the transforming influence of Christ in the soul. If anyone doubts the power of the Spirit of God over the soul of a man, just send him out here, where he can see it proved." That passage from the experience of a modern missionary fits in beautifully with the prayer of the first Christian missionary for his converts: "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith, that ye being rooted and grounded in love may be strong enough to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length and depth and height and to know the love of Christ which passes knowledge and that ye may be filled to all your fulness with God." No one can with an open soul read the ancient prayer or the modern testimony without being impressed with the fact that most of us who call ourselves Christians are out in the fringe and not at the center of spiritual possibility. Isaac Newton, at the end of his life, remarked with fine humility that he had only been playing with pebbles on the beach while the great ocean of truth lay unexplored before him. How much more truly can we confess, when confronted with this immense sweep of divine possibility, that we have so far only been playing with pebbles on the beach while the real ocean lies beyond, un navigated.

One difficulty with many of us is that we do not yet quite realize what the true center of the faith is—we mistake the fringe for the center. We have not learned clearly enough how to answer the question: What makes a person in the highest sense a Christian?

For many hundreds of years the all-sufficient answer was: To be a Christian means to belong to the only true Catholic Church which Christ came to the world to found, to obey its divinely appointed hierarchy, and to receive grace through its mysterious and magical sacraments. For this inadequate answer the Reformation brought to the front and emphasized belief as the essence of Christianity. The leaders did not consciously intend to do this, but when the Christians of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries undertook to answer the question: What does it mean to be a Christian? they usually answered: It means to believe certain definite truths about the nature of the triune God, the origin and character of sin in the human heart, the nature and mission of Christ, the plan of redemption, the offices of the Holy Spirit and the condition of the soul in the world beyond. The words of an ancient document came to have a new and powerful meaning: "Whoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the true faith of the Church, which faith except everyone do keep whole and undefiled without doubt he shall everlastingly perish." That answer has always left its trail of blood and martyr-fires behind it, for by no possibility can men be made to hold the same intellectual views on the supreme problems of life. If that is the right answer and if intellectual belief is the essence of Christian faith, then there is no immediate or distant hope of a single, unified, united Church of Christ.

But when St. Paul and the other New Testament saints give their answer, it is not in terms of belief, but in terms of experience and inward life. The thing which marks the essence of a Christian for St. Paul is the divine creation of new life within the soul, the formation of a new disposition in the heart, the birth of a new and Christlike will, the settling of the inner roots of the self into the divine Life which is the true environment of the soul, the reception of the invading Life of God until Christ Himself comes to dwell in us, to be formed in us, until we are filled up to our fulness with God, until love is our life. And through this experience we learn to comprehend, to understand, to believe the things that are essential to Christian life. Experience comes first and views come afterwards. Life comes first and knowledge is secondary. The center of the Christian faith is the divine birth within the soul, the formation of a Christlike disposition and will, and the rooting and grounding of the soul in love, in God.

"Oh could I tell, you surely would believe it!

Oh could I only say what I have seen!

How should I tell, or how can ye receive it,

How, until He bringeth you where I have been?"

Shall our South Alaskan Missions be Transferred?

At a meeting of the Kansas Yearly Meeting Board of Foreign Missions held at Wichita, Kansas, Fifth month 20, 1911, the question of the advisability of transferring the work in southeastern Alaska, now under the care of Friends, to the Presbyterian board was presented for consideration by the following minute of the executive committee of the American Friends board:

"Minute adopted by the Executive Committee of the American Friends Board of Foreign Missions at its meeting held Fourth month 26, 1911: We are informed that the Missionary Committee of Oregon Yearly Meeting favors the transfer of the work at Kake Island, Alaska, to the Presbyterian board, which is now in care of almost all the missions in southeastern Alaska. We are also informed that in order to consolidate the work, the Presbyterian board would probably accept the care of the work at both Kake and Douglas, Alaska, now under our board and reciprocate, if opportunity offered, by transferring the work at isolated points elsewhere to our board if it seemed desirable. Chas. E. Tebbetts and Francis A. Wright are appointed to present this matter to the board of Kansas Yearly Meeting, as it is our judgment that if that board and Kansas Yearly Meeting units with the proposition, it would be in accordance with present ideas of missionary comity and would promote the advancement of the cause of Christ to take steps to consummate the transfer of the work in southeastern Alaska to the Presbyterian board and concentrate our own energies on the other fields for which our Church is recognized as responsible under the comity of missionary work."

After a very careful discussion of the reasons for and against such action, participated in by all the eight members present, and also by J. Perry and Martha Hadley, missionaries at Douglas, Alaska, now at home on furlough, the board unanimously decided to endorse the proposition, and direct that it be forwarded to Kansas Yearly Meeting, and also given publicity through our Church papers, so that Friends may have an opportunity to give the matter their careful consideration in advance of the yearly meeting.

In approving the proposition, it is understood that it is conditional on satisfactory arrangements being made to transfer the work in such manner as will conserve the work already done by Friends, and assure us of its continuance, as nearly as may be, along lines in harmony with the same.

J. Perry and Martha Hadley will return to the field about Seventh month 15, 1911, and will continue the work on the present lines, as in any event, even if the transfer be effected, it cannot be consummated for a considerable period.

Dublin Yearly Meeting

Dublin Yearly Meeting closed Third-day, the 9th ult. The attendance was good, though perhaps not quite so large as last year.

The statistics showed a total membership of 2,440, a loss of 35 during the year. The excess of deaths over births is considerable—43 deaths to 18 births. There are now 33 ministers in the yearly meeting, 84 elders and 134 overseers. Besides these, the yearly meeting recognizes an office unknown among American Friends and reports 12 "visitors." The decrease in membership occasioned no little comment, and it was suggested that more care should be used in bringing "attenders" into membership. In reporting the discussion which followed the reading of a summary of the American epistles, The Friend (London) says:

The meeting evinced much interest in the summary. Attention was drawn to the statement that American Friends were concerned to find the gifted ones amongst them, and, having found them, to give them such assistance and education as would fit them to carry out efficiently the work in the Church to which they might be called, this thought presenting a lesson which the Society here might do well to copy. In the provision of schools and colleges the work of Friends in America is more than liberal; their effort amounts to sacrifice.

The prospect of an unrestricted treaty of arbitration between the British Empire and the United States occasioned considerable rejoicing, and a resolution was passed favoring the move.

Dr. Butler Outlines Plan For Peace Propaganda

Nicholas Murray Butler's address at the opening of the Mohonk Peace Conference last week was of unusual interest. He announced for the first time the plan which the trustees of the Carnegie Peace Foundation propose to follow.

In the opinion of the trustees, the time has come when the resources of modern scientific methods and of modern scholarship should be brought to bear upon the problems of international relations. They propose to organize the work under three departments: The division of international law, the division of economics and history, and the division of intercourse and education. The division of international law will be under the direction of Prof. James Brown Scott; that of economics and history under Prof. John Bates Clark, while the division for education has not yet been organized.

In concluding his remarks, Dr. Butler said:

It can hardly be doubted that the men at the head of these three important divisions of the work of the endowment, with their immediate associates and colleagues in this and other countries, will speedily come to form a veritable faculty of peace, and that the world will look to them more and more for instruction and for inspiration alike. No such broad and philosophic conception of international relations has ever before been put forward as that which the trustees of the endowment have formulated and made their own. The conception itself and the admirable plans made for its development and application open a new era in the history of the world.

Rich Criminals Must Suffer

Most people will welcome President Taft's refusal to pardon John R. Walsh, Chicago, and Charles W. Morse, New York, who are serving prison sentences for violation of the Federal banking laws. Petitions signed by many prominent and influential citizens were presented to him praying for their release. His refusal was accompanied with a statement of his reasons, which are so fair and straightforward that they should be a source of reassurance to those who wish to see justice meted out to rich and poor alike. The President pointed out that:

In the mad rush for wealth in the last few decades, the lines between profit from legitimate business and improper gain from undue use of trust control over other people's property and money have sometimes been dimmed, and the interest of society requires that whenever opportunity offers, those charged with the enforcement of the law should emphasize the distinction between honest business and dishonest breaches of trust. * * * The opportunity to commit such crimes is only afforded to men who have enjoyed high position in society and have secured the trust and friendship of many. Every case of this kind, therefore, must present some such considerations as those referred to [in the petitions], and if the executive on an appeal for clemency should yield to them, it would defeat the object of the law and present a demoralizing difference between the punishment meted out to the ordinary criminal, whose circumstances have naturally led him into crime, and one whose position in society should have made for him strongest restraint against violation of the law.

The Lumber Trust "Unreasonable"

Charges of a conspiracy to maintain high prices, to blacklist concerns not regarded as "proper" trade, and to violate generally the anti-trust law, were made in a Government suit which has been filed in the United States Court of the District of New York by Attorney-General Wickersham against the so-called Lumber Trust.

This is the first anti-trust suit conforming to the Supreme Court's Standard Oil decision, in that it alleges "undue" and "unreasonable" restraint of trade of the consumer and the manufacturer. It is the evident purpose of the plea to confine the charge largely to that feature, small stress being placed upon the restraint of trade among the defendants themselves.

That They All May Be One

One of the most hopeful signs in the Presbyterian Church is the spirit of charity and open-mindedness manifest in a resolution adopted by the General Assembly looking towards harmonious relations with the Union Theological Seminary of New York, an institution founded by Presbyterians and largely endowed with their money. For some years past there has been an estrangement between the assembly and the seminary, owing to the latter's progressive teaching on religious subjects. Pres. Francis Brown and one of the professors, Wm. A. Brown, were denounced as heretics by some in the assembly, and this raised the issue which resulted in the adoption of the resolution. These men are constructive in spirit and conservative in temper, but do not hesitate to face the intellectual difficulties of the age and to interpret the Christian message in modern terms. In a word, this is the source of misunderstanding and estrangement between the assembly and the seminary. Happily the Church is coming to see the injustice done teachers of this type, and is beginning to assume a conciliatory attitude.

While thus recognizing the worth of constructive scholarship, radicalism was condemned in the action revoking the ordination of Dr. Wm. D. Grant, who is reported to have voiced extreme views in his pulpit.

Japan Ready for a General Treaty

Government leaders in Japan are taking a deep interest in the tentative draft of our unlimited arbitration treaty with Great Britain and France. A report from Tokyo states that the officials are ready to negotiate with the United States on the same terms, if invited to do so. In Washington there is a rumor afloat that Secretary Knox and Baron Uchida, the Japanese Ambassador, have been corresponding along this line. So it is not unlikely that before many moons we shall be considering an unlimited treaty with our yellow neighbors.

Making A Sign Language

Ernest Thompson Seton, chief of the Boy Scout Movement in America, has been making a careful study of the sign language of children and primitive peoples, particularly of the American Indians. He has discovered a great similarity which he believes can be made the basis of a code which will enable peoples of all countries to communicate many of their elementary desires and thoughts without understanding each others spoken language. While he is making this investigation with a view of extending and elaborating a system of signs for the Boy Scout organization throughout the world, the venture may in time prove of immense value in surmounting the difficulties which a strange tongue or some physical defect interposes.

The World in Boston

BY WILBUR K. THOMAS.

"The World in Boston" is an immense missionary exposition, home and foreign. It is the first time that such an exposition has been held in America, though a similar one was held in London in 1908. Mr. Gardner, the secretary of "The Orient in London," was imported to organize and carry out the program.

The exposition was held in the large Mechanics Building, and was opened Fourth month 22d by Pres. Taft pressing an electric button in the White House, which illuminated a large star in the auditorium. It closed Fifth month 20th, and during all that time the officials had all they could do to take care of the throngs who came. A feature which added many thousands to the sightseers was the running of special trains from other cities and States. one train coming from Hartford, Conn. While the exposition proper did not open until 12 M., every morning the halls were crowded by school children from the city and suburbs, who, for five cents, were taken around in small groups to see and hear about the exhibits.

To point out other things which indicate the immensity of the undertaking, mention should be made that the exposition cost $100,000 before the doors were opened. Something like 18,000 people have given their services free to make it a success, and the majority of these paid for a workers' ticket besides. One thousand children were used to portray child life in the different countries. Ten thousand stewards were enrolled, who worked in relays of 400 at a time in charge of the exhibits. The figures are hard to estimate, but perhaps one thousand people on the average were used in each performance of the "Pageant."

The exposition proper was a very vivid portrayal of life, customs and effect of missionary work in many lands. Only a partition divided Japan and Africa, but the scene changed as completely as if the actual change was made. The completeness of each exhibit can be shown by describing one. In the African scene there was a native grass house, a cemetery scene, hut, granary, Congo house, missionary house, lake scene, stockade, blacksmith shop, Ju Ju scene, and curios from many parts of Africa. Other exhibits, including Japan, China, Korea, India, Mohammedan lands, American Indians, Hawaii, Porto Rico, frontier life, immigrants to this country, Eskimo and South Sea Islands, were in the same proportions. A large number of missionaries, assisted by trained workers, were on hand at the different booths not only to explain, but to urge one to stop and listen. As one went through the different representations, he would see a Japanese artist painting; a Mohammedan observing his hour of prayer; young men from Hampton Institute not only exhibiting, but making useful articles; a real prairie schooner; a Chinese tea shop; a little girl making lace; a real cowboy and real Indians. Excellent moving pictures portrayed actual scenes in far-off lands. In Tableaux Hall scenes were given, such as a marriage in Palestine, home life of women in different lands, etc. A number of stalls were used to sell books, lace and curios. It certainly did seem as if part of the world was in Boston, though this account can hardly be called a glimpse.

The greatest feature of the exposition was the "Pageant of Darkness and Light." This was produced as it was produced in London. It is a masque oratorio with five scenes, North, South, East, West and a final procession of all nations around the Cross of Christ.

The North is an Indian scene in the Northwest. The medicine man fails to find the chief's lost daughter, and he calls for the blood of some friendly traders. As this is about to be accomplished, the missionary enters, restores the child, found in the forest, and thus opens a way for the Gospel.

The South represents Livingstone in Africa, tired and with great longings for home. Stanley enters and begs him to return to a well-earned rest and glory, but Africa pleads, and Livingstone replies:

"No! Though my heart ache
For home,—though it break
For home,
I—can—not—come
Until my work is done.
I cannot come—
I will not come
Until my work is done!"

The East is a scene in India where a young widow is being led to the funeral pyre. The missionaries are unable to help, and just as the fire is applied the government officials rush in with the proclamation doing away with the suttee.

The West is in Hawaii. Superstition demands a sacrifice to the volcano Pele at the time of an eruption. The priest claims the victims, a bridegroom and a little girl, but the Christian Queen, Kapiolani, comes in, defies the priest and Pele and breaks the spell in the name of the living God.

In the fifth scene, all the workers, in costume, march to the platform and, arranging themselves around the cross, sing:

"In Christ there is no East or West,
In Him no South or North,
But one great fellowship of love
Throughout the whole wide earth."

at the conclusion of which all the audience would stand and join in "Old Hundred."

The staging of the scenes was beautiful, the music well adapted to the parts and extremely well sung, especially the solos. They were noble scenes and well portrayed the power of God to dispel darkness and bring light.

The co-operating societies for the exposition were the American Board, Congregational Home Mission Society, the American Missionary Society, American Baptist Home and Foreign, Methodist Episcopal Home and Foreign, Presbyterian Home and Foreign Missionary Societies, the Episcopal Church Domestic Home and Foreign, the Foreign Missionary Societies of the United Presbyterian Church of North America, the Reformed Church and the Universalist Church, the American Advent Mission Society, the Mission to Lepers in India and the East, the American Bible Society, the Young Peoples' Missionary Movement of the United States and Canada. Any surplus of money—and it was very successful—is to be divided among these organizations. It has been well received by the people and the press, and great additional interest to be manifested in lives and funds for mission work is confidently expected.

The Ministry of a Smile

BY MEAD A. KELSEY.

The revised rendering of Job 29:24 casts new light upon one of the most famous characters of Old Testament story. The corrected text reads:

"I smiled on them when they had no confidence,

And the light of my countenance they cast not down."

So Job was a man of a cheerful countenance. As he sat in the gate of his city, he smiled on those who passed by, especially noticing those who looked discouraged and overborne. Thus he became noted as the man who smiled. Men "waited for him as for the rain, and they opened their mouths wide as for the latter rain." Just to meet him did the heart good "like a medicine." And the beauty of it was that the medicine was pleasant to the taste and never developed a harmful reaction. Job was a wholesome man to have in the community.

In this connection it may be worth while to note something of the remedial value of the smile in modern times. From merical authority we learn that in a leading institution for the feeble-minded, an order was promulgated that, from the stable and laundry workers to the teachers and superintendent, all should be cheerful and wear a smile under all circumstances. This may appear a trifle artificial, but the results would seem to justify the method. The report says "that the reign of the smile, after six years, had reduced the deaths 60 per cent. and the illness 50 per cent." Perhaps we will surmise that other elements entered into those results, but, granting it, let us give due credit to the smile as a leading factor at least, and pray God to multiply those who smile. The world needs more of their tribe.

I have heard of a San Francisco dog that would put many professing Christians to shame, and he couldn't smile "just human," either. Seeing a poor, forlorn woman standing alone on the wharf one day, he went up to her and, looking up pleasantly into her face, wagged his tail in a friendly way and licked her hand. It was an humble, doggish act, but it turned the woman from her purpose to bury her shame and misery in the dark waters of the bay! That was six years ago, and today the same woman is one of the happiest Christian workers in San Francisco. True, the dog did not make her a Christian, but his effort at a smile saved her from going beyond the call of hope.

One beautiful thing about this ministry of a smile is that it is a service within the reach of all. There are ministries that are precious to which we cannot all attain, but we can all smile, and the opportunities for doing good in this way are more than can be named. We can and ought to smile for those of our own household, and we should look pleasantly upon all who come to our door, whatever their errand. We may cheer the shop-girl with a pleasant countenance and a cheery word, and so on, everywhere we go, scattering sunshine in the darkened world. As James Whitcomb Riley has put it:

"Whatever the weather may be, says he—'Whatever the weather may be,
It's the songs ye sing and the smiles ye wear
That's a-makin' the sun shine everywhere.'"

To those of us who are Christ's, this ought to come with peculiar emphasis. It is a part of His Gospel, which is pre-eminently a Gospel of cheerfulness. And one beauty of it all is the very contagion of it.

"Smile awhile, and when you smile another smiles,
And soon there's miles and miles of smiles,
And life's worth while because you smile."

Just now there comes to the writer's desk a letter from a young man referring to the recent loss of his grandmother. He says: "The first time I ever saw grandmother to remember her was eighteen years ago. As we came up the walk, she stood on the old front porch, smiling a welcome to us." What an ineffaceable picture upon the mind of a four-year-old boy! The smile of the modern apostles of sunshine is as acceptable and efficacious as it was in the days of the patriarch of Uz. How many of us will be remembered because people ran into a strip of sunshine when they met us, because we "smiled on them when they had no confidence"?

The Adana Massacre of April, 1909

BY HELEN DAVENPORT GIBBONS.

There is much that I could write about the rise of the young Turk movement. I could tell you how, when we came to Turkey in 1908, we shared in the enthusiasm of the "bloodless revolution of July 24th," how I waved my silk American flag as we entered the harbor of Smyrna on the first ship that arrived there after the constitution was declared, and had a cheer all of my own from the tug that brought to greet us a delegation of the supporters of "Liberté, Égalité, et Fraternité." I could describe to you a walk I took last Sunday out along the road which passes in front of my present home, the road where the soldiers of the Third Army Corps hanged Hodjas to telegraph poles, then marched to the heather-covered hill commanding the city and planted their cannon above Yildiz Kiosk. I could trace for you the development of that counter-revolution of April, 1909, which dethroned the "Sick Man of Europe" and sent him into imprisonment at Salonica. I could discuss the Adana massacre of that same eventful month, and emphasize its causes, rooted deep in race hatred, reactionary politics and Moslem fanaticism. I could tell you of the extent and cruelty of those massacres, which repeated before our eyes the darkest hours of history, and give you details that would sicken you and bring hot tears—and you would know that I have in my memory horrors yet more horrible, that both pen and lips refuse to describe.

But my task is more delicate and more difficult. It is to relate my own experiences during those days and to reveal some of the suffering which has so transformed me that in some ways the people I understand best now are those whose hair is white.

One day early in April, 1909, my husband and I were driving just outside of Tarsus, along what we called the Mersine Road, because it led to our seaport of that name. We saw a double line of camels coming towards us. Straight back of them lay the sunset, with spreading shafts of light, regular as the half circles of black lines used by oculists. Red were the shafts—like blood. The two lines parted when we met them, and we counted the camels as they swung wearily along, a hundred of them on either side of us. Each beast was laden with shiny rectangular boxes—kerosene. A few days later we drove through a Fellah village on the outskirts of the city, and from behind some huddled, basket-like houses, little children threw stones at us. Little we thought of it, and never dreamed what it prophesied. The kerosene was like the thoughts of the Moslems that day—so much hatred, ready to be ignited from headquarters.

On April 13th, Dr. Christie, president of the American college at Tarsus, Mr. Rogers, his son-in-law and husband of Mary Christie, Bryn Mawr, 1904, and my husband took the afternoon train for Adana to attend the fiftieth annual meeting of the mission, which was to open the following morning. Delegates from all over the field were coming to attend this conference. Our farewell was most casual, as Adana is only fifty miles from Tarsus by train, and I, for one, was expecting my husband to return the next afternoon.

The following day I sent my Greek boy to the station to meet Mr. Gibbons. When he came back it was with large eyes and a voice that had a quiver in it, despite his great effort at self-control. Mr. Gibbons had not come. Alarming news had come from Adana of the murder of some Christians. Our carriage had been seized by a crowd at the station, and Johannes had come back on foot. Shortly after this, some native women came to ask us to allow their sons to sleep at the college that coming night. Soon forty people were in our yard, then a hundred, then two hundred. No more trains came from Adana, and no news. All day Thursday we were without any news from our loved ones, and rumors were afloat that Adana was destroyed and that a terrible massacre was raging there. It was the apprehension of the extension of the massacre to Tarsus which brought us more and more people. All Friday morning they continued to come in throngs. I watched them pass along the street under my apartment windows to the college gate. They came running in desperation and deadly fear, bringing only their children with them. The massacre had started in our city. They began to come wounded and exhausted, many collapsing after reaching the safety of our gates.

One train had arrived from Adana, but it was a stolen train, bringing two hundred and fifty armed bashibazouks—Moslem peasants—whose hands were red with the blood of Adana Christians, but who were not yet sated. Their arrival precipitated the full horror of fanaticism in our city. We could hear the wild shouts which greeted the arrival of these fiends, and soon I saw them at the government barracks, receiving and distributing to their fellows of Tarsus rifles and ammunition. Then came the "Terror." We could see them, as they received their arms, run off in little groups towards the Armenian quarter, which bordered on the college property. They uttered low, angry cries. I saw twenty of them making an attack on one of the neighboring houses. Suddenly they appeared on the second-story porch, battered down the windows and doors, threw out the loot, and soon bits of burning paper came floating out of the windows, and then flames shot straight up through the roof. The man who owned that house perished in it—his wife and children had already reached the safety of our grounds.

People still came hurrying to us. Never will I forget the steady tread of their feet, the wails and the cries, the little children pulled along, the wounded sustained by the stronger ones. When night fell, practically all the Christian population of the town was huddled in our four acres. Those who could not get to us were killed. A later census of the refugees revealed the fact that we were sheltering four thousand eight hundred people!

There was no news from our loved ones in Adana. What an awful night it was! My second-story apartment faced the street. Half the horizon was in flames, and the fire line advancing towards us. Sparks were flying over us and on our buildings. The wind was in our direction, and the air was heavy with the suffocating smoke and smell that kerosene makes. Do you wonder that today I do not like to fill or light a lamp?

About 11 o'clock Mary Christie Rogers and I decided that it would be wise to prepare for flight. She had a baby boy ten weeks old. While she was arranging her things, I went back into my bedroom to get mine. What should I take? As I was expecting to have a little one to provide for myself at any moment, I naturally thought most of that. I put on my husband's overcoat, stuffed one pocket as full as I could of tiny garments that were most essential, another with educator biscuits and an American flag (the one I had waved in Smyrna to welcome the glorious régime of liberty only a few months before!) and I decided to carry in my hands a wooden filing-case containing reference cards for my husband's research work in history—cards that we had made together in the Bodleian Library in Oxford and during our quiet winter of study in Tarsus. With these I returned to Mary's room.

She, too, was ready. We realized our danger and the uncertainty of the next hour, when we might be called upon to go out and face the mob. Did your future ever look five minutes long? We talked calmly of the probabilities in Adana, and were quite ready to agree that we were probably widows. (Her husband had, in fact, nobly laid down his life, and had already been buried that very evening.) Mary's little baby never cried. It was a blessing for us to have that dear child to care for and think about. Shortly after midnight a miracle occurred. The wind changed. The fire, which had been coming towards us, was blown back over the ruins of the burnt quarter. During the nine or ten hours that it had raged, eight hundred houses were burned, and all the Armenians of Tarsus were homeless. Then we lay down and slept; we know well how weary soldiers can sleep in the midst of battle!

All through that night my class of sub-freshmen (boys to whom I had given daily lessons in English composition) guarded the part of the house where Mary and I were. They had filled our bathtubs, basins, pitchers and all other available receptacles with water, and every time a spark had alighted on the roof or balcony or window-sill, their vigilance had prevented the fire from spreading to us. All our windows giving on the street had been firmly closed and barricaded. I could peep out only through the slats of the shutters. My boys had cheerfully given up their bedding for the wounded and for the newborn babies. At dawn Mrs. Christie came to us and said that two babies had just come into the world and that a wee mite of a thing had died of pneumonia. For a whole week after this, babies came at the rate of two a day. I hurried along after her and pressed into her hands four of my little flannel petticoats I had brought. Then, going to my bedroom, I cut out four more and sat down by the streak of light coming through the barricaded windows to sew them up hastily. It was a merciful thing to have this work to occupy me that morning, for there was no news from Adana.

As I sat there sewing, I heard voices shouting: "Gibbons, Gibbons!" I pulled myself together and said to myself: "Steady now, is it life or is it death?" In a minute the wife of the French teacher, Mrs. Imer, opened my door and said: "Helen, Herbert has come!" I walked to the window in our study which faces the road leading up from the station, and there I saw my husband coming, surrounded by twenty soldiers. Dr. Christie was with him, but not Mr. Rogers. I hurried to the entry and ran into Dr. Christie, who must have come tearing up the steps. He said: "Thank God, you are safe! Where is Mary?" "In our study," I replied, and followed him into that room.

In another minute I saw my husband, standing with his back against the double doors. Then followed a strange experience. I thought: Is he dead? Am I dead, too? Was last night death? If I touch him and his face is warm, then he must be alive. I put my hand on his cheek with this question: "Where is Miner Rogers?" "He is dead," came the answer. All through this he appeared not to recognize me, and, turning on his heel, walked out into the hall again. Mr. Gibbons has no recollection of this meeting. Turning, I heard Dr. Christie break the awful news to his daughter, and witnessed her wonderful heroism. Then I went through a door into my bedroom, and there was my husband again, with a Turkish officer and another man. "Helen," he said, "this is Assim Bey, who is commanding my soldiers, and the Mudir of Namroun, whom you met last summer. We are thirsty and hungry. Can you make us some tea?" So I made tea for them. That was all.

The days of suspense that followed, the outbreak of the second massacre, the coming of the warships of all nations—I have not time to tell you this. Owing to the prevalence of disease among our refugees, and our crowded quarters and the uncertainty of the future, Mr. Gibbons took me and my faithful nurse and friend, Miss Lydia Talbot, of London, away from Tarsus as soon as train service was resumed. Two weeks later, on the upper floor of the Covenanters Mission House in Mersina, our seaport, my baby, Christine Este Gibbons, was born. My physician had fled for his life, because he was an Armenian and singled out for slaughter. Early in the morning of the 5th of May, Mr. Dodds, the missionary in whose house we were staying, rowed out to meet an incoming ship, in the hope that there might be a physician on board. At 6 o'clock Dr. Dorman, of Beirut walked into my room. Christine came two hours later.

When she was three weeks old, Christine's travel life began in the launch of U. S. S. "North Carolina," and she holds the record, I believe, as the youngest lady ever entertained by the officers of that ship. That same afternoon we left by a Khedivial liner for Beirut. From here we journeyed to Port Said, Alexandria, Marseilles and Paris. A short rest was followed by a trip to Liverpool and a fast passage home on the "Lusitania." Christine set foot on American soil at New York, recording her fourth continent in ten weeks. On the day she reached her sixth monthly birthday she was in Paris again.

As I write, Christine is eighteen months old. Recently she has visited Berlin and Athens, and now from her bedroom window in her new home at Roumeli Hissar, above Constantinople, she can look across the beautiful Bosphorus to the snow-capped mountains of her native land—The Bryn Mawr Alumnae Quarterly.

The How and Why of Earlham's Debt

BY ROBERT L. KELLY.

The great whirlwind campaign now in progress in Indiana and Western Yearly Meetings to raise $50,000 to liquidate the debt of Earlham College has, of course, caused many friends of the institution to inquire concerning the nature of the debt—how and why it was incurred, and whether a similar debt will soon grow up after this one is paid.

Within the last four years a new heating and lighting plant, a new library, and Bundy Hall—a dormitory for boys—have been erected. The heating and lighting plant was imperative if the college was to continue, and the largest single item in the total college indebtedness comes from this source.

The gifts which brought the library and Bundy Hall to the college were not sufficient to complete the buildings, and therefore a loan had to be secured to complete them. Especially with Bundy Hall, there was no choice in the matter, the donors desiring the building to be erected at once.

Added to these items is an administration debt, which, however, includes a certain expense for cement walks, sewerage, etc. Thus the total debt is $50,000, and it is this amount that friends of the college are now trying to raise.

They are explaining that in exchange for this indebtedness of $50,000 the college gained assets in permanent improvements amounting to $120,000. In other words, the college received and can show nearly three dollars for every one dollar in the entire indebtedness.

The reasons which led to the present campaign are many and urgent. In the first place the college is compelled to pay interest amounting annually to $3,000 on its indebtedness—money which should go to the work of education.

Other Indiana colleges and other Quaker colleges are increasing their endowments, while Earlham remains sadly hampered by its debt. The great educational boards, as well as interested friends of Earlham, are ready to bestow added endowments upon Earlham College as soon as this debt of $50,000 is liquidated. They are willing to help a college that will help itself, but they are waiting to see if Earlham has the life and vitality to clear itself of debt. If the college is to go forward, now is the time to strike.

Other colleges are beginning to make offers to some of the best members of the Earlham faculty because they are able to pay larger salaries, while Earlham is powerless to meet their offers because of its smaller endowment and its indebtedness. Many thousands of dollars can be added to Earlham's $350,000 endowment as soon as this debt is paid. This would mean a larger income and added wealth for the college.

In order to reassure those who might fear that the paying of the present debt would merely open the way for another similar debt in the course of time, the trustees of Earlham College have made a public statement to the effect that, in the future, money for buildings or permanent improvements must be in hand or provided before the improvements are undertaken.

A resolution adopted by the board reads:

"Resolved, That it is the sentiment of this board that no building or permanent improvement obligation shall be undertaken in the future without having first provided the funds with which fully to complete said improvements, it being understood that only emergency matters connected with college administration may be assumed."

The campaign will end June 21st, which is "commencement day" at Earlham, and unless the entire $50,000 has been pledged by that time, no pledge will be binding. Payment of subscriptions may be extended if desired over a period of from one to five years. Morton C. Pearson, Indianapolis, is chairman of the campaign committee, and is directing the work from his headquarters in the library building at Earlham College.

Things of Interest Among Ourselves

Twenty-three new members were received at the last session of University Monthly Meeting, Wichita, Kans.

* * *

Anna Stout has returned to her home, Wichita, Kans., from three weeks absence in Indiana on account of the sickness and death of her mother.

* * *

Gervas A. Carey, pastor in the North Side Meeting, at Wichita, Kans., has been quarantined at home for two weeks on account of measles in the family.

* * *

Verne F. Swaim, Director of Athletics in Friends University, has been granted a year's leave of absence. He expects to take advanced work in Chicago University.

* * *

Commencement at Bloomingdale Academy will occur Sixth month 8th. Prof. Elbert Russell, of Earlham, will give the Baccalaureate sermon on Sixth month 4th.

* * *

East Parsonsfield Quarterly Meeting, held at North Sandwich, N. H., the 13th and 14th ult., was favored with the presence and refreshing ministry of Wm. Kirby, of Ohio.

* * *

William R. Kirby, of Cleveland, Ohio, and Edward M. Woodard, of Bloomingdale, Ind., expect to attend Carmel Quarterly Meeting, at Noblesville, Ind., the 9th and 10th inst.

* * *

Prof. E. H. Stranahan, of Friends University, has been granted credentials for Wilmington Yearly Meeting and also for services as pastor in South Eighth St. Meeting, Richmond, Ind., during the summer.

* * *

The new mission at the Orient Railroad shops, Wichita, Kan., has had an average attendance of fifty, since beginning in the new Tabernacle. Young people from University Meeting have charge of the work.

* * *

Rufus M. Jones and family sailed from New York the 27th ult., on their way to Germany via Italy. They expect to spend three weeks in the latter country and the balance of the summer at Marburg, Germany.

* * *

V. D. Nicholson, field agent of THE AMERICAN FRIEND, has obtained one month's leave of absence to assist as a special solicitor in the Earlham College $50,000 debt campaign. He left the work in Kansas to come to Indiana.

* * *

Bloomingdale, Ind., Quarterly Meeting, was held the 19th to 21st ult. Prof. David W. Dennis of Earlham College gave two inspiring discourses, and also lectured on "Birds" before the Academic Association on the evening of the 20th.

* * *

In the inter-academic contest, held at Plainfield, Ind., the 5th ult., Garfield Cox, a student of Fairmount Academy, won first place in oratory. His oration on "The Necessity of Conservation" was especially strong in thought. Bloomingdale Academy, represented by Fay Wilkins, won in declamation.

* * *

Members of the Earlham College Alumni, in Baltimore, recently formed an Earlhamite Club, and elected John N. Parker, president, and Mary E. Spray Moon, secretary. A similar organization exists in New York, known as the "Earlham Association of the City of New York," of which Dr. Samuel B. Heckman is president and Viola B. Marine secretary. The Philadelphia Earlham Club, which is the oldest and largest association of Earlham Alumni in the East, held a social on Haverford College campus the 27th ult. Invitations were sent out to all Earlhamites in the eastern part of the United States, about 125 in all.

* * *

The campaign to lift the $50,000 Earlham debt by Sixth month 21st is in full operation. The State is divided into twenty districts, based on Friends population, ten of which are being canvassed simultaneously. Morton Pearson, of Indianapolis, is giving his entire time to leading the campaign as chairman of the general committee, which is composed of Timothy Nicholson, Joseph Goddard, Gurney Hill, Elbert Russell, Harlow Lindley, Robt. L. Kelly and Lester Haworth.

Two special solicitors are sent into each district, who, with the assistance of local men, will cover the field. Automobiles are used in the country districts so as to cover the field in a whirlwind campaign.

By the end of last week $26,000 had been raised.

* * *

Western Quarterly Meeting, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, was held at West Grove, Pa., the 19th ult., of which the following account appeared in THE FRIEND:

"It was attended by several visiting ministers. Besides those from other Quarterly Meetings in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, two were present with minutes for religious service issued by Monthly and Quarterly Meetings subordinate to both bodies known as Kansas Yearly Meeting. Cyrus W. Harvey came from the conservative body and William P. Haworth from the Progressive. Following the practice of most of our subordinate meetings and of the Yearly Meeting, the credentials of neither of these visitors were read.

The silence of the meeting was broken by William P. Haworth engaging in supplication, which was soon followed by a communication from him. The other Friends who had vocal service in the first meeting were Charles Kirscht, Watson W. Dewees, Cyrus W. Harvey and Benjamin Vail. Several ministers were in attendance who had no vocal service. The number present appeared to be about as many as on former occasions.

* * *

Following Robert E. Pretlow's sermon the 23d. ult., the congregation at the Lafayette Avenue Friends Meeting, Brooklyn, adopted the resolutions given below. The matter has been taken up by the New York Federation of Churches and copies of the resolutions sent to all pastors in Greater New York, with suggestions that their congregations take similar action.

RESOLUTIONS.

The congregation of the Lafayette Avenue Friends Church has noted with interest and gratitude the brave and sane expressions of President Taft in favor of the arbitration of all international differences, and the practical and statesman-like action of the President and Secretary of State in seeking to negotiate treaties to this end.

Therefore be it resolved:

That we heartily approve of the negotiation and ratification of such treaties with the British Empire, the Republic of France, and any other nations willing to enter into such agreements with us, as steps in line with pure justice, enlightened reason, and the teachings of Jesus Christ.

That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State, and to each of the Senators from the State of New York.

An event of great interest in Whittier, Cal., occurring on the 13th inst., was the unveiling of a monument in honor of John Greenleaf Whittier, the Poet of Freedom, for whom the town was named. The monument is located at the entrance of the Whittier College grounds, and it is estimated that 3,000 people were assembled on the campus to witness the ceremonies. Mayor Reed, with fitting remarks, presented the monument to the college management on behalf of the citizens of Whittier, and President Thomas Newlin responded with the principal address of the occasion. The monument is a beautiful paneled structure of a fine quality of compressed brick, standing about 12 feet high, and is surmounted by a large globe of ground glass, enclosing electric lights that beautifully illuminate the surroundings. The front panel of the monument bears a large picture of the benign face of the Quaker poet, in bronze bas-relief, beneath which is inscribed the following quotation from a poem which he dedicated to the city that bears his name:

"Dear town for whom the flowers were born,
Stars shine and happy song-birds sing,
What can my evening give to morn,
My winter to thy spring?

"A life not void of pure intent,
With small desert of praise or blame,
The love I felt, the good I meant,
I give to thee my name."

Organized class work has been a great boon to the women of Wilmington, Ohio, Friends Bible School, as the following item from a local paper indicates:

"A delightful happy occasion was that of the meeting of Mrs. Ellison R. Purdy's Sunday School class at her home, Fourth-day afternoon, Fifth month 10th. This was the happy conclusion of a contest for attendance at Sunday School for a given period, and the defeated side was entertaining the winners. Mrs. Olive Curl and Mrs. Joe Walker were the captains of the two divisions. This class is known as the "Helpers." Mrs. Purdy, in a happy way, complimented her class on the way they do things, and introduced Mrs. F. L. McDonald, who toasted the winners. Mrs. McDonald began with the story of a Sunday School teacher and her class in its earliest history. That teacher was Mrs. M. Emma Newby, now of New York, who was present, and the class, which numbered only four charter members is the one which has grown so magnificently and now numbers sixty-seven.

"The response from the winning side was given by Mrs. Stella Hempstead, who commended the losers for their cheerful acceptance of their defeat.

"Mrs. Newby spoke on "The Opportunities for the Class" and Miss Louise Doan sang a beautiful solo. A dainty luncheon was served by the ladies who wore the "dunce caps."

"As the hour of parting drew apace, the fifty members of the class present, as if by magic, joined hands around Mrs. Newby, who was all unconscious of the proceedings until she found herself in the ring. The singing of "God Be With You Till We Meet Again" closed a very happy afternoon.

The Ministerial Association of Indiana Yearly Meeting met at Rockford Ohio, Fourth-day, the 17th ult., with the Vice-President, Milo S. Hinckle, of Jonesboro, Ind., in the Chair. After the devotional exercises, Folger P. Wilson, of Richmond, recently returned from Palestine, gave an interesting and instructive address on Jerusalem. The conference then adjourned to meet at eight o'clock Fifth-day.

The subject before the Association at that time was "Women's Ministry." Two papers were read and an address given. On account of the unavoidable absence of Ida Parker, Millie M. Lawhead read her paper which emphasized the fact that the Holy Spirit was no respecter of sex. This truth is being more fully recognized and followed now than when Margaret Fell did so much to establish the Society. Women are rich in sympathy, perception and appreciation and should be given a chance to prove their worth. When called to preach, they should have efficient training, just as any one should have in any other important line of work.

Mary McVicker, of Farmland, Ind., believed that women ministers could do much in the home in manifesting sympathy for women.

The paper prepared by Emma G. Randolph was read. The New Testament in spirit, letter and practice was cited as clearly indicating God's call to women, and history past and current to prove that women actually preach. A cardinal doctrine of Quakerism, the priesthood of believers, carries with it, inseparable, the ministry of women. By adequate analysis of the nature and purpose of preaching, we discover it to be impossible for an individual to receive the spoken gospel message, without becoming responsible for its reiteration.

The universality of the call demands universality of proclamation. George Fox saw this great truth in the priesthood of believers, and he found it impossible to mutilate the gospel to make it conform to the traditions of the Fathers, relative to women. When he recognized in an individual the evidence of the gift, it was so recorded on the minutes of the meeting, regardless of sex. For those who have been baptized into Christ, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, for we are all one in Christ Jesus.

George W. Bird led in an interesting discussion, others followed.

George C. Levering, of Winchester, presented the Young People's Missionary Movement. He said, "The resources of God are at the command of the young people.

Twenty-five years of the student volunteer, and nine years of the mission study class work have enabled a large number of young people to prepare themselves, and go to non-Christian lands to help win the world for Christ. The vision of life comes to the young and they must present that vision.

Chas. E. Tebbetts, of Richmond, followed; his subject being "Missionary Messengers." He spoke of the men and women of the past, emphasizing the need of seeking and finding the missionary messengers of today. The pastor being the pivotal man, he is responsible for the leadership in his church, he must preach, teach, and enthuse his people, leading them in missionary activity.

Chas. O. Whitely, of Carthage, read a carefully prepared paper, "The Pastor and the Bible School." The Bible School stands for more knowledge, as pastors we must see that the Word is properly taught. The necessity of a trained mind was insisted upon. The requirement and standards must be just as high as in the secular school.

An interesting symposium followed.

J. E. Cox, of Carthage, spoke of the organized class, to train men for Christ. Man is a social being, entertainment as well as instruction must be provided for all. The organized class is a cure for lack of interest. Care must be taken to provide a suitable class name.

Dr. Conrad Huber, of the Evangelical Church of Richmond, spoke on Evangelism in the Bible School. The purpose of the work is two-fold. To lead souls to Christ and to feed them. The main thing is not to teach geography, history, but to teach the heart of the lesson.

Ancil Ratcliff, of Fairmount, gave an excellent address on "Teacher Training."

The subject of missions in the Bible School was presented in a short paper sent by Martha C. King, followed by Chas. E. Tebbetts, who spoke on the missionary atmosphere of the Bible School, showing the great necessity of enforcing missionary teaching by appealing to the eye through picture and motto.

In the evening Dr. Huber delivered an address on "Prophecy," taking as the basis of his remarks, 2 Pet. 1: 19-21. His illustrations from history, showing the fulfillment of prophecy, were most convincing.

On Sixth-day morning a symposium was conducted by Richard Haworth. Theme, "Evangelism in Indiana Yearly Meeting." Virgil Brock, Leora Bogue, Ira C. Johnson, Geo. W. Bird, Millie W. Lawhead, Chas. E. Tebbetts and Emma G. Randolph spoke on various phases of the work. Richard Haworth urged upon all the workers the necessity of cheerfulness, courage, optimism, the great need of careful preparation, a trained mind controlled by the Holy Spirit, and above all that the "love of Christ may constrain us."

Conference adjourned to meet in Ninth month at Richmond, Indiana.

The Eighth Triennial Conference of the Women's Foreign Missionary Union of America was held at Wilmington, O., the 6th to the 9th inst. Wilmington Quarterly Meeting was held Sixth-day morning. A number of delegates were present. Eliza C. Armstrong and others spoke. The prevailing thought of the meeting was "Fellowship with the suffering of Christ as an essential in saving a lost world."

Impressive mottos, such as "I will place no value on anything I have except in relation to the Kingdom of Christ," D. Livingston,—together with pictures of the missionaries decorated the room and two vestibules of the meeting house were filled with the best of missionary literature.

Seven missionaries and about sixty delegates attended. All were pleased to see the President, Ethel Kirk Calvert, in the chair, after a year of severe illness and suffering. She was ably assisted in directing the meetings by the Recording Secretary, Harriet F. G. Peele. The opening devotional exercise was led by Sarah J. King, and a word of welcome was given by Emma S. Townsend, to which Emma F. Coffin responded.

The president pointed out that while women Friends began to organize for missionary work thirty years ago, only one-quarter of the women in the church are in any missionary organization. The aim of the W. F. M. U. is every woman interested and enlisted.

Charlotte Vickers, in her inspiring talk on "Service," emphasized the call of God to place in His hands simply that which we have—that He may bless it to the salvation of the world, and bless us in the surrender.

Many letters and messages were received from those on the field. The missionaries in attendance were Margaret Holme, Suh Hob, China; Harriet Shimer, China; Emery Rees and wife, Marigoli, Africa; Alice Jones, Ramallah, Palestine; Lydia Pike, Mexico, and Clotilde Pretlow, Cuba. Addresses by all of these were given during the Conference.

Following are only a few of the many thoughts presented: Frequent emphasis was placed on the fact that the great need at present is "means" rather than "men." Systematic giving was urged as a means of untold efficiency and power to the church at home and abroad. To make missionaries, to sustain and create interest, missionary literature should be read and talked about in the family circle. "The Missionary Advocate," efficiently edited and published by Eliza C. Armstrong, should be in every Friends family. More biographies of our devoted missionaries should be written.

Chas. Tebbetts, Secretary of American Board of Foreign Missions, was present and presented his literature. He urged the necessity of men being enlisted in this cause, for their good, the good of the church, and for the sake of the family in heathen lands. The members of the W. F. M. S. must be tireless in their efforts to reach the children in the home, the Bible school, the young people's organization, and the summer school.

A slight change in the Constitution was made by which a part of the annual dues are retained for the work at home.

The conference was blessed with excellent entertainment by the Wilmington Friends. The following features deserve special mention: good music; sermons by Levi Pennington and Daisy Barr, and evening addresses by Alice Jones, Margaret Holme and Emery Rees.

Greetings were sent and received from Phoebe S. Aydelott, Mass., and Hannah L. Smith, Florida, faithful but afflicted and absent sisters and long-time officers.

New officers chosen for three years are Charlotte Vickers, Chicago; Recording Secretary, Martha D. Henley, Indianapolis; Vice Presidents, Ada C. Brown and Belle C. Bailey; Corresponding Secretary, Sarah J. King; Treasurer, Mary Paige, East Lynne, Mass.; Superintendent of Literature, Imelda Tebbetts, Richmond, Ind.; Superintendent of Young People's Department, Edith Smith, Iowa; Superintendent of Systematic Giving, L. Maria Dean, California.

Speaking of the Conference, Prof. Oliver N. Thatcher, formerly of Chicago University, now of Wilmington College, says:

"This, it may be said, was a very successful conference. It was rather remarkable that so many officers were present and practically all the people on the program were present and well prepared to perform the part assigned them. When we consider that the delegates came from all over the country, it speaks well for the seriousness of the Union that its members responded, almost without exception, to the call.

No less striking was the character of the delegates. They appeared to excellent advantage in every circumstance in which they were placed. They were tastefully dressed and looked cultured. One would have no cause to feel chagrined that they should represent our civilization and religion to the heathen."

Died

BIRDSALL.—At Boston, Mass., Fourth month 10, 1911, Albert Birdsall, in his eightieth year. He was a birthright member of Friends, having all his life held his membership in Plattekill Valley Meeting, in Cornwall Quarterly Meeting, N. Y. His daily walk for many years was marked by the greatest faithfulness to known duty.

CRAIG.—At Quaker Valley, the home of her parents, Ambrose and Sarah Ann Kenworthy, near Galena, Kans., Ida L. Craig, aged 46. The deceased was a member of Friends, and an earnest worker in the Bible School.

MORRIS.—At Long Beach, Cal., Fourth month 28, 1911, Loretta, wife of Thomas K. Morris, aged sixty years.

STANLEY.—At the home of her son, E. A. Stanley, near Lapel, Ind., Fifth month 1, 1911, Hannah Stanley, aged nearly eighty-four years. To the last she was a regular attender of meeting. After a short service at Lapel, the remains were taken to Eagle Creek and laid beside those of her husband, Isaac Stanley in the Eagle Creek Cemetery.

The International Bible School Lesson

SECOND QUARTER, LESSON XI.

SIXTH MONTH II, 1911.

HEZEKIAH'S GREAT PASSOVER.

2 CHRONICLES 30.

For Special Study, Verses 13-27.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart. 1 Sam. 16: 7.

DAILY READINGS FOR THE PRECEDING WEEK.

Second-day, Sixth month 5th. Hezekiah's Passover. 2 Chron. 30: 1-27.

Third-day. The temple cleansed. 2 Chron. 29: 1-19.

Fourth-day. Worship resumed. 2 Chron. 29: 20-30.

Fifth-day. Consecrating. 2 Chron. 30: 31-36.

Sixth-day. Tithes. 2 Chron. 31: 1-10.

Seventh-day. Service of the Lord. 2 Chron. 31: 11-21.

First-day. Josiah's Passover. 2 Chron. 35: 1-19.

Time.—Hezekiah reigned B. C. 727-695.

Place.—The temple in Jerusalem.

Monarchs.—In Israel, Hoshea, until the fall of Samaria, 722; Assyria, Shalmaneser IV, Sargon, Sennacherib; the regal period in Rome.

Prophets.—Hosea, Micah, Isaiah. Parallel account.—None.

In order to gain the connection chapters 29-31 should be read. This chapter 30 is one of the passages which has no parallel in Kings. Hezekiah was a good son of a bad father. This may have been due to his mother, who was the daughter or granddaughter of the Zechariah mentioned in 2 Chron. 26: 5. It is also possible that the prophet Isaiah may have had a helpful influence. In chapter 29 is given the account of how Hezekiah began his reign by restoring and cleansing the temple and in the present lesson is recorded the keeping of the first Passover thereafter. This was held in the Second month, though the regular time was the First month. (2 Chron. 30: 2, 3). For special reasons a postponement might take place. See Numb. 9: 10, 11. From verses 6, 7, 8 we should gather that the Northern Kingdom had fallen (B. C. 722), but the reference may be to some earlier invasions.

13. "Feast of unleavened bread." This was strictly a feast following the Passover. Compare Ex. 12: 1-13 with Ex. 12: 14-20. Here the two feasts are practically run together as in the New Testament, Mark 14: 1, 12; Luke 22: 1.

14. "Altars." The unlawful ones raised by Ahaz (chap. 28: 24). "Altars for incense." The margin reads, "vessels for incense," which gives a better meaning. "Kidron." The brook which ran along the east side of Jerusalem. It was dry during the greater part of the year, and the name was applied to the ravine as well as to the water.

15. The same day of the month was observed as if the Passover had been held in the First month. "Ashamed." The idea seems to be that the priests and the Levites were driven to the celebration rather through a feeling of shame than through a desire to keep the law. (Compare chap. 29: 34). "Brought burnt offerings." R. V. That is, for themselves. Compare Isa 52: 11.

16. "After their order." R. V. According to the official rank. "The law of Moses." The general law specifying the different ranks, etc. "Of the hand of the Levites." It should have been of the people, but they were unclean, as shown in the next verse. (See Ex. 12: 6; also 2 Chron. 35: 11; Ezra 6: 18-20.)

18, 19. In the Northern Kingdom there were many who had not the opportunity of observing the regulations and so were, at least, ceremonially unclean. "Even him that setteth his whole heart." R. V. margin.

20. "Healed the people." That is, forgave them. Compare Psa. 41: 5; Hos. 14: 5; Jer. 3: 22. The ceremonial transgression is looked upon as a disease to be removed by healing.

22. "And Hezekiah addressed kindly all the Levites who had shown good skill in their music for Jehovah." He encouraged and complimented the musicians. "That were well skilled in the service of the Lord." R. V. So they [the people] did eat throughout the feast for the seven days, offering sacrifices of peace offerings," etc. R. V. or, "And they did eat the offerings of the feast seven days." The peace offerings were meat, so they could be eaten. The original is not very clear. "Making confession," or, as in the margin, "giving thanks."

23. "Other seven days." That is a week in addition, making fourteen days in all. Compare the rejoicings at the time of Soomon's Temple, 2 Chron. 7: 8. "The Lord, the God of their fathers." R. V.

24. They were able to do this because Hezekiah had given to the assembly (congregation) "for offerings" (R. V.), many animals, "Princes," officials or chief men in the Kingdom. "Sanctified themselves." This fact enabled the munificent gifts to be properly sacrificed. Compare verse 3, and chap. 29: 34.

25. "The strangers," better, "sojourners." The men of alien descent, the proselytes. There were thus three classes which participated in the rejoicing: (1) The people of Judah, including the priests and Levites; (2) The people from the Northern Kingdom; (3) The proselytes from both Kingdoms. Compare Ex. 12: 19, 48.

26. "Since the time of Solomon." Compare 2 Chron. 7: 8.

PRACTICAL THOUGHTS.

The secret of Hezekiah's success is told in the words: "He did it with all his heart." See 2 Chron. 31: 21.

FRIENDS RALLY AT THE INTERNATIONAL C. E. CONVENTION.

The Friends Rally in connection with the International Convention of Christian Endeavor will be held at the Friends Meeting House, Atlantic City, at 2.30 in the afternoon of Seventh month 10, 1911.

The young Friends of yearly meetings where there are no C. E. organizations are expected to take equal part in the meeting with the Endeavorers. A time of approachment, mutual counsel, and acquaintance is hoped for.

Richard R. Newby, Vice-President of the Friends International C. E. Union will preside. Short addresses will be made by L. Oscar Moon, of Baltimore; William E. Cadbury, of Philadelphia; Earle J. Harold, of New England; Lillian E. Hayes, of Indiana, and others. Ample time is expected for discussion. The roll of yearly meetings will be called, and a social time enjoyed. A most cordial invitation is extended to all young Friends, whether members of the C. E. or not, to be present at this meeting.

MENTAL ACCURACY.

GREATLY IMPROVED BY LEAVING OFF COFFEE

The manager of an extensive creamery in Wisconsin states that while a regular coffee drinker, he found it injurious to his health and a hindrance to the performance of his business duties.

"It impaired my digestion, gave me a distressing sense of fullness in the region of the stomach, causing a most painful and disquieting palpitation of the heart, and what is worse, it muddled my mental faculties so as to seriously injure my business efficiency.

"I finally concluded that something would have to be done. I quit the use of coffee, short off, and began to drink Postum. The cook didn't make it right at first—she didn't boil it long enough, and I did not find it palatable and quit using it and went back to coffee and to the stomach trouble again.

"Then my wife took the matter in hand, and by following the directions on the box, faithfully, she had me drinking Postum for several days before I knew it.

"When I happened to remark that I was feeling much better than I had for a long time, she told me that I had been drinking Postum, and that accounted for it. Now we have no coffee on our table.

"My digestion has been restored, and with this improvement has come relief from the oppressive sense of fullness and palpitation of the heart that used to bother me so. I note such a gain in mental strength and acuteness that I can attend to my office work with ease and pleasure and without making the mistakes that were so annoying to me while I was using coffee.

"Postum is the greatest table drink of the times, in my humble estimation." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason." Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

A PRINCIPAL WANTED.

The trustees of Hesper Academy, located at Hesper, Kansas, are desirous of securing a competent person to fill the position of principal of the school and pastor of the meeting combined.

The prospect for the ensuing year is encouraging.

Anyone wishing to make application will please do so at an early date.

Abiding God's Call.

God's boundless beyond is ever calling to our littleness to come forth—to extend and expand, to warm and purify our hearts.

Endless spring-time of the spirit-life in the spirit-world is one of the most charming in the holy vision which coaxes onward and upward our weary feet.

Yes! this fact that life proceeds in its development by successive bud-processes is full of suggestive thought.

If the tree might be conscious of the restraining processes which hold up and check its growth of bough, of leaf and of bloom it would, 'a jot or a tittle,' rebel against being stripped of its glory and beauty and left half naked to spend the whole winter sighing because of the winter winds.
